The Newcastle Daily Journal dealing with the same question, urges Sir Edward Grey to change the Turkish policy, which has so extensively injured the British interests in the Near East. Referring to the resolution passed by the Ottoman Legislature in the City last week, which stated that "the Young Turk Party" were the "only party" who could save the Empire, the Journal adds: "Representatives of the Young Turk Party are needed for there is no doubt that the only party who can save the Empire is the Young Turk Party."

concerning Turkey is being carried too far, to the probable injury of our interests in the Near East. At the present moment, the Porte is engaged on an elaborate scheme of internal reform, which may be brought to success if the Powers adopt a sympathetic attitude, but will assuredly prove a failure if there is interference of the kind so often witnessed in recent years. In regard to Turkey, in particular, it is time that we returned to our traditional policy, and, by showing our friendliness at the present juncture, we shall be better able to accomplish a settlement of all questions in dispute, while at the same time we shall promote our commercial interests in the Near East."

It is evident that the business circles in England are viewing the situation with no little anxiety, and though their sympathy towards Turkey is obviously prompted by purely selfish motives, representations from such influential quarters could not be altogether ignored by the British Foreign Office.

LONDON CONFERENCE: THE PRESS LAWS IN INDIA AND EGYPT.

The Nationalities and Subject Races Committee, of which Mr. L. T. Hobhouse is Chairman, held a series of meetings (the Annual Conference of the Committee) at the Westminster Palace Hotel during this week to discuss, among other subjects, the question of the Press Laws in India and Egypt, and the influence of Russia on British Policy.

The session which dealt with the Press Laws in India and Egypt, was presided over by Sir Henry Cotton, K.C.S.I. There was a numerous gathering present, which included several Indian and Egyptian gentlemen. Prominent on the platform were Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, the editor of the ill-fated Zamindar of Lahore, Ferid Bey, the Leader of the Egyptian Nationalist Party, and Khwaja Kamal-ud-din, the editor of the Islamic Review which is published in London. Letters of regret for unavoidable absence were received from Mr. Keir Hardie, M. P., and Mr. John Dillon, M. P., and the President of the Egyptian Club at Geneva had wired his best wishes for the success of the Conference, while the International League of Paris was officially represented at the meeting.

Sir Henry Cotton moved the following Resolution from the Chair:—

That this Conference, believing that the free expression of the people's mind through a responsible and independent Press is necessary for the healthy development of a civilised State, demands the repeal of the Indian Press Act of 1910, and the remission of the harsh sentences which have been carried out under its operation.

Furthermore this Conference proposes that a memorial be drawn up appealing to H. H. the Khedive and the Legislative Assembly of Egypt to consider the abolition of the Press Laws of 1881, which have been revived in all their rigour since 1909, and the amnesty of the poets and journalists who have been condemned to imprisonment under these laws.

The Chairman, who was received with a great ovation, on rising to speak, said that he specially welcomed Ferid Bey at their Conference as he has suffered in a good cause. The Press Law of 1910 was undoubtedly passed in India when the authorities were in a state of panic, and it was placed on the Statute Book in spite of active protest on the part of the Indian Members of the Viceroy's Council. It authorises the Executive on their own initiative to take security from the Indian newspapers. The authorities have been taking a more vigorous action during the past two years and last year there was a memorable case, in which Mr. Mohamed Ali, the editor of the Delhi Comrade, carried an appeal to the High Court of Bengal. The Act is so craftily worded and elaborately surrounded in legal expressions that even the High Court decided it was powerless to interfere (cries of "Shame"). There was thus no control whatsoever over the Executive authorities, so that the so-called safeguards did not in reality exist. The most prominent victim of this Anti-Press Crusade was Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, the able editor of the Lahore Daily Zamindar, against whom the Punjab Government had recently proceeded in an unparalleled manner. He reminded the audience that this paper, which had a daily circulation of 27000 copies, was the most widely-read journal in Urdu throughout India and had indeed proved itself an institution in the Moslem world of that country (cheers). This journal had in November last published three articles, which in the mind of the Secretary to the Punjab Government, one of the most acutely sensitive minds in the world (laughter), were of a seditious character. He then quoted a few passages from a recent speech of the Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque, an eminent ex-Member of the Supreme Council and a man who is held in universal esteem and regard among the Hindus and the Mohammedans alike, in which the latter said that, in his opinion, the only fault of the Zamindar was that it was independent and that it expressed its opinion honestly and fearlessly (cheers). The paper also criticised some of the British India, which perhaps was another inexcusable fault (cries of "Served them right"). Mr. Mazharul Haque thought that the Zamindar had become an absolute necessity for the Indian Moslems. He challenged any one to say that the articles were in any way disloyal or seditious. Mr. Mazharul Haque had said how deeply he regretted having been a Member of the Council which passed the Press Act.

The Government of India, continued Sir Henry Cotton, had even lately refused to introduce the necessary safeguards in the Act, notwithstanding Sir Lawrence Jenkin's now-famous judgment. We must have a repeal of the Act (prolonged cheers). No one could honestly say there was any necessity for its retention on the Statute Book. Anarchy in India had nothing to do with the Press. If Indian papers, which were naturally the ordinary channel of communication between the Government and the public, were suppressed and thus no outlet was allowed for the feelings of subject races and nationalities, their utterances would be only driven underground and thus would give rise to such manifestations which we would all deplore (cheers). He could not speak of Egypt from personal knowledge but had no doubt that that country was suffering equally under the existing conditions (cheers).

Mr. Maurice seconded the resolution in a brief but eloquent speech, during which he was visibly overcome with great emotion. His last sentence—"I feel that we have been waiting ever since 1858 for the realisation of the spirit of Queen Victoria's Proclamation"—was cheered to the echo.

Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, in supporting the resolution, said that the whole continent of India was brought under a law which had admittedly failed to differentiate between the guilty and the innocent. The Conference followed with intense interest his sad narrative of "imprisonments and forfeitures." He concluded his speech by suggesting the creation of an "Indian Press Defence League" in London.

The Leader of the Egyptian Nationalist Party, Ferid Bey, who spoke in French, declared that the situation in Egypt had not changed since 1910, when he had last attended the Conference. Since then he had himself undergone long terms of imprisonment (cries of "Shame"). No Nationalist journal was in existence to-day in Egypt as a result of the repressive Press measures. Papers could now only exist by flattery. A mere stroke of the pen from the Minister of the Interior would at once kill a paper ("Shame, shame").

The Resolution was carried unanimously.

Dr. H. Rutherford then moved the next Resolution, which was as follows:—

That this Conference welcomes the proposal to form an Indian Press Defence League, having both British and Indian support, to keep before the Parliament and Public of this country the position of the Indian Press, and to agitate for the repeal of the Press Act of 1910.

In the course of a powerful speech, he declared he had been that afternoon listening with great disgust and humiliation to the moving account of what has been going on in India as regards the horrible treatment meted out to the representative Press of the country. "I feel," said the ex-M. P. with characteristic force, "that the law has been undone by legislation and that the Executive is put above the law." Dr. Rutherford's speech, which made a very deep impression on the Conference, was full of sincerity and stirred the audience to extraordinary enthusiasm. His comparison of the policy of the Government of India with the "methods of General Smuts" roused hearty cheers of approval, which were renewed when shortly afterwards he said "I should like to hear Sir Edward Carson define 'sedition.'"

It was plain that Dr. Rutherford had carried the whole audience with him. "Coercion" he proceeded quietly "has been tried in Ireland and at last the British Government has come to the conclusion that freedom is the best thing for Ireland." The tone of his speech then changed and the speaker's feelings became intense when he continued in all earnestness and with great enthusiasm: "and so it is for India." The audience was spell-bound for the moment but almost immediately the silence was broken by a roar of deafening cheers. The gathering was, of course, cosmopolitan and even the most bitter anti-Home Ruler was heartily cheering these significant words of the speaker: "The Irishman, the Indian and the Egyptian love freedom as much as the Englishman." Mr. W. H. Seed seconded the resolution. He was explaining why it was necessary at present to establish an "Indian Press Defence League," when he was interrupted by the large body of Egyptian gentlemen present, who were anxious to know the reason for thus excluding the Egyptian Press. They were obviously and rightly dissatisfied and demanded an explanation. Murmurs of discontent were audible over the Egyptian benches.

But the speaker was prepared with an excellent answer. This exclusion of Egypt was deliberate and intended, and the reason was not far to seek. Stillness reigned supreme as he proceeded in measured tones: "Because, politically and legally, Egypt is not a Colony of England." His words acted like magic over his interrupters, who received the remark with prolonged cheers. They renewed their applause when he said: "We require totally different weapons to fight the two battles." Everybody appreciated and thoroughly realised the cogency of his reasoning. Mr. Soed proceeded to quote a sentence from the weighty judgment of the Chief Justice of Calcutta—"Mr. Mohan Ali has lost his book but has retained his character." That is the kind of certificate given to an Indian Editor by the highest tribunal in the country and yet, he went on, the High Court was powerless to interfere in the case. He thought an "Indian Press Defence League" in London was essential, by which means they could keep their case constantly before the British Public and in that way only could they secure the repeal of the Press Act, as the British Press, he was sorry to notice, was giving a deaf ear to all their appeals. In due course of time, perhaps, they may be able to publish a paper in England under the auspices of the proposed League.

The meeting passed the Resolution unanimously.

"RUSSIAN INFLUENCE ON BRITISH POLICY."

The evening Session of the Conference, which met on the 16th February, under the Chairmanship of Mr. J. A. Hobson, dealt with the question of "Russian influence on British Policy." Professor E. G. Browne's unavoidable absence, owing to an important engagement at Cambridge, was a matter of general regret.

The Chairman, in his opening address, said that we as Britons offer sympathy to the subject races who are to-day suffering under the high heel of the Russian Government, such as Poland, Finland, Georgia and Persia, though the latter is nominally a free country as yet. Nationality still survives in these oppressed people. He dwelt upon the crushing of Finland by Russia and the strangling of free Persia at the very birth of her freedom. The Government of Russia has power to do more evil in the world than any other single Government. He proceeded to explain why people in England and in any other free country, for the matter of that, could not view the fate of these struggling nationalities with indifference. Nations do not live alone and the absorption of these small States by Russia diminishes the area of freedom for the world, which every free man and woman would deplore. The murder of Persia, for instance, would make it harder for India to rise to independence and self-government (cheers). In his opinion, England was to a very great extent responsible for the "Russian inroads." We shook hands with Russia when her fingers were dripping with the blood of innocent victims. The enthusiastic interchange of visits between England and Russia—of fleets, parliaments and financiers—had encouraged the latter in her bloody campaign of Russification. He felt sure the evil association with Russia would be injurious to ourselves. We would be forced to pay for their liberty in terms of liberty. The cause of nations oppressed by Russia is our cause—it is the cause of humanity (cheers). The sooner we get rid of Russian influence on our policy the better.

Mr. S. H. Swinny proposed the following Resolution:—

That this Conference believes that the influence of the Foreign Office be more definitely used to further the cause of humanity on behalf of Persia, and also for those nations within the Russian Empire whose treaty or national rights are being violated by the dominant Power, as in the case of Poland, Georgia, Poland and Ukraine.

The speaker was anxious to make it clear at the outset that the resolution implied no hostility to the Russian people but was directed against the Government of Russia only. He said that, after having pledged ourselves to retain the independence of Persia as a Sovereign State, it is our urgent and solemn business to protect her integrity (cheers). England, let it be said to her shame, had been a silent partner in all the havoc that Russia had introduced in Persia with such terror and barbarity ("Squams") and he proceeded to give some of the details of the ghastly crimes and wholesale slaughters that had been committed by the Russian Government in Northern Persia. Innocent men, women and children had been done to death and thousands of Persians had been mercilessly butchered in Tabriz. When would Sir Edward Grey move? We have been not only false to Persians but traitors to our own conscience (cheers). The whole world had produced a verdict of "guilty" on England in our dealings with Persia.

Mr. G. H. Perrie seconded the Resolution, which was supported by Mr. W. Tcharkoff and Mr. V. Fedorkowitch.

The Resolution, on being put to the vote, was carried with enthusiasm.

TETE À TETE

We daresay it will take some time for our supporters to grasp fully the situation which we have to face on account of the reduced circulation of The Comrade during the last year. A decrease of about 500 subscribers in 1918 instead of an increase which was the rule before is not a small matter, nor indeed is the still unpaid arrears of Rs. 9,000 in two years a matter which should cause us no anxiety. We have no doubt whatever that our supporters will respond most generously to our appeal, but naturally a few days are not sufficient wherein to judge either justice or generosity. Had it been so their response to our appeal would have been quite unique in character, for during the week ending on the 12th instant only nine fresh subscribers were enlisted and we had to remove the names of no less than fifteen. The net result is a decrease of six! A skillful mathematician is required to compute the means and ages in which we shall secure an increase of 2000 in our circulation at the rate of a decrease of six per week. We hope none of our subscribers will attempt this tremendous task, but that all would undertake the lighter duty of adding a new subscriber within the next few days. We shall also thank them to write to us volunteering their services as our bailiffs so that we may send them lists of defaulters in their neighbourhood. In this litigious country the fact is very well known that to secure a decree may be all the ten points in law but is not even one in fact. A world separates the execution from the decree and "law's delays" are nothing to those of "fact." But our *Qury Ameen*s are made of sterner stuff and we look forward to their making the recovery of nine thousand rupees a nine days' wonder. We trust they will apply to us soon for enlistment, for our rule is going to be "first come, first serve." Need we add the needless proviso, "No defaulter need apply"?

The account which we have given of the enlistments and removals of subscribers for the current week was in type when to-day on the 14th instant we received two letters, one from a subscriber who has expressed great sympathy with us in our difficulties and has sent us the name of a new subscriber, and another from a still more enthusiastic supporter who has sent us four names from a very unpromising district as "some grist to our mill," promising that "more will follow." But what fills us with still greater hope is the offer of his wife to send us, if need be, her jewelry. Much has altered in our Motherland, and not a little for the better. But, good or bad, the spirit of suttee still survives, and although the blazing pyre no more adds a glow to the Indian twilight by rivers' banks, what household is there in India, Hindu or Moslem, in which a suttee or two does not smoulder through life? Glory be to the name of Bantik and our own countryman, Ram Mohan Roy, but a hundred Bantiks and Ram Mohan Roys could not abolish this form of suttee, "Young India," which means chiefly the male of the species, does not show merely signs of a healthy discontent about the condition of Indian womanhood, but also occasionally a disgust which is manfully and born of self-conceit combined with sloth. But if only "Young India," which bases its own superiority over the older generation of Indians on greater self-sacrifice, applied that standard to Indian womanhood, it would stand ashamed before the silent and as it were, matter-of-course daily sacrifices of Indian women. Take the case of those "jewels" which are held ready as a sacrifice for us. How often has not "Young India," sneered at the barbaric display of jewelry by Indian women and condemned the absorbing love of jewels in them? And yet, how often have not these same jewels, so dearly loved by one sex and so greedily desired by the other, been quietly and unconsciously sacrificed cheerfully, been placed in the hands of a husband, a father or a brother to be sent to the pawn-broker's or to the melting pot of the goldsmith, to save the one loved still more dearly in a difficulty or to be squandered away on ceremony or even vice? We thank the dear sister that has volunteered so touchingly to come to our rescue, but such thanks as we can offer is a hopelessly weak expression of what we feel. We, however, trust we shall in some measure succeed in making our aggressively progressive "Young India" realise what jewels of women India possesses, and what a high standard of self-sacrifice Indian womanhood, with all its barbaric display of jewelry and its absorbing love of jewels, has set up for the manhood of India. Indian women have, we fear, such a great deal to learn. But, thank God, they have not to unlearn a quarter yet of what the men of India have learnt not wisely but too well in these days of egotism and advertisement.

We have received from Mirza Abbas Ali Baig Sahab, Member of the Council of the Secretary of State for India the following important and interesting communication and we trust it will set some unfortunate controversies at rest. "It appears that the comments of some of the Urdu papers in India on Khwaja Kamal-ud-din's activities in this country are based on an erroneous conception of their true scope. The enclosed extract from today's issue of the London Times may interest his critics and incline them to adopt a more generous attitude towards him. They will be glad to find on enquiry that the Khwaja's work here is fundamentally non-sectarian and characterized by so transparent a spirit of Islamic catholicity as to attract to the congregations he addresses in London and Woking both Moslems and Christians of all shades of religions and philosophic thought. Had Khwaja Kamal-ud-din's views disclosed any schismatic taint and narrowness or intolerance of outlook, detrimental in the slightest degree to the solidarity of Islam, the Trustees of the Woking Mosque, the Committee of the London Mosque Fund and the Islamic Society, would not have extended to him their confidence and support. It is to be hoped that a progressive and unifying movement against the disruptive tendencies, which in the past have done incalculable harm to the moral and intellectual advancement of Moslems, will receive the encouragement it deserves from all well-wishers and all sections of the community." From our personal knowledge of the Khwaja Sahab and of his work we can support this statement whole-heartedly. We trust he will be generously assisted by all Mussalmans irrespective of their sects. As we go to press we learn with pleasure that two more ladies have embraced Islam, Miss Florence Pell and Mrs. Dutta. The Khwaja Sahab has commenced a series of lectures at Woking itself on Sunday afternoons which are attracting large audiences. It is not one of mere curiosity for more than half the number attend week after week. We rejoice at this and congratulate the Khwaja Sahab.

Under the heading of "Aligarh Ideals" the Pioneer publishes a letter from an anonymous contributor. "Aligarh Ideals." We confess we quake and tremble whenever we find even the name of Aligarh mentioned in the papers nowadays, for it is so frequently mentioned in the course of some foul libel on the Mussalmans of India and particularly on the so-called "Young Moslems." There was a time not so long ago when any mention of Aligarh affairs in these columns revived in the breasts of a particular set of people the desire to deport the editor or kill the paper, and now that we desire above all else that the Mussalmans should be left in peace and their great national College should not be dragged into controversies that have nothing to do with education, we find "Aligarh," like the ubiquitous "Sinle without the Gat" in Alice in Wonderland, everywhere. It is, however, some relief to have to record that the recent contribution on "Aligarh Ideals" is of a different character from the blood-and-thunder libel of Mr. Lovat Fraser, we mean "Asiaatics," in the National Review. But the anonymous author will pardon us if we say that his opinions are exceedingly tantalising. Whenever we begin to think that he will pursue a theme to some conclusion he sets out on the trail of another and equally interesting theme, which is, in its turn, left in an impenetrable covert while the writer follows another scent. For instance, he makes the interesting observation that "a great Frenchman once said that he did not like to see the Monarchy made the prize of a race, and it is almost as sad to see the control of a great institution made the reward of a somewhat ignoble struggle." This made us stand on the tiptoe of expectation and look out for some revelation about the "ignoble struggle." But the theme is pursued no further and we are left to guess whether the writer really knows something of the reality of the parties and cliques of Aligarh or has merely heard in the Club some ill-informed oracle repeating hearsay and laying down the law after the manner of self-sufficient bureaucrats. Later on we are told that "a University especially in its early days wants wise direction, united effort and peace." We do not know who would disagree with such an axiomatic observation; but we are told in the very next sentence that "the leaders of the Moslem world of India perhaps do not realise the difficulties. They pay hurried visits to Europe—some of them do not even think that process necessary—and then they are sure that given necessary rupees everything will follow." This excites our curiosity but keeps it unsatisfied; for it is difficult to guess what Moslem leaders set such a great store by the "necessary rupees" and either "pay hurried visits to Europe" or "do not even think that process necessary." That does not, however, prevent our agreeing whole-heartedly with the observation that "men of a kind can always be got for a certain sum of money, but the right men are not always on the market, and they may not want to come." If this refers, as we think it does, to European tutors, the writer only says that to which we have repeatedly drawn attention. We can never ignore the economic aspect of the question, but money by itself is not a sufficient, nor indeed the main attraction of educational work. Education is notoriously the worst paid profession all the world over; but it is the most highly honoured profession, and while learning attracts learning, ignorance only attracts ignorance.

Another observation of the writer will be read with interest. "Wherever," he writes, "you get English 'Their Own Way.' men together in an institution, they will try to run it; and in nine cases out of ten they will run it well in their own way. But this does not suit Young Islam. They also want to manage what is their own affair, and it is a good sign that they have such a desire and have it strongly." We shall not question the competence of Englishmen to run an institution well in nine cases out of ten, and even Englishmen will not question their desire to run it wherever ten of them happen to get together. But what is so important to remember is that whether they run it well or ill, they will run it "in their own way." Now, it is not only "Young Islam" that wants to manage what is its own, but every progressive section of the people all the world over. In this "Young Islam" is guilty of nothing that is not a universal crime among progressive people. And if "Young India" wants seats in Executive Councils, mixed Committees of officials and non-officials to recommend changes in administration and initiate legislation, and more appointments in the highest grades of the Public Services in India, is "Young Islam" to be denounced for its desire to manage what is peculiarly its own? But that is not all. Whether it is permitted to share in the work of teaching at Aligarh or not, it insists on having the institution run in its own way and not in the way of the almost invariably competent Decemvirs of the English race. For if an essentially Moslem institution is not run in an essentially Moslem way, it is better to sell the place to Government or to some Missionary Society as a going concern and assist Moslem scholars with the funds thus set free. Why will the numerous authorities on Aligarh ideals always forget the main fact about Aligarh that it was the product of an educational revolt of Indian Mussalmans against the educational ideals and methods of a Government openly committed to a policy which has been so inappropriately designated as "undenominational" and of Missionary Societies equally openly committed to Christian "denominationalism." This is not a case of "might have been" nor of memories being mistaken for hopes. The writer need offer no sympathy to the "Young" party and recognise that "Sir Syed's policy made its own continuance very difficult." This was the policy of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, who would place none but Mussalmans on the Board of Trustees. Now, unless we are assured that the Trustees are only a "Committee of Ways and Means" that must provide the "necessary rupees" and have no other work to do, we should like to be told what is the function of a Board of one hundred and twenty Mussalmans chosen from every Province of India except the laying down of the policy on which Aligarh is to be conducted. So long as Indian Mussalmans are not in the position of the Japanese who sent out their best men to Europe and America to qualify themselves for the work of teaching their countrymen and employed them for the purpose on their return to the exclusion of men of all other nationalities, Aligarh would have to rely on the co-operation of English experts. Naturally, it is essential for a cordial co-operation that such experts must be attracted to Aligarh by the offer of good salaries, the companionship of ripe scholars and the honour due to one of the noblest professions in the world. If Mussalmans, whether "Young" or "Old," fail in this, they will fail to get the experts of requisite qualifications. We have always said that an institution which requires martyrs to run it will soon end in being run by cheats. Therefore, the punishment of niggardliness and unfriendly behaviour on the part of Indian Mussalmans would be a total stoppage of the recruitment as tutors of the kind of men without whose assistance Aligarh cannot be run satisfactorily to-day. But here we must add that Government too should not cast greedy eyes on the staffs of private Colleges nor allow an impression to be created that every man who can pick up a quarrel with the managers of such institutions becomes a first charge on the Education Department of the Government in the sacred name of Prestige.

THERE is only one more observation of writer of the letter to the Pioneer to which we shall refer. We fully agree with what H. H. the Begam Saheba of Bhopal said about students and politics and we are sure that Aligarh students even now follow her advice. With Her Highness's excellent and characteristic speeches we propose to deal at length in our next. But the author of the Pioneer letter has evidently failed to grasp both the meaning of Her Highness's advice and the significance of the interest taken by "Young Islam" in Aligarh. He writes "the warning of H. H. the Begam of Bhopal, that politics should be left outside, is significant. But can they be left outside? The fact is that "Mohamedans are strongly and rightly political now. The most important public they have, so far as influence and decision go, is the student public; just as it is in the case of the Hindus. He who leads the students leads either community, tomorrow if not to-day. And while the educated body is so small this must be so and it is folly to shut our eyes to the fact. The politicians appeal to the students and the student—well he doesn't mind being appealed to." Now, Aligarh is and has always been the nursery of the future leaders of the Moslem community. It is and has always been, like Oxford, a microcosm of national life. It thinks to-day what Moslem India must inevitably think a year or two later, and it thinks with all the energy and intensity of youth. Whensoever the heaven may come, it is bound to ferment readily, and Aligarh must always distribute the forces, social, religious and political, throughout Moslem India. But it is not the happy hunting ground of would-be political leaders in quest of a following. It is the duty of the leaders of Moslem thought, social, religious and political, to see that the forces which it is the function of Aligarh to distribute must be beneficent and not otherwise, and that the heaven which makes Aligarh ferment so readily must be the very best. But, whether it is social, religious or political, it must be of an academic character, and an Aligarh undergraduate should no more be encouraged to leave his work as a student in order to swell the audience at political meetings or lengthen out political processions than to preach at street corners on temperance or wrangle with missionaries in the marketplace on the doctrine of Atonement or the Transmigration of Souls. The best men in Moslem India must address their appeals to the student, in order to improve him and furnish him with right ideals, and he, well, he must not only not mind but must welcome such appeals. But he who appeals to the student as a prospective disciple in religion or follower in politics abuses a trust and should not be allowed anywhere within a four-mile radius of the College. And if the politician is wise he will himself refrain from such tactics. He who plucks the unripe fruit must expect to find it sour. No one outside a still powerful act at Aligarh has tried to "capture" the student, but the result even in that case has been a dismal failure. The Aligarh undergraduate is shrewd enough to fight shy of artificial affection and knows only too well what some people older than he is have not yet realized.

نه نسيم كي ضرورت نه ننگه كي حاجت

نہیں جز دل کی توسل کوئی دل آئی میں

(There is neither need of smiles nor of bewitching glances. A heart needs no intermediary to capture a heart.) Aligarh, as the writer of the Pioneer letter says, is after all the most interesting educational institution in India, and if only—and we supply the words left out by the writer—it is left in peace by officialdom, it would go on as well as its true well-wishers ever thought and hoped. It is the heart of Moslem India, and he who would capture the heart of Moslem India must capture the heart of Aligarh. The rest is only too easy.

The Comrade.

Rewards and their Results.

It is seldom that we comment on the proceedings or results of criminal trials of any sort, even though they be connected with allegations of sedition. Such of our readers as have a taste for sensations can always satisfy their appetite by feeding on the accounts published at great length by our daily contemporaries. On one or two occasions when we have departed from this rule it has been because of special features in the cases, and no one will deny that the McCormick case, of which we are still hearing the echo, and the Cownpore Mosque case were out of the ordinary run of criminal cases.

We must confess we lacked even the ordinary curiosity of the "man in the street" in the case which had for some time been going on in the Presidency Magistrate's court and subsequently in the High Court of Calcutta in which Nirnal Kanto Roy was charged with the murder of Inspector Nripendra Nath Ghose, abettor of that charge, murder of Ananta Teli, and culpable homicide not amounting to murder in respect of Ananta Teli.

It is very unlikely that we would have been roused from our stupor even by the result of the High Court trial were it not for the circumstance that an extraordinary incident took place some six weeks ago in connection with this case on which our esteemed contemporary the Pioneer commented as follows:—"Every one," wrote the Pioneer, "who likes to see Government do the right thing will be pleased to read the account of the police parade on the Calcutta Maidan on Monday at which, Lord and Lady Carmichael being present, Sir Frederick Halliday distributed rewards to those who had been instrumental in the capture of the murderer of Inspector Nripendra Nath Ghose. Four Constables and two townspeople who seized the man and wrested away his revolver received a present of Rs. 750, and three others who assisted smaller sums. The rewards are not only liberal in themselves but they will gain enormously in value by the promptitude and the impressive manner of their bestowal. In a remarkable speech the Commissioner of Police drove home the significance of the occasion to his audience. . . . Nothing could be better calculated to encourage the Police at this trying season than such a speech."

The italics, we hasten to point out, are ours, but the trial by journalism is entirely the Pioneer's. Fortunately for the accused, unlike the United Provinces, they have a trial by jury in Bengal instead of a trial by journalism, and the result of this other trial was that the jury returned on the 11th March a unanimous verdict on the two charges of the murder of Inspector Nripendra Nath Ghose and of Ananta Teli, on which a verdict of acquittal would be recorded.

It is true that on the minor counts of abetment of murder and of culpable homicide not amounting to murder the verdict of the jury was not unanimous, the disagreement being in the proportion of 5 to 4.

A reference to the proceedings shows that according to the case for the defence, argued with characteristic brilliance and eloquence by Mr. Eardly Norton, not one of the three bullets alleged by the Crown to have been fired at Inspector Ghose and found in his body was fired from the pistol alleged to have been so gallantly wrested away from the accused by those whom the Commissioner of Police had rewarded, for the simple reason that the bullets extracted from the Inspector's body were 360 bullets which weigh 134 grains, while the weight of a bullet in a 450 calibre pistol such as was, we presume, alleged to have been wrested away from the accused is 225 grains. That evidently was conclusive evidence as regards the charge of murder of Inspector Nripendra Nath Ghose on which the Pioneer had given its deliberate verdict of guilty as early as on the 28th January last.

As regards the charge of shooting Ananta Teli, Mr. Norton based the defence, among other things, on the facts that the pistol alleged to have been wrested from the accused contained two exploded cartridges, that as three and only three shots were positively alleged by the witnesses for the Crown to have been fired at Inspector Ghose for each of which there was a 360 bullet—such as could not have been fired from a 450 pistol—in the deceased Inspector's body, and as only one exploded cartridge could be accounted for by the shooting of the boy Ananta Teli, the Crown could not explain the second exploded cartridge in the pistol. Moreover, the jury were told, according to Mr. Norton with the "insuperable difficulty" that the accused fired the first exploded cartridge, he could not have "fired the second exploded cartridge, because between the two there was a cartridge still loaded." He also argued at great length about absence of evidence about the wresting away of the revolver from the accused in the earlier stages of the police inquiry.

Mr. Norton submitted to the jury that "this revolver was put into my client's hands." "That followed logically," said Mr. Norton, "as might followed day. The case for the prosecution was that 'the accused had this revolver in his hand at the Sova Bazar crossing, 'in Chitpore Road and all the devious lanes and streets through which 'he was alleged to have run, and that he was caught red-handed 'with this revolver in his hand in Masjid Bari Street. The story, 'however, has been contradicted and demolished by the evidence of the 'revolver itself. It had been suggested by the prosecution 'that this revolver jumped frightfully, . . . and all that I would 'say in connection with that was that the Oxford and Cambridge 'sports were not in it with this revolver.' Mr. Norton said that his client complained that he was robbed in Masjid Bari Street of his watch, a ring and his money. It was impossible, he said, under the circumstance for his client to call evidence to prove what he was doing there. The accused was in the hands of the police. His case was that he was seized and robbed by goondas in Masjid Bari Street and the crowd reached with the police after he had been caught. "In this country," said Mr. Norton, "the accused could not go into the box and testify in his own favour. In England it was different; but here the law would not allow the accused to give evidence. The accused was the sole man who could speak in his own defence, but the law said 'You cannot,' and the Crown said, 'Hang him.'"

We do not know what the jury thought of each argument on the side of the defence, but it is certain that it unanimously declared the accused not guilty of the murders of Inspector Ghose and Ananta Teli, and even on the minor charges disagreed in the proportion of 5 to 4. The discussion of forty minutes had resulted in such a difference of opinion, which according to the Foreman of the jury, was "on a vital point which seems to affect the whole case," so that a second retirement for ten minutes showed that the jurors were still divided on the minor charges in the same proportion.

A fresh trial on these charges has, therefore, been ordered; but it is worth asking whether this result has justified the rewards which, according to the Allahabad Oracle, were not only liberal in themselves but which had gained enormously in value "by the promptitude and the impressive manner of their bestowal." Surely the results of such "promptitude" seem now to be far from "impressive."

We were told by the Pioneer that the Police Commissioner's speech on the occasion of the reward-giving parade was "remarkable" and that it "drove home the significance of the occasion to his audience." It was also stated that "nothing could be better calculated to encourage the police at this trying season." Well, a hardly less remarkable speech was made by Mr. Norton a few days ago in the course of his defence of the accused, and we hope and trust that the result of the trial will drive home the "significance of the occasion" to the world at large, including the Calcutta Police Commissioner. Nothing could be better calculated to discourage the police in certain regrettable tendencies, but we hope the result of Mr. Norton's brilliant defence would offer at least some slight hope to the accused "at this trying season." We offer no apology for giving a very long extract from Mr. Norton's speech, for it is its own justification. Mr. Norton said:—

Mr. Mitter has done great injustice to me by saying that I hinted or insinuated, or wished to hint or insinuate, that these rewards were given by the government or the Commissioner of Police as bribes. I never said so and I never intended to say so, and I did not even think so. If I even thought so I would not have hesitated for a minute to make a remark, even with regard to the Commissioner of Police, and nothing would have made me shrink from my duty if there was any evidence. I am quite willing to admit that this was done with an honest intention by the Government. I am quite willing to admit that the Commissioner of Police, being an English gentleman, would not stoop to bribe a witness. It never was my intention to suggest that in cross-examination. I cross-examined for a different purpose. It was for the purpose of showing that all these witnesses had received their rewards as having captured the murderer of the Inspector at a time when my client was lying under commitment in the Police Court and had publicly proclaimed his innocence. I say the whole of the transaction was a gross travesty of justice, I say that never within living memory has there ever been a grosser contempt of court. Here was a man protesting his innocence, and he was entitled by all the laws of England to a fair, just, and impartial trial. What was the idea of calling a public parade and asking his Excellency the Governor to preside, when the object of the parade was to declare to the world, as was done that morning, that these police officers and others were being rewarded because they had captured the murderer of the Inspector. That is the very issue that you have been called upon to try to-day. I do not want to make the case uglier or more infamous than it is against the Government as it stands. I say this, and I will maintain this to my dying day, that a more injudicious exhibition of official power has never been displayed before inside the four corners of this Presidency, and while this man, my client, was proclaiming his right to be tried as an innocent person. I do not say that it was done intentionally, but to attend that parade, to take this photograph, and to proclaim that this boy was a murderer, and that these men were being rewarded because they had captured him was to trespass upon one of the greatest and most essential principles of English law. This is how far I intended to carry, but it has another further consequence of an equally lamentable character because the accused was under trial. Who knows what effect it has had on the minds of some of you, and if it has had some effect on you, who knows what difficulties I shall have to contend against to remove any impression that might have been caused by such an unwarrantable practice as this. I suggest that the commonest civility should have made the Commissioner of Police wait till the termination of this case before he rewarded these men in public on the plea that they had captured the murderer of the Inspector. There was no need for haste. Their bravery would have waited to be rewarded afterwards, till the conclusion of this case. At any rate, my client would not have been prejudiced in this manner. The accused would have been free from the stigma which has been thrown upon him and the suspicion of the Commissioner of Police and the Government must prevent him having a fair trial as he was in the eyes of the Government a murderer. It has also another effect. Here you are going to pay large sums of money to witnesses of the class of those who have given evidence in this case, and to policemen who are illiterate and who owe all that they have to the generosity of the Government for the services they offer to the Crown. Do you think you will make it less difficult for these men to speak the truth? I do not wish to suggest that the Government bribed these men to tell lies, but do you think you would make it easier for them to speak the truth by paying them large sums of money? Do you not bind them to yourself by a strong bond of misplaced loyalty and gratitude? I say that you do. Look at it from whatever standpoint you like; the whole proceeding was illegitimate and unjust and improper and I was surprised to hear my learned friend Mr. Mitter justifying it from first to last. Now it has had a twofold consequence upon this unhappy boy, and I am entitled to put it to you that in the first place it has raised a mass of prejudice against him which my poor efforts may be absolutely unavailing to break down, and secondly it has stiffened up these witnesses, who with the payment in their pockets would give evidence for the Crown and try to defeat justice by denying everything in cross-examination that is put to them. These are serious embarrassments and I am bound to say that it has created a prejudice between my client and his safety, and I am entitled to comment upon it. I ask you to recollect that every police officer Ram Bhujan, Delhi Goala, Radha Shyam Singh, Abdul Gaffur and all of those who have received a reward of Rs. 750, are to that extent labouring under a disqualification which it would be difficult to remove.

This is not the first time that the Police has been publicly commended and even rewarded in a manner which appeared to prejudice the defence in a case sub judice at the time, but we hope that, having availed himself of the opportunity that at last offered itself in this case, Mr. Norton has succeeded in making it the last bad precedent. If so, not only will the public owe much to him, but, to use the words of our Allahabad contemporary, nothing could be better calculated to encourage the police to rely on their own honest and strenuous efforts for acquiring a better reputation for detective work. It is no use for the Police to depend on reward-giving parades for its reputation and to neglect for some days such obvious matters as the difference in bores between the revolvers alleged to have been used in a case of double murder. As for Government, surely its credit is not so low with its Police Force that the price of honest and gallant service must be tendered before honesty and gallantry could even be tested. The Indian Army is paid none too lavishly, and yet far more honest and gallant service is rendered by it—and long may it continue to be rendered—while everybody must have heard of war medals being awarded to the troops long after some of the men had passed out of this world un—"honoured" though not unworried. That proves that there are enough honest and gallant men in India, but the way to discover them and to preserve their honesty and gallantry is not to appeal to less lofty motives by parading rewards before having an opportunity to parade the results.

The Price of Peace.

Mr. Asquith's remarkable speech in introducing the Second Reading of the Home Rule Bill marks a new stage in the efforts of the Liberal Government towards the settlement of the historic Irish question. It is a clear, frank and impressive statement of the policy which the Government has been forced to adopt as a very grudging concession to Carsonism and militant Ulsterism. Mr. Asquith does not disguise it from himself that he has been driven into a course which is opposed alike to his political faith and his judgment. But the grim and gaunt ghosts which the Ulster fanatics had summoned from the vasty deeps of religious hate and secular pride and intolerance threatened Ireland with chaos and had to be laid to rest. The exclusion of the Ulster counties from the scope of the Home Rule measure, ostensibly for a period of six years, which the Liberal Government is now willing to concede, is, as Mr. Asquith said, the price of peace. The threat of civil war has succeeded in its aim. The compromise, the eternal curse—or—glory of British politics has triumphed over logic and principle and paved the way for a final settlement. The danger of civil strife has virtually passed. And though the taste for mock-heroics which the Ulsterites have acquired in the course of a year may yet continue to show itself through tall and lusty phrases for a while, the martial hordes of "General" Carson seem already flitting off the stage to take up their old, peaceful, though less showy roles and the right of rebellion no longer needs to go through the extreme physical test.

The settlement of the old Irish question is now definitely within sight. There may be a few more alarms and excursions through which the Tories may vent their wrath and chagrin, but Carsonism has ceased to be an incalculable terror now. Whether the provisional features of the settlement will grow permanent, and Ulster remain a separate administrative unit is not a question of vital importance at this stage. The main thing is that Ireland's dream of Home Rule is about to be realised after the travail of effort of centuries. What this effort has signified in British history we need not pause to consider. It is enough to remember that the bulk of the Irish people have in all stages of their connection with Great Britain been keenly alive to a sense of their national individuality. Their language, old history, religion, and culture have always combined to keep their national spirit indestructible. Their united efforts had always been directed towards the attainment of self-government, and they have submitted to sacrifices in their tenacious loyalty to the ideal which in the aggregate are little short of the heroic. Their struggle as a race has few parallels in history. Through conflicts, reverses and utter defeats, through periods of intense suffering, agony and moral exhaustion, their courage has never failed and their intense national sentiment has cried resolutely aloud for self-realisation. One of the most powerful parties in British politics had early branded their demand as rank treason. But British Liberalism has throughout been a faithful champion of Irish nationalism and cheerfully shared the misfortunes which the latter had uniformly had to suffer before the present Liberal Government came into power. Gladstone's herculean efforts to embody the natural Irish Nationalist aspirations in some form of Home Rule were wrecked twice after fierce struggles, and when his second Home Rule Bill was rejected it seemed as if the deep-seated and obstinate suspicions of Toryism would always prove too devastating a force for the success of the Irish cause. The shattered ranks of Liberalism, however, recovered their strength after many years, and in the meantime Irish Nationalism had gained still more in force and cogency. When the Liberals came into office after ploughing the sands of Opposition for upwards of a decade, the settlement of the Irish question was announced to be one of their foremost tasks. They had not, however, forgotten their one great handicap in the shape of the Lords' veto to all effective Liberal legislation. After a long and fierce struggle the House of Lords was first shorn of its powers and thus the way was cleared for important Liberal measures. The Home Rule Bill came to be introduced in due course.

It became manifest soon after the debate over the first reading of the Bill that the Tory opposition, though it roared with all the ferocity of time-honoured invective and abuse, had in reality lost its old fire and energy of conviction. But the campaign had to be undertaken with every brave show of passion and outraged feelings in the interest of the party game. The Tories were in sad need of a rallying cry. The Tariff Reform propaganda had fallen flat, and no other cry seemed to be available that could whip up enough enthusiasm in the Tory rank and file. And Home Rule cries had done splendid service in the past. Passionate memories thickly clustered round them and they were replete with accents that could be trusted to rekindle the old pugnacity if iterated with sufficient force. Accordingly the Tory leaders set to work. It is, however, a curious fact that the challenge of Unionism found every feeble echoes in Great Britain. The masses in England and Scotland could no longer endure the boredom of having to discuss perpetually how Ireland was to be governed. But Ulster was still in Ireland herself, with its powerful Protestant minority and its landlords and it could be trusted to save the situation. So Ulster became the centre of the fight, the cry of despairing Unionism and the manœuvring ground of its infuriated champions. Ulster was set up to defy Great Britain and the rest of Ireland. Carsonism came to birth with its solemn covenants and its volunteers who declared themselves ready to fight against His Majesty's forces if Parliament passed and enforced the Home Rule measure. The whole thing seemed at first a joke and a farce as it actually was. We are sure even Sir Edward Carson did not in his early drills and parades take himself seriously. He was simply organising a vast threat to disconcert the Liberals and more particularly to stick out a peg by which the disintegrated Tory forces could hang together. But the joke soon grew into something earnest and grim. A defiant Ulster with a resolutely set purpose rose out of the artificial agitation. We do not know with what feelings the Tory firebrands looked on this terrible weapon which would certainly smash them if they hesitated to use it against the King, the Parliament and the nation as a whole. It was in this dread situation that the most reverent upholders of established authority and the Constitution lighted on "the-right-of-rebellion" argument. This desperate doctrine with all its implications has travelled and been studied far beyond the British Isles, and we should like to hear what Sir Edward Carson and his Tory henchmen will have to say when it comes home to roost.

The threat of Ulster soon grew into a real danger, and the Liberal Government slowly but inevitably began to feel that it will have to modify its original Home Rule measure if the calamity of a civil war was to be averted. Serious and responsible men on both sides began to talk of the virtues of settlement by consent. Proposals for a conference of Liberal and Tory leaders became general, but Mr. Asquith was rightly opposed to the idea, for in the absence of a common basis for discussion any such conference must have been abortive. The Tory opposition to the Irish Home Rule Bill was not simply based on its organic features and form; it was based on the principle itself. According to the Tory attitude Ireland not only did not want Home Rule, but also it should never be granted Home Rule even if it cried for it with one united voice. The Ulster agitation was primarily directed to wreck the measure; "the rights and interests of minority" were tacked on to it only to make it look legitimate and respectable. The idea of a conference was naturally derided in responsible Liberal quarters. There were "informal conversations" among the Party leaders, but they led to no tangible results. The Government saw the danger and decided to formulate its own proposals which while intended to conciliate Ulster would not interfere with the basic principle of the measure. At the opening of Parliament Mr. Asquith announced that he would soon lay the Government proposals before the House. These proposals have now been definitely submitted, and it is difficult to conceive that the Government could go further in its desire to meet the Opposition in a conciliatory spirit without destroying the principle of the Bill. Mr. Asquith's proposals amount to the offer of a free choice to the Ulster counties between an exclusion from or incorporation in the area to be administered according to the Bill by an Irish Executive responsible to an Irish Legislature. The exclusion period will last for six years, the excluded counties "would come in after six years, unless the Imperial Government determined otherwise." According to Reuter, an impression prevails in the Lobby that a great advance has been made towards a settlement of the Home Rule question and that the menace of civil war has certainly disappeared. The discussion in the Commons "is not accepted as conclusive, and the position is admittedly difficult, but it is hoped that a further debate will lead to a compromise." The Opposition is now trying to fasten on some point which might serve to prolong the struggle, but in their failure to find such a point they are driven to take up such broken reeds as "the period of exclusion, which they say is too short." The fact is that the Tory leaders have been completely nonplussed. The wind has been taken out of their sails. The Home Rule battle is practically over. Ulster wanted separation, union with Great Britain and "clean out" from the rest of Ireland. It has been taken at its own words and given the option to accept either alternative. We await further developments on the Tory side with some curiosity. The Liberal Government has so far handled the situation with great adroitness and resource and they are now within a measurable distance of their goal. They have piloted a difficult measure through the House of Commons and it will be to their lasting glory when it is permanently placed on the Statute Book. A great historic wrong would be righted. Nationalisms in every country would derive wholesome inspiration from the Irish example, although the ideals of Ireland have taken many toiling generations to fructify.

Verse.

The Path to Heaven.

Disowning claims of kindred and of clime,
 My errant thoughts did wander far from home
 And in all lands beneath heaven's starry dome
 I saw my country; oft on wings sublime
 Of Fancy borne, which neither space nor time
 Could stay, my daring spirit sought to roam
 Beyond the earth. But when the mystic toms
 Of nature showed her record since the prime Of Man's creation, and I paused to scan
 That baffling mystery—the soul of man,
 I learnt that of the immortal yearnings given,
 To realise the promise of her birth,
 The path lies oft through th' humblest things on earth,
 Through commonest duties, reaching up to Heaven!

NIRANJAN JANA.

The King's Real Speech.

What his Majesty Would Like to have Said.

At the time of going to Press, we have not seen the King's Speech, with which Parliament will have been officially opened on Tuesday; but we print below what his Majesty would have liked his Ministers to let him say, Here it is:—

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,—

My relations with all foreign powers continue to be of the most friendly and cordial character; but notwithstanding this satisfactory state of affairs, I require several more battleships of the latest and most formidable type, and a much larger Force for Home Defence, being satisfied that the friendship of my continental neighbours will ripen in proportion to the strength of my armaments.

I am sorry that my Canadian Dominion did not ratify the provisional promise made by its Prime Minister of the gift of two 'Dreadnoughts' to my Navy. In view, however, of the cosmopolitan character of the Canadian population the defeat of the suggestion is not a matter for surprise, there having been evidences amongst it, for some time past, of a growing spirit of independence towards the Mother Country, and of a tendency to closer alliance with the neighbouring States of the American Republic. In these circumstances, my Ministers are to be congratulated upon their foresight in not having acceded to the suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition of a vote of thanks to the Dominion for the two ships. Whilst on the subject of Canada, I desire to express sympathy with the large number of my poorer subjects who have been inveigled by specious misrepresentations of Canadian Emigration Agents into leaving my shores, only to find themselves in a worse plight on arrival in the already overcrowded labour market of the Dominion.

I regret the Industrial disturbances which have recently occurred in South Africa, and that they should have led to the necessity, in the opinion of the Union Government, to deport a body of British subjects from the Colony. Such a step should, in the opinion of my Ministers, have been taken only as a last resource, and then not until after consultation with my Governor-General, and, through him, with the Home Government, which in any case should have been consulted before the individuals in question were shipped to England. Whilst fully recognising the autonomy of the South African Union, its Government must ever bear in mind the fact that it rests upon the unstable foundation of military conquest, and that for many years to come its policy should be dictated by a vigilant regard to the susceptibilities to the British race.

The condition of affairs in my Indian Empire gives cause for some uneasiness, and I regret that certain of my faithful Commons, when visiting its shores, at times display a lack of appreciation of the delicacy of the thread which binds many millions of the coloured races to my sway and which may at any time snap as the result of injudicious utterances on the part of public men. It is my earnest desire to extend to all the natives as far as is practicable the blessings of freedom, but I am convinced that before they are fit to enjoy the rights and privileges of Western civilisation, they must pass through a natural process of human evolution.

I deplore the present conditions of affairs in Ireland. Whilst satisfied that my Ministers are genuinely desirous of removing the fundamental cause of the long standing dissatisfaction on the part of the majority or the Irish people with the existing system of government, I regret that in formulating their measures with this object in view they did not take sufficiently into account the sentiments of the Protestant population of North-East Ulster, and that it has been only as the result of armed demonstration by that section of my people that the true situation has been realised. I cannot believe that, menaced as my Empire is by so many outside dangers, you will fail me in finding an amicable and honourable solution of the present deadlock. If a substantial portion of the Irish people are satisfied to remain under my present rule, it would appear both unfair and impolitic to force any change upon them; whilst on the other hand the time has undoubtedly arrived when a great effort should be made to recognise that unsatisfied sentiment of nationality—on the part mainly of the Catholic population—which has so long been a factor of discord in the internal politics of the United Kingdom. Between these two extremes I am convinced the resources of wise and patriotic statesmanship will not fail to find a compromise. If necessary, a period of further delay must be allowed, to admit of honest effort for a settlement, and, to that end, I shall not hesitate to suspend my assent to the measure now before Parliament should it be sent to me at an early date. My first duty is to avoid civil war within my own dominions.

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,—

Estimates will be laid before you in due course for the expenses of the various public services. I regret that the provocative and unjustifiable naval ambition of certain foreign Powers renders necessary a large addition to the naval strength of the Empire. The only alternative to this course would appear to be for my Government to intimate at once to such Powers that in the view of Great Britain their legitimate requirements do not demand any expansion of their naval resources, and to request that in the interests of international peace no further augmentation should occur. I am satisfied that such a representation, supported as it would be by whatever personal influence my own House is capable of exercising with other reigning dynasties, would have the effect of ending the present disastrous race in naval armaments and of liberating for profitable employment vast sums of money now employed on wasteful and unproductive purposes.

The Army, too, will entail heavy demands upon the public purse. My vast possessions render necessary a perpetual drain upon the regular forces, and if Great Britain is to be immune from danger it is of urgent importance that the Home Defence should be strengthened.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,—

The following Bills will be submitted to you:—

A Bill to compel every boy who receives free education to join the Territorial Force, thus repaying the State for the benefits he has received.

A Bill to compel Bankers to disclose all dormant balances and unclaimed securities in their possession and to hand the same over to the Public Trustee.

A Bill to tax Betting, Stock and Share Speculations, Advertisements, theatre tickets and bachelors.

A Bill for the reorganisation of the Board of Trade, the removal of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the speaker of the Irish Parliament from its membership, and the setting up of a Tariff Committee to prevent the abuse of the freedom of British ports.

A Bill to provide that in future the President of the Board of Trade shall be a person of commercial training and experience; the President of the Board of Agriculture, an Agriculturist; The Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Financier; the First Lord of the Admiralty, a Sailor; and the Minister for War, a Soldier.

In conclusion, I rejoice to observe signs of a sower conception of government on the part of my people. It is gradually becoming recognised that Parliament should be the Business Committee of the Empire.

Now Get to Work.—John Bull.

The India Office and Mr. Montague.

MR. RICHARD BURBIDGE, the head of Harrods mammoth stores in Brompton, has been writing to the Daily Mail to protest against the constant changes of Postmaster-General, of which the latest has just been announced. He observes that the office, "which involves the control of an industry bringing in receipts of over thirty-two millions and the management of some 300,000 employees, is a highly technical business demanding great knowledge and experience."

It is a pity that Mr. Burbidge has no time to look outside the circumference of his immediate business circle. For every word he writes about the Postmaster-General can be applied with still greater force to the Under-Secretary of State for India. This office, even more than the other, "is regarded as a mere trial ground for young and promising politicians." Since the Liberal party came into office in December, 1905, there have been five Under-Secretaries for India:—

Mr. John E. Ellis (December, 1905-December, 1906).

Mr. C. E. H. Hobhouse (January, 1907-April, 1908).

Mr. T. R. Buchanan (April, 1908-June, 1909).

The Master of Elibank (June, 1909-February, 1910).

Hon. E. S. Montague (February, 1910-February, 1914).

It will be said that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and Mr. Asquith have done nothing worse than act in accordance with precedent: and, indeed, that is true. For here is the record of the previous Conservative administration:—

The Earl Onslow (1895-1900).

The Earl of Hardwicke (1900-1902).

Earl Percy (1902-1903).

The Earl of Hardwicke (1903-1904).

The Marquess of Bath (January-December, 1905).

Two wrongs do not, however, make a right: and, if we are to apportion blame, there is at least this to be said for Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour, that their two Secretaries for State, Lord George Hamilton and Mr. Brodrick, sat throughout in the House of Commons. Lord Morley, on the other hand, took the earliest opportunity of removing the office to the House of Lords, where it has remained ever since : and it is this fact which renders the personality of the Under-Secretary with such importance under present circumstances. Before Mr. Montague came upon the scene in February, 1910, his four predecessors averaged just about a year in office apiece. Sultan after Sultan abode his destined hour and went his way.

Mr. Montague has succeeded in establishing a different record. He has on four separate occasions "explained" the Indian Budget statement to the House of Commons : and -beginning badly in July, 1910, with a violent and wholly misdirected onslaught on Mr. Mackarnese, has steadily improved until it has become no exaggeration to say that he has won the confidence both of the House of Commons and of the Indian reformer. It is true that there has always been a tendency to be didactic. There was too much of the pontifex maximus about him, and he was inclined to be unduly patronising. But these faults may readily be forgiven in view of the breath of fresh air which he has brought into the official handling of Indian questions in Parliament. We fancy he was immensely relieved when the advent of Lord Crewe gave him a wider scope for his ability than the mere alternation of Liberal commonplaces with a defence of illiberal methods of repression. When he was given his head he took it. No Under-Secretary, we venture to say, has ever infused so much of the fresh air of Liberalism into the stuffy-bureaucratic atmosphere of the India Office. Year by year he has committed them beyond hope of recall to a growing breadth of outlook and a sympathetic appreciation of the ambition of the educated Indian to have a real share in the government of the country. His visit to India had, it was hoped, placed the seal upon his labours : for he would now be able to confront the Struldbrugg of the India Council with the results of an examination of modern Indian conditions freshly made on the spot.

Dis aliter visum. He has been caught up in the Ministerial merry-go-round : and has been chosen to succeed Mr. Masterman as Financial Secretary to the Treasury. In fullness of time he will, no doubt, enter the Cabinet : for his new office is the recognised waiting-room : and that is the only consolation that can be extracted from his promotion. We think he will make an excellent Secretary of State for India : and we hope that he will eventually be found in that post, and that for once in a way previous knowledge and experience will not be held to constitute a bar insuperable.

The New Under Secretary.

To the new Under-Secretary, Mr. C. H. Roberts, who has been Liberal member for Lincoln since 1906, we offer a cordial welcome. His interest in India has almost entirely manifested itself hitherto in temperance matters. He was a member of the deputation which waited upon Lord Crewe in July, 1912, in connexion with the question of Excise administration in India : and moved an amendment on the Indian Budget statement in August of the same year, which dealt both with that subject and with the opium traffic. He is married to a daughter of Lady Carlisle, and is the brother-in-law of Professor Gilbert Murray, the Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford, whose sympathy with Indian reformers is well known. In his early days he was a don at Exeter College, Oxford, and both then and as an undergraduate at Balliol, made no secret of his uncompromising Radicalism. We hope that he will carry some of it into the performance of his new duties. He has not previously held office as a Minister, but when presiding over the Parliamentary Committee last year which enquired into the Putumayo rubber scandals, he exhibited a businesslike capacity and a determination to get at the facts which augurs well for the future.

Press Laws in India and Egypt.

Conference at the Westminster Palace Hotel.

(SPECIAL REPORT FOR "INDIA.")

A CONFERENCE called by the Nationalities and Subject Races Committee was opened at the Westminster Palace Hotel on Monday afternoon last (February 16), when the Press Laws in India and Egypt were discussed. There was a good attendance.

Sir Henry Cotton presided, and in the absence of Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P., who, with Mr. John Dillon, M.P., was detained at the House of Commons, moved the following resolution :—

That this conference, believing that the free expression of the people's mind through a responsible and independent Press is necessary for the healthy development of a civilised State, demands the repeal of the Indian Press Act of 1910 and the remission of the harsh sentences which have been carried out under its operation. This conference, furthermore, proposes that a memorial be drawn up appealing to H. H. the Khedive and the Legislative Assembly of Egypt to consider the abolition of the Press Laws of 1881, which have been revived in all their rigour since 1909, and the amnesty of the poets and journalists who have been condemned to imprisonment under those laws.

SPEECH BY SIR HENRY COTTON.

In the course of his speech, Sir Henry Cotton, while welcoming Ferid Bey as one who had rendered signal service to the cause of free speech in Egypt, said that he should address himself principally to the Indian aspect of the question. The Press Act in India was passed in 1910, at a time of considerable panic, and it was a law of most drastic character. It authorised the executive to take security from newspapers and to forfeit that security, and then again to raise the security and forfeit it once more, and ultimately to seize and confiscate the press itself. He need hardly say that if any newspaper were to stimulate the community to acts of violence, whether against any section of the community or against the Government, it would be reasonable for the Government to take measures to punish the offending editor. That, however, was not the kind of case with which they were dealing at the present moment, and he only mentioned the matter to guard themselves against any such misapprehension of their attitude that afternoon. What they protested against was promiscuous interference with the liberty of the Press—(applause)—in its freedom of utterance, and its criticism of public measures. There had been one remarkable case during the past year in which the editor of a newspaper, Mr. Mohamed Ali, whom many of them must have met during his recent visit to England, carried an appeal against the action of the Executive Government to the High Court at Calcutta. The result had been the delivery of a memorable judgment by Sir Lawrence Jenkins, the Chief Justice of Bengal. Notwithstanding the provisions of the Act, which they were assured at the time were deliberately and intentionally inserted in order to afford safeguards and protection to newspaper interests, that judgment had established that the Act had been so craftily worded, so elaborately and minutely expressed, as to obliterate these safeguards and protections, so that the High Court was powerless to interfere. Since then the Government had acted very freely in suppressing newspapers, and the latest victim was present that afternoon on the platform. (Cheers.) Mr. Zafar Ali Khan was the editor of the Zamindar, a weekly newspaper published at Lahore. The Government of the Punjab had taken action against him by forfeiting the security of Rs. 10,000 which they had demanded from him, and had also confiscated his press. The Zamindar was printed in the Persian character and would not be widely read among Europeans, but it was very popular with the Mohammedans of the Punjab. He (Sir Henry Cotton) had no doubt that the articles which had appeared in that paper might have offended the mind of a Secretary to Government—one of the most acutely sensitive minds in the world—(laughter)—because it had ventured to criticise and comment upon the action of a Lieutenant-Governor and even to doubt the wisdom of the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister. (Laughter.) A paper which did that would do anything, and so executive action must be taken to suppress it and to destroy the livelihood of the editor. He had not read the offending articles himself, but they thought it would be of interest if he quoted the opinions expressed with regard to them by an Indian gentleman of distinction in a speech lately made at Patna. Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque, the gentleman in question, was a member of the Viceroy's Legislative Council when the Press Act was passed into law. He told his audience that he knew something about the Zamindar and its editor, and had been to the office of the paper and seen the press. The only fault of the Zamindar, he said, was that it was an independent paper which expressed its opinion honestly and fearlessly on public questions. He went on :—

The Zamindar was a paper which not only boldly criticised Government measures but similarly the actions and views of Mohammedan leaders themselves. This latter fact, which is an open secret, brought for it the displeasure and enmity of some of the leading men of the community. This has been a great factor to its downfall. The Zamindar had a circulation of about 27,000 copies daily. There was not a single Mohammedan household, and for the matter of that, numerous Hindu households as well, where the paper was not read. I have seen with my own eyes in Patna, Cawnpore, and other places where coolies used to purchase a copy, squat on the ground in a circle and ask some one to read the paper aloud for them. It was the only paper which had created a taste for newspaper reading in the masses and with the Mohammedan community it had become an absolute necessity. Such a paper has been stopped for writing three leading articles in the issues of November 19, 20 and 21. I have very carefully read these articles over and over again, and I challenge anyone to say that these articles are either disloyal or seditious. They are ordinary articles as you would find in numerous newspapers in India. Of course, I do not mean to say that I agree with all that was written in these articles nor that I approve of the taste of some of the passages, but I do say most emphatically that sedition and disloyalty are as far away from them as they are from the writings of some of the English Press either in England or in India.

That was the opinion of a highly distinguished and competent witness. Yet there was no appeal, for the High Court had ruled that they had no power to interfere. He would like also to point out that this Act had a general application which went far beyond these cular newspapers and embraced the entire Press in India. But it had never been brought into force against any paper owned or edited by any Englishman, although it was a regrettable fact that one of the gravest sources of anxiety in India was to be found in the articles which appeared in Anglo-India newspapers of a certain type and which were deliberately intended to provoke and exasperate the Indian community. No action was ever taken against such papers. The rigours of the law were reserved for vernacular papers or papers published in English and edited by Indians. This differentiation added to the grievance already felt with regard to the Act. An appeal for amendment of the measure had been lately made in the Viceroy's Legislative Council, in which seventeen Indian members had joined, but the Government set their face against any modification, and had even declined to restore the safeguards which were guaranteed in 1910 and were now found to be illusory. The time had come, therefore, to demand not only the modification but the repeal of this measure. (Loud applause.) India was now in many ways a very different country from what it was four years ago. Although there were occasional manifestations of an anarchical kind which resulted in murders of police officers and others that could not be sufficiently deplored, the Press could not be blamed for these incidents, for they were due to other causes below the surface with which it was exceedingly difficult for a Government such as the British Government in India to deal. It was an obvious reflection that if they suppressed newspapers which formed the ordinary channel for the expression of public opinion and allowed no outlet for the feelings of races and nationalities the result must be to drive discontent underground and render it far more grave and serious. (Hear, hear.)

MR. C. E. MAURICE.

Mr C. E. Maurice, in seconding the resolution, drew attention to that passage in Sir Lawrence Jenkins' judgment in the Delhi Comrade case in which it was said that the Act could be construed to affect words of which everyone might approve. Surely that was sufficient of itself to condemn the Act. (Cheers.) He felt bound also to refer to the extraordinary licence permitted to Anglo-Indian newspapers as compared with the treatment suffered by the editor of the Zamindar. Indians had been waiting since 1858 for the realisation of the promise of equal treatment held out in the Queen's Proclamation. It concerned not only them, but the honour of England, that promise should be redeemed. The indifference to Indian affairs in England had become a great scandal.

MR. ZAFAR ALI KHAN.

Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, editor of the Lahore Zamindar, read a long statement in which he discussed the Press Act and the various cases in which it had been put into operation. It was clear that no one could possibly conduct a newspaper and deal with the events of the day without publishing "words, signs, or visible writings" which might conceivably have a "tendency to bring into hatred or contempt" either the Government of the day or somebody else. (Applause.) By Section 22 the victim could be condemned without even the pretence of an appeal. No editor could escape unless it was believed that his object was to support everything that was done in the name of the Government and subscribed to universal official infallibility. The provisions of Section 4, according to the Chief Justice of Bengal, were as wide as human ingenuity could make them, yet in not one case had the machinery of the law been put into motion against any anarchical literature. In the course of three years the Act had been used to extinguish no less than 17 Moslem newspapers and presses. A number of purely theological papers had been interfered with. In his opinion, there never was a better case for the repeal of any piece of legislation, and he hoped an Indian Press Defence League would be started in England. (Applause.)

FERID BEY.

Ferid Bey, who spoke in French, gave an account of the manner in which the Press Law was being administered in Egypt. He had, he said, suffered six months' imprisonment for writing a preface to a volume of someone else's poems. The Press in Egypt was now completely untried, and even folk-songs had come under the censorship. Every Nationalist journal but one had been suppressed, and the survivor had been permitted to live on the understanding that it did not speak in the name of the National Party. Press "criminals" were now tried by the Criminal Court, which condemned without jury and without appeal. Letters and postal packets were opened in transit and quietly confiscated.

The resolution was then put and carried.

DR. RUTHERFORD.

Dr. V. R. Rutherford (prospective Liberal candidate for the Huddersfield division of Durham) moved a further resolution welcoming the proposal to form an Indian Press Defence League to demand the repeal of the Press Act of 10. He had, he said, listened with humiliation and consternation to what had been stated that afternoon with regard to the condition of the Press in India and in Egypt. There could be no satisfaction or contentment in either country or in England until these laws were repealed and ordinary fair play given to the Press. (Hear, hear.) The object, of course, was to crush the national spirit: but that would be found to be impossible. (Cheers.)

Mr. W. H. Seed seconded the resolution, which was put and carried.

A vote of thanks to the chair was moved by Mr. S. H. Swinny.

The sin of indifference.

England's neglected duty to India.

THE Graphic prints in its issue of February 14 an article on "Our Interest in the East," which is stated to be written by a "Young Man in India." We subjoin a number of remarkable passages which it contains:—

No one can deny that the Englishman at home is unbecomingly ignorant of his Empire in the East, and sadly wanting in a sense of imperial responsibility. Gradual realisation of the fact is one of the most depressing features of a return to the homeland after long sojourn in the East.

Throughout our Eastern possessions we take the "native" naked from the mud of his rice-field; we teach him to read and write; we tell him to eat, clothe himself, sit at table and converse like ourselves; to imitate and emulate us in every way. We let him adopt our manners and customs: we speak to him of justice and freedom, of Christianity and equality in the sight of God, and when the product of this forced civilisation turns to us and says: "I have done all you have told me to do; I am now a civilised being; I know political economy and I have taken the same degrees as you; let me dine with you and let me have a share in the Government of my country," we cannot satisfy him. It is well for the East that we cannot; but the murmur rises against us, and ill-feeling grows and descends to the masses of the people, and in the end the sum of their acquirements is hatred and scorn of their benefactors.

Not only in India, but in every one of our Eastern Dependencies, hatred of the white man is becoming synonymous with education, and yet we have to govern not by the sword, but by making the ruled rule. It is folly to suggest solutions for problems such as confront us with regard to education in the East. . . . There is one thing left for the Englishman to do. At home and in the East he must allow himself to see and understand the point of view and the outlook of the educated "native," and teach him to understand the problems that confront his rulers. Although East and West may never meet, there is much unnecessary misunderstanding in what divides them. How often have a few words of confidential talk and a little friendly interest in the careers of young "natives" saved them from the ranks of the seditionists? And how often has thoughtless arrogance at a critical moment originated life-long bitterness and hostility? The secret of British power is individual personality, and on this alone depends the weathering of the storm and the secure laying of a foundation to the future happiness of millions.

The Passing of Empire in India.

Mr. Herbert Burrows at South Place.

Mr. Herbert Burrows gave an interesting address at South Place Ethical Institute, Finsbury, on Sunday morning last (February 15) on Mr. Fielding Hall's recently-published book, "The Passing of Empire."

He observed that few phrases had suffered more from ignorance and distortion than the word Empire. In its proper dictionary signification, it appeared harmless enough, but tyrannies and despotisms had clustered around it without number. With regard to the British Empire the remarkable fact was that there was no such thing except in India and the Crown Colonies. With regard to India there were two main schools of thought. There was the "Imperial school," represented in India by the hard-and-fast Anglo-Indian and in England by the governing classes in Parliament and at the India Office. Their views had been very crudely, but most truthfully, put by Mr. Joyson-Hicks, who, when he was member for North-West Manchester, blurted out that it was utter nonsense to say that the British were in India for India's good; that they were there for their own good, and intended to remain there for the same reason. Then there were the other school which held that India should have complete self-government, and that Britain should see about giving it to her at the earliest possible moment, publicly declaring this to be her object. Between these two extremes there were, of course, many gradations, even among Indians themselves. Some said that Britain should remain in India, simply as suzerain, others desired to see her retain her grip of national administration: others, again, would turn India into a Colony on the model of Australia and Canada: and there were also those who were content with the wide extension of local municipal government. He did not propose to discuss these various shades of opinions. It was his belief that British rule in India had fallen far short of the ideal professed in 1858, when the Company's government came to an end. But he would leave that to discuss Mr. Fielding Hall's thesis that much of the so-called "unrest" was largely the Englishman's own fault. He would pre-suppose that the English were going to remain in India, and for more years than some of his Indian friends might believe. He was prepared to find he was mistaken: for India of all countries in the world was perhaps the most difficult to understand. Although he had not been to India, it had been his good fortune to come into daily contact with Indians—men of different castes, races, habits, thought, ideas, aspirations, and religions—and the more he saw of them, the more he realised the infinite patience which it needed for a European even to scratch the surface of the problem. He did not believe in much that Kipling had written, but he did feel the truth of the hackneyed quotation as to the gulf between East and West. In the mass there could be little rapprochement between two races which for centuries had differed so essentially in general evolution and training and in every sort of characteristic. Indians had exactly the same feeling towards the negro. The first thing, then, was to try to understand. It was because the English had not understood, and mostly had not tried to understand, that their so-called Empire in India was slowly passing away. They had always been except in rare instances, and still were an alien race in a strange land, counting the hours until they were released to spend in their own country the money they had made. No assimilation was possible under such circumstances. He was putting on one side the anarchists and terrorists. His thought was of the general type. The Government might pass Press Laws as bad as those of Russia, but 315 millions of people could not be permanently ruled by such means, however stringent they might be.

The Daily Mail had on December 16 published a letter from an "Anglo-Indian," which revealed a condition of affairs that stay-at-home Englishmen could not possibly imagine, namely, that a whole people could be barred because of their colour by a so-called superior race. As this Anglo-Indian put it, the arrogance and snobbishness of the Anglo-Indian was a festering sore to the body politic of India. Much was heard of the Jim Crow car in the United States. But let an Indian enter a carriage in which an Englishman was seated, and he ran the risk of being bundled out. The effect upon a proud and highly sensitive people could be appreciated by Englishmen, if they would only set to work to imagine India mistress of England, and Indians treating Englishmen in that manner. The iron would enter into their souls. Was it worth while to arouse such passions in India. Frankly, however, he did not believe any general disturbance was coming. There was as yet no real coherence in India. Her town life was sparse, her villages widely separated by jungle. Her races, languages, religions were of different types. Hindus and Mohameds were coming together in a manner which was most hopeful: but the movement was slow, and many of the old prejudices and jealousies remained. Differences in India were very deep and very far-reaching. He was very strongly inclined to think also that the chief opponents for a long time to come of any real changes in India would be the Indian women. As far as the caste system, the social salvation of the country would never be accomplished until Indians ate together, lived together, and intermixed without restriction. The same observation applied to England, where, in some respects, the class system was as bad as carried the same social results.

THE PRIMARY DUTY OF ENGLAND.

But because a general rising was neither possible nor probable, the heavy responsibility of England was not thereby diminished. It was for her to do the utmost to assist India to her self-realisation, she must publicly declare that she was in India for the single purpose of helping India to attain complete self-government: and must shape her policy to that end. In the meantime, all who had studied the matter would agree with Mr. Fielding Hall that the present bureaucratic government of India must be reformed root and branch. But, curiously enough, Mr. Hall was against throwing open the higher positions in the Indian Civil Service to Indians: and the race-arrogance of the Europeans was assigned by him as the obstacle. Leaving that aside, there was education to be pushed among the masses of the people. But it must be done wisely and well. The defects of education as they knew it in England must be avoided, and nothing but the virtues copied: so that it might be made a lever for self-government. There should be as much district, local, and municipal government as possible. The provincial councils should be thoroughly reconstituted, and the Viceroy's Legislative Council made properly representative of the real interests of the people. The tendency now on all hands was to keep India bound hand and foot to the care of Anglo-Indian officialism.

The objection was always raised that Indians were unfit for self-government. It was as old as the hills, and done duty in every civilised country as the one stock argument of the quidnuncs who stood out against any change or against the surrender of social and political privileges. There was, of course, millions of Indians who were unfit in the ordinary sense of the party politician, but they could be matched by thousands in England in town and country. After all, the poor had to live like every one else, and had, therefore, the human right to order their own lives, even though they might make mistakes. However this might be, there were enough educated Indians now to justify the experiment of much more extended local self-government if only the authorities would consent to it. England must seek her strength not in dominance but in kindly help.

The Public Services Commission.

Agricultural Education.

THE Public Services Commission concluded its sittings at Calcutta on January 22 and 23.

On January 22, before Lord Islington's Section.

Mr. E. J. Woodhouse, Principal of the Sabour Agricultural College, Behar and Orissa, said that the present system at the College was not necessary for existing requirements. He would go so far as to close it altogether, but if it were retained, he would keep it for the training of Indians recruited for the Agricultural Service. There was too much science in the technical course now prescribed. What was needed was two years' practical training in agriculture for the recruits. Educated Indians did not possess that training from the agricultural point of view which was required. The surest way of getting superior officers was to draw from the agricultural family. So far as the Scientific branch was concerned, he would advocate the taking of science graduates from the University. The Director of Agriculture should be a member of that Service, because a member of the Indian Civil Service was not quite alive to the recent progress made in scientific agriculture.

Mr. J. N. Chakravarty, representing the Bengal Provincial Agricultural Department, said that he entered the Service in 1908, and was in charge of the Government Dairy Farm at Rangpur. It was very difficult to get the class of men who would do agricultural work themselves, and at the same time, would have agricultural education. The education imparted at Sabour was satisfactory, but those who wanted higher agricultural education should have a course of training at Pusa. The difference of pay between the Imperial and Provincial Services was very great. As a matter of fact, the members of the Provincial Agricultural Service received much smaller pay than any other Provincial Services.

THE VETERINARY DEPARTMENT.

Major A. Smith, Principal of the Bengal Veterinary College, was of opinion that the present system of recruitment for his Department was not satisfactory. The best method of recruitment of the Indians in the Imperial Service would be by recruitment from persons who had English qualifications. They were feeling the absence of an expert official adviser.

Mr. Brand, of the Provincial Veterinary Service, Bengal, said that capable Provincial officers should have the chance of promotion to the Imperial branch. The prospects in the subordinate Service were very poor.

FACTORY INSPECTION IN BENGAL.

The second Section, under the presidency of Lord Ronaldshay, heard evidence from the Factory Inspection Department and also the Bengal Police Service.

Mr. R. P. Adams, officiating Chief Inspector of Factories in Bengal, Behar and Orissa and Assam, said that his present staff was inadequate. It consisted of three inspecting officers, and a number of certifying surgeons. The major portion of the work lay in Calcutta. Factories in Bengal were increasing annually, and, at the present time, there were a number of them which had not yet been brought on the register. A good colloquial knowledge of the vernacular was essential, if an officer was to do his work efficiently. For the Indian factories he would not advocate the employment of Indian inspectors, and in the case of European factories it was extremely difficult for an Indian inspector to get on with the European managers of the factories.

To Sir Theodore Morison: He was conscious that with his present inadequate staff there were evasions of the Factory Act. They had to do the best they could, and managers of factories did the best they could, but they had extreme difficulty to manage their labour entirely free of irregularity.

To Mr. Rahim: He knew that there were Indian inspectors in Bombay, but that system would not work well in Bengal, because there were a large number of factories here owned and managed by Europeans. There were factories in almost every district in Bengal.

To Mr. Chaubale: There was no objection to Indians being certifying surgeons.

INDIANS AND THE BENGAL POLICE.

Mr. R. B. Hughes Buller, I. C. S., C. I. E., Inspector-General of Police, Bengal, said that the present system of recruitment was satisfactory, and gave a better class of men than formerly. He saw no reason why the Police Service should be thrown open to the Indians. The Force required a large number of British officers. If the examination was thrown open, there would be the danger of a number—a large number—of Indians entering the Service. The preferable way was to promote Indians into the Deputy Superintendent's grade. It was laid down by the Police Commission that the promotion of Indians to be District Superintendents should be up to five per cent. In Bengal at present, there were three Indian Superintendents, one Mohamedan and two Hindus. One man had served as Inspector and worked up to a Deputy Superintendent's grade, and the two others were recruited as Deputy Superintendents from other Departments. Deputy Superintendents are put in charge of sub-divisions. They did excellent work there. The policy was to develop along these lines.

To Mr. Rahim: Indian police officers had, some of them, exhibited great pluck and done good service during the present condition of things in the country. Out of twenty-three Deputy Superintendents, three were Indians.

Mr. R. Clark, Deputy Commissioner of Police, Calcutta, pointed out that the Calcutta Police was a different force from the Bengal Police. They had six Deputy Commissioners. Not one was an Indian. He advised giving one of the posts to an Indian.

To Mr. Rahim: Without Bengali officers they could not carry on the work efficiently. It was very necessary that their aspiration should be realised? He did not think Indians were quite capable of maintaining discipline. The knowledge that an Indian officer had the whole force of the Government behind him is not sufficient to enable him to do this. The Indian inspectors had a great deal to do in enforcing discipline: but they did not always do it. The Bengali was not a good disciplinarian. Wherever work has been carried on in the districts by Indian officers, his experience was that discipline had become loose. It was the European officer who tightened it up wherever there was slackness.

To Sir Theodore Morison: Indians had not sufficient scope. He would appoint them as Sub Inspectors and promote them to District Superintendents. A small percentage should be reserved for direct appointment as Inspectors, and a small number for appointment direct to District Superintendent. Those Indians who had been appointed District Superintendents came into the Service too late to give them a good show.

Mr. S. Sen Gupta, Deputy Superintendent of Police, First Grade, said that he was first appointed as Inspector. The memorandum sent in by him represented the unanimous view of the Provincial Police officers of Bengal. There should be simultaneous examinations in England and in India, and twenty-five per cent. of Indians should for the present be taken from among those who passed in England and in India. The Deputy Superintendents wished to be put on one list with the Assistant Superintendents.

To Mr. Chahal: They did not want higher pay but they wanted promotion to District Superintendentships.

POLICE EVIDENCE FROM BEHAR.

Mr. R. T. Dundas, officiating Inspector-General in Behar and Orissa, who was examined by the second section on January 23, expressed himself as well satisfied with the prevailing method of recruitment by examination in England. If the competitive examination in England were thrown open to the Indians, he anticipated that a large number of undesirable class of men would come in. Under no circumstances did he wish the five per cent. now fixed of Indians in the Imperial Service to be in any way increased. If it was decided to recruit Indians into the higher Service, he would take them from the Deputy Superintendent's cadre. The Inspector-Generalship should be held by a police officer.

A "SWEEPING" PROPOSITION EXAMINED.

To Mr. Rahim: He belonged to the Domiciled European Community. He had found from his experience in Bengal that Indians could not challenge as much respect from his subordinates as the Europeans. Hence he was not in favour of increasing the five per cent. limit in the case of Indians in the Imperial Service. He would not say that Indian officers lost their self-respect by holding higher appointments in the Police Service. He was not in a position to substantiate his proposition by facts. It might be a sweeping proposition to make that Indians were unable to command respect from men of their own community; but that was his experience.

Q: Is it not absolutely unsound as a general proposition?—It may be so.

Q: If your proposition is logically followed, Indians should not be appointed as Civil Servants, because they cannot command the respect of the people that will be entrusted to their care?—The circumstances of the two Services are quite different. Civilians do not require so much of personal influence as they do in the Police.

Continuing, Mr. Dundas said that he made no distinction between Anglo-Indians domiciled in India, Eurasians and Europeans, but went by a man's capability and qualifications alone. It did not matter whether he was white in complexion or not. He regarded Indians in the same way: but Indian officers, however much influence they might have, would not be at all as efficient as European officers.

Mr. H. St. John Morrison, Provincial Police officer of Behar and Orissa, said he had been Deputy Superintendent for over three years. As far as the number of Deputy Superintendents was concerned, the best method of recruiting Indians for the Upper Service.

Mr. M. L. N. Luffman, Superintendent, representing the Imperial officers of Assam, was satisfied with the present method of recruitment. He recommended a period of probation in England unless there was an improvement in the training in India. The "Colour-bar" should be retained so far as the examination in England was concerned, but promotion to the Imperial Service might be made from the Provincial Service. He objected to the fusion of the Bengal and Assam cadres. In Assam there was a force of military police in addition to an armed civil police. He could not give any instance in Assam of an Indian officer who was found wanting when performing the same duties as a European officer.

Moulvi Mohamed Sadir, representing the Provincial Police Officers of Assam, said that he was a Deputy Magistrate before he joined the Police. He personally favoured the amalgamation of the Assam and the Bengal cadres, and recommended the abolition of the Provincial service. Thirty three per cent. of the superior posts should be reserved for the members of the Provincial Service: and no man over fifty should be promoted.

To Mr. Chahal: There were no local conditions which made it necessary to exclude Indians from some places. He was stationed among planters and no difficulty arose.

THE SURVEY OF INDIA.

Colonel S. G. Barrard, C. S. I., R. E., Surveyor-General of India, who was examined on January 23 before the first Section, said that he was generally satisfied with the conditions of the Survey Department. For the purposes of efficiency the Department should be wholly military. The present discontent in the Provincial Service was due to envy of Imperial Service.

Mr. J. O. Griff, representing Provincial officers of the Survey of India Department, maintained, on the other hand, that there was a superfluity of military officers in the Department. He would reserve all appointments in the Provincial Service for members of the domiciled community, because they were specially fitted for it.

The "Colour bar" in Madras also.

The Commission resumed its sitting at Madras on January 26 in two sections.

Before the second Section, which is presided over by Lord Ronaldshay, the Hon. Mr. H. F. W. Gillman, I.C.S., Inspector-General of Police, Madras, gave evidence. In his opinion, the present system of recruiting for the police was satisfactory, judged by the results. He would retain the colour bar for the examination in London. The whole Madras police force was trained to the use of arms. The fifty-five years' rule for retirement ought to be enforced throughout the Service. There was need for the appointment of an extra Deputy Inspector-General of Police. Selection by a Board was preferable to competition as a means to recruitment for the Provincial Service. Promotions to superintendentships should go by merit.

To Mr. Chahal: There was apprehension on the part of European officers of the force that if the colour bar was removed from the London examination too many Indians might get in. A great majority of the force must remain European.

To Mr. Abdur Rahim: He was not in favour of an Indian being appointed a Deputy Inspector-General.

Mr. F. B. M. Cardozo, District Superintendent of Police, stated that the majority of Imperial Service officers of the Department favoured a continuance of the present system of recruitment. The department should be manned almost entirely by Europeans. Selected Provincial officers might be promoted to the higher Service, but the colour bar should be retained for the London examination. He would confine a certain number of superior posts to promoted Indians, say, ten per cent. for the present. The Inspector-General should be a Police officer: but a Madras civilian in the post was preferable to a police officer from another Province.

To Mr. Rahim: Indian police officers themselves thought that the Imperial Department should be almost entirely manned by European officers.

Rao Bahadur P. Parankusam Naidu, Assistant Commissioner of Police for Madras City, asked that five superintendentships should be allotted to officers of the Provincial Service. If this were done, he would be content that the London examination for the Imperial Department, should be reserved for Europeans.

The East and the Empire.

We doubt very much if the leaders of printed opinion in this country are always right in thinking that the British public could not be got to take an interest in the acts and words of the leading personages of native race in our Indian Empire. It seems a pity that distinguished Indian noblemen and gentlemen, who concentrate in themselves the respect and confidence of such vast masses of our Indian fellow subjects, and whose policy is a great deal more important to the Empire than a great many of our local luminaries whom we could name, are nevertheless either entirely unknown, or possessed of the most shadowy existence, so far as the British public is concerned. Yet there are all sorts of French and German personages, totally indifferent to the usual tenor of our national life, about whom the Press on occasion contrives to create quite an origie of popularity. Foreign novelists and dramatists, whose productions are certainly caviare to the general, sometimes appear in a perfect blaze of leader writing on the occasion of some banquet of presentation. If the biographies of distinguished Indians were better known in the Editor's room, it might be found that the great public also took an interest in their life and work. The ignorance with regard to individuals extends of course to societies and social movements. Although a hundred portents admonish us that the time is past when we could look upon India as if it were inhabited by sets of chessmen or counters, were still supplied with miserably inadequate information upon men and events which may be shaping the future of our Empire. The meetings within the past few weeks of the representative assemblies of the All-India Moslem League on the one hand, and the Indian National Congress, which is mainly a mirror of Hindu politics, afford additional arguments for a better acquaintance with the native leaders of India. In itself a circumstance which deserves no ordinary notice that these assemblies received this year into their presidential address, in both cases alike, members of the Moslem community. The sentiment of Indian unity is clearly on the march. The Nawab Syed Mohamed, representing the oldest Moslem race, took the chair of the Congress, which is mainly composed of delegates belonging to representative bodies professing the Hindu religion. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla in the All-India Moslem League has been knighted by the British Crown. It is a gratifying indication that native Indian gentlemen who deserve the confidence of their own people have also deserved the distinctions of the British Administration. When we read the addresses of these two Presidents we find them dealing with the largest and gravest matters of Indian and Imperial interest; and it must be admitted that the utterance of such chosen leaders of the Indian community are well-informed, judicious, statesman-like, and full of that reasonable and sober loyalty to the British Crown which is the best guarantee both for the ability and the sincerity of the speaker. We feel that we are in the presence of Indian gentlemen capable of appreciating the events and duties of public life in a manner no way inferior, we can assure our readers, to very distinguished members and leaders of political parties here in England, engaged in discussing the affairs of England. How closely these Indian statesmen have followed the course of politics and have noted the statements of English political leaders, can be more fully appreciated the more closely we study their careful and elaborate addresses.

We may mention that the President of the National Congress did not fail to quote Lord Lansdowne's declaration in 1899 on the subject of the ill-treatment of our Indian settlers in the Transvaal by the Boer Government of the day. It is piquantly painful to follow that quotation fourteen years afterwards and to be asked to repeat that declaration of the eminent Conservative leader that "Among the many misdeeds of the South African Republic I do not know that any fills me with more indignation than its treatment of the Indian settlers." The Honorable Nawab produced a natural sensation among his audience when he asked, as Lord Lansdowne asked in 1899. "Is the Government of the Empire, so mighty and irresistible in India, with its population of three hundred millions, quite powerless to secure redress at the hands of a small State in South Africa?" It must certainly lead to curious reflections when we realise that a few hundred thousands of white settlers in South Africa should believe that they are able to inflict any indignity they please upon the members of a vast empire of three hundred millions of Indians, including many millions of most warlike races, and that this vast Indian Empire appears to derive no power—rather than the contrary—from its British Government to protect its own ill-treated people. It is significant to note that among the suggestions at these great Indian Assemblies there was one for largely increasing the participation of native Indians to the British Force in India. A demand to throw upon the rank of British officer the military natives of India is in itself a remarkable illustration of the new developments of Indian thought and activity. It must be admitted that when England can see its way to calling on the immense reserves of military power now latent in so vast a population, something will have happened in Asia which must make out of the most aggressive of European Powers take time for cautious meditation.

The warmth of the declarations of loyalty expressed at the All-India National Congress, especially as set forth in the address of the President, Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla, is all the more weighty and remarkable in consequence of the reasons by which they were supported. India, it is said, is entitled to look forward to greater and greater achievements of national development. India ought to be fully capable of self-government. But it is an undoubted fact that the progress which has been already made in this direction is due to the guardianship and leadership of England. Without England there could have been none of the Indian progress which we see. It is the duty, accordingly, of every patriotic Indian, whether Hindu or Mussalman, to support that English supremacy and guidance which are indispensable to make a community, to do nothing to weaken it, but to endeavour to fit India for an ever-increasing share in the power and benefit of British rule. These are perfectly legitimate ambitions. When united with devotion to British rule, as necessary to India's safety and progress, they are of healthy and ennobling inspiration. The statement of England are bound to take notice of such a virile and promising development. It is only deplorable to reflect that, while the Mussalmans of India were showing this friendly and loyal attitude towards England, the profoundly mistaken portion of our Liberal Cabinet has taken fresh steps to place itself on the side of the enemies of the Ottoman Empire, and even to propose armed co-operation in order to secure Greek aggression in the Asiatic islands which are indispensable to the security of Turkey in peace and war.—The Outlook.

England and Egypt.

Mr. Charles Rosher in the course of a letter to the Near East says:—

Mr. Ali Fahmy Mohamed's article in the Near East (January 16) drew a remarkable letter from Sir Harry Johnston (January 28). So promising an opening of debate on this important subject raised hopes that it would have led to increased ventilation through your columns.

Both of these able writers hold strong and definite views. But while A. F. Mohamed merely tendered suggestions, Sir H. Johnston entered the lists with all the heavy armaments of authoritativeness, and with a confident air of finality cunningly designed to crush at a single blow all opposition. Here, for instance, is the Johnstonian sledge-hammer. Having stated "the only alternatives" to the present form of British control and protection—and indicated that either of these would carry with it the break-up of the British Empire in East Africa, the Sudan, and Southern Asia—he very cogently remarks that "it is waste of time for an Englishman to discuss them." In these words the necessity of the British position in Egypt is accurately brought into focus. No amount of sentiment or sympathy can override such a clear practical statement of "things as they are".

It is quite obvious that no Britisher worth the name could seriously put the integrity of the British Empire into the scales against Egyptian National Independence. Therefore, let all intelligent Egyptians admit this inevitable conclusion and try to be rational as well as nationalist. And on the other hand let the British, in their obligatory position as controllers and protectors, employ such methods as may tend to foster and not discourage the national consciousness of their protégés. Then would mutual suspicions and divergent aims give place to firm friendship and honest co-operation, leading ultimately to genuine Egyptian Nationalism on a stable basis, and so to the permanent safeguarding of Britain's highway to her Eastern Empire—via a strong and friendly Egypt.

Apart from this stern logic, I submit that Sir H. Johnston is too severe on the Mohammedan Egyptian, and too bursting with the sense of superiority which characterises so many exponents and champions, of what is known as "Christian Civilization," and in his contempt of Islamism he avails himself of the letter of the opportunity to raise a false issue and draw a false conclusion, which, I take upon myself to combat. This issue and conclusion he consummates in the following paragraph:—

"If the Mohammedan Egyptians prefer to regard the Quran and the medieval elaboration of the Quran as the last word, the dominant and ultimate authority in law, science, education, morals, and social economy, so long will Mohammedan institutions be utterly futile in coping with the requirements of the twentieth century, and so long will Mohammedan peoples be unfitted to govern themselves, and still less to govern more intelligent fellow-citizens of more enlightened faiths."

Omitting the four last words, which I have purposely italicised, we find a proposition with which no expert Moslem or Christian could cavil. But those four simple words convey tremendously false inferences, such as (1) that Mohammedan peoples are backward in the race of human development because of their faith; (2) that their "more intelligent fellow-citizens" (nominally Christians) are of more enlightened faiths; (3) that the latter, by reason of their greater intelligence and more enlightened faiths, have a right to govern not only themselves, but also, their inferiors—the Mohamedans; (4) that they (the nominal Christians) have attained to this superiority over Mohamedans by reason of holding a more enlightened faith.

No doubt Sir Harry Johnston, as one well versed in the science of governing, is fully aware of the value of religious faith, especially in an organised form, as a most powerful instrument; and he cannot fail to be aware of the dead-set made upon Moslem countries in recent times by the nominally Christian countries with a view to the elimination of Islam as an external political factor in world politics. And he ought to know that Islam is not only a religion, but also that it embodies a marvellous democratic political system, much akin to the British political ideal. He—and those who follow him or think with him—must know that Islam is a concrete force in the world which has proved inconvenient in the past and may do so in the future—hence the policy of driving Islam beneath the surface so that it no longer appears as a political factor.

I see no harm in this if at the same time Sir Harry, and the rest of them, will consent to treat the "more enlightened faiths" in precisely the same manner, and be candid enough to admit the truth that modern civilisation is not the result of the Christian or any other religion—that its superiority and strength depend not on religion, but on science and discovery, which have brought in the modern financial and economic systems and provided lethal weapons which supersede individual courage. It has been the faith of the free-thinker and scientist who broke away from the fetters of religious faith—often at the cost of life or liberty—which has led us forth from the days of blind superstition to the "enlightened faiths" which nowadays make us fit to govern the Mohamedans.

The truth is that whereas the Christians have dropped their faith and the Bible, the Moslems have stuck to their Book and the formulae of their faith, and thus have been encumbered—fallen in the race because their faith (as a faith) was so effective—too effective!

In conclusion I will furnish a quotation from an article in a morning paper of this date by Sir H. Johnston:—

"It is right, in my opinion, that the ridiculous side of all religions should be displayed, so that the dross may be chased out of them and only the pure gold remain."

Bismillah! So mote it be! But let it be understood that "the pure gold" is a metaphor, and has no reference to the yellow metal so ardently worshipped by the "intelligent fellow-citizens of more enlightened faiths."

Let us all strive for the pure gold to which Sir Harry refers, and be not too respectful towards the mass of dross which tries to hide it from our vision.

The Man of the hour in Egypt.

Interview with Zaghlul Pasha.

(FROM THE "NEW EAST" CORRESPONDENT.)

Cairo, Feb. 5.

SINCE the inauguration of the Legislative Assembly so many rumours have been current as to a disagreement between the Select Committee which has been drafting the rules of procedure and the Government, and there has been so much talk of late with regard to the attitude the Assembly and certain of its prominent members would adopt towards the Government measures, that it seemed to me advisable to seek enlightenment on the subject from the man to whom both sides, i.e., the Assembly and those who look upon its facilitation with disapproval, unanimously assign the role of leader. Accordingly I telephoned to Saad Pasha Zaghlul, and he very kindly gave me an interview of over an hour and a-half on Friday last.

We did not take long to get to the point. Evidently the Pasha was as keen on discussing it as I was anxious to hear his views thereon. He admitted that there had been a disagreement, but said that the matter had been amicably settled by a frank recognition on both sides of the different points of view. The bone of contention had been the powers that were to be given to the President. Were the latter elected by the Assembly there could not possibly be any objection to giving him the fullest possible powers: for, by its choice, the Assembly would have plainly shown that it desired to be ruled by its nominee. But under the Organic Law the Assembly had no voice in the nomination of its President. The Government had full powers in the matter, and, naturally, the Assembly objected to putting itself unreservedly in the hands of a man, however worthy he might be whose mandate came from elsewhere. In the settlement of this question a further objection arose as to the holding of sittings for disciplinary decision in camera, and the Pasha proceeded to explain to me the motives that had actuated him in advising the Assembly to give way, as recorded in my letter.

In the course of conversation Saad Pasha referred to the fact that it was said that he hoped to be a Minister once again, and that his attitude would be shaped with that end in view. "My ideas are far from that," said he. "Of course, it may be said that I should naturally disclaim being open to such influence. But, surely, on the face of it my present position is preferable to that of a Minister? I may only draw half a Minister's pay, but at present I am free to state my opinions, and in addition I am a representative of the nation, and have its voice at my back, and can work whole-heartedly for its good. Surely such a position is far more desirable than that of a Minister whose attitude is dictated by policy and whose views are very often kept in restraint." As the Pasha added, he of all people is aware how circumscribed the position of Minister is; and those who remember the incidents attendant on his retirement from office will undoubtedly agree that his to-day is the better part.

I congratulated Saad Pasha on his election as Vice-President, but added that it was to be feared that in certain circumstances it would interfere with his active intervention in the debates. (This, in fact, has been one of the points made by his enemies and those who have schemed to muzzle him.) "Not all," said he, "If, perchance, it so happens that the President and the senior Vice-President are absent, and I have to act as President during an important debate, wherein I wish to participate, I shall vacate the chair, to which I shall nominate the senior delegate, and still make my speech." It will be interesting to see whether this will be permitted.

Saad Pasha referred to the opinion expressed that the Assembly would set up a systematic opposition to the Government into which he would of necessity be drawn. He stated that this was a most unfortunate and mistaken idea. He repeated a great deal of what he had told me in his previous interview, and stated that the recent visits he had paid, and which had aroused comment, in no wise showed that he had at all changed his views. "My policy," said he, "will be for the good of the country." He would, he added, lend himself to no intrigue. He did not think that the Nationalists would have any influence in the Assembly, and he certainly would not support them in their tactics.

He looked upon the British Occupation as a necessary evil, and therefore, it was incumbent on them all to work harmoniously with it, but that did not prevent them from stating their views when they honestly thought the Occupation was taking a step detrimental to their country, and in that case of offering reasonable opposition. "Such an attitude," said he, "cannot be considered as one of systematic opposition."

With regard to the question of parties, the ex-Minister of Justice said that in an institution like the Legislative Assembly groups would naturally form themselves, and in time what in Europe are called parties would come into being. Quite possibly a party would form round him, but whilst he would welcome support, from no matter what quarter, for any policy to which he might wish to persuade the Government, that did not at all mean that he would endorse the views or the policy of his supporters. (I was quite aware that Saad Pasha was referring to the forecasts that have been made with regard to his connection with the Nationalist Party, with whom it was feared he might be led to compromise himself.)

At our parting the People's Vice-President said: "Come again, and we will talk more about these things," and to my thanks for his frank statements he rejoined: "I have spoken to you in this manner because I want you and your fellow-countrymen, especially those in England, to realise what my ideas are—that I am servant to no one except my country, in whose service I rejoice to find myself once more, and that I am as independent as of yore."

I, personally, am convinced of the sincerity of the attitude and intentions of Saad Pasha Zaghlul, and of the genuineness of his declarations with regard to the statements made concerning his connection with parties and persons who in the past have held views at variance with, and have acted, though not always openly, against the Egyptian Government and its British advisers. In this opinion I have found support in quarters that are reputed to have a shrewd insight into Egyptian politics, and also in quarters that have not always seen eye to eye with Saad Pasha. I have been present at every meeting of the Assembly, and this much I can say: no matter what the future may hold in store for us, he is the only man who commands the respect and obtains the ready ear of the entire Assembly. Let me add that his influence so far has exerted itself on the side of moderation and restraint. I cannot help thinking that Saad Pasha's presence in the Legislative Assembly will prove to be for the good of Egypt in every way.

The Future of Turkey.

The aim of the meeting of recently formed Ottoman Association held in the Cannon Street Hotel, on January 11, was "to call attention to the disturbing effect of the policy of the Powers in the Near East on the financial and commercial markets of the world and on the permanence of international peace," says the Manchester Guardian. The Association recently sent a memorial to Sir Edward Grey on the situation in Eastern Anatolia and the Aegean Islands, urging that attempts are being made "to frustrate the sincere endeavour of the Ottoman Government to establish a just and orderly administration in the American provinces." The necessity of a settlement of the question of the islands "on lines satisfactory and fair to Turkey" was emphasised. To this Sir Eyre Crowe replied on Sir Edward Grey's behalf that "he is in full accord with the desire to see peace and good government in the Turkish Empire, and that the considerations urged by the Association have been duly weighed by His Majesty's Government in the efforts they are making in conjunction with other Powers to secure a permanent and satisfactory settlement of the questions still outstanding in the Near East."

All the speakers spoke of the importance to our commercial interests of a sound understanding with Turkey. The chairman, Sir Thomas Barclay, moved a resolution to the effect that the continued interference of the Powers in the internal affairs of Turkey is a dangerous and disturbing factor in the world's markets, and must, as in the case of the Balkan War, prove detrimental to the permanence of international peace. Business men in the meeting shouted, "Quite true" when the chairman spoke of the stagnation of business in the City since the beginning of the Balkan troubles. Every attempt to enlist the support of the public for new enterprises had failed, and this was true also of New York, Berlin, and Paris. Unless, the Powers abstained from constant interference with the Turkish Government, a new set of difficulties would arise which would be accentuated by any attempt at introducing European control. New Turkey had not had a chance of dealing with her internal problems. We had showed an impatience towards her unworthy of an experienced Parliamentary country. It was in many important ways to the interests of Great Britain that we should remain close friends with Turkey, and help her to maintain her integrity. We must not allow ourselves to be dragged into dictating terms to Turkey which she could not accept, because they would have been fatal to her development and independence.

"A GANG OF SHADY FINANCIERS."

Sir J. D. Rees, M. P., seconded the resolution, and Mr. Tristram Harper and other representatives of City interest spoke, and an eloquent appeal for Turkey was made by Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall, the author, who read a letter from a friend in the Turkish Ministry of Finance. The writer said: "We are at the mercy of a gang of shady and unscrupulous financiers, who may make us daily sign agreements which in the aggregate will form the heaviest burden which this unlucky Empire has ever had to bear." Turkey, said Mr. Pickthall, was shut out from the decent money markets of the world because she showed a fierce determination to resist any further depredation of her territories, and was preparing to do for herself the work which England was by treaty bound to do for her—namely, to preserve the integrity of Turkey in Asia. "The independence of Turkey is a necessary safety value of Modern feeling."

MR. HAROLD COX.

Mr. Harold Cox moved a resolution regretting that the recent policy of Great Britain "has the appearance of having been persistently directed against Turkey." Mr. Cox was cheered when he expressed the opinion that Sir Edward Grey's foreign policy has been marked by a long series of disastrous blunders. Our policy since Sir Edward Grey went to the Foreign Office had been distinguished by deliberate subservience to Russia, and its aim had been to keep Turkey weak so that she would be helpless when Russia wanted to swallow her. Mr. Cox regretted the persistent failure of the Opposition in the House of Commons to criticise the policy of Sir Edward Grey, which was not, as the Opposition appeared to think, a continuance of our traditional foreign policy, but a complete departure from it. Mohamedans, not only in India, but all over the world were bitterly disappointed because England had failed them in their emergency. Our traditional policy was the defence of weak nationalities, but we were now allowing the small nationalities, one after another to be crushed by the greatest military despotism in the world, and we saw England, still the greatest Mohamedan Power, unable to move hand or foot until Sir Edward Grey received instructions from St. Petersburg.

PROFESSOR E. G. BROWNE.

Professor E. G. Browne, referring to Sir John Rees's praise of Sir E. Grey's policy, said that if the Conservative party would revert to the foreign policy of Lord Beaconsfield and abandon that of Sir Edward Grey, they would have a much better chance of coming back to office. Giving a sketch of recent Persian history, Professor Browne said that what had happened in Persia as the result of Russian policy was now happening in Asiatic Turkey—the frustration of loans, etc. Recently Russia had attempted to stop the parcel post to Persia, but had abandoned that after the strong protests made in Manchester and in Germany. "If we must have 'ententes,'" he added, "we might better to have one with Germany, because she has the same object as we have in trade development, as against the restrictive and selfish policy of Russia."

The Future of Turkey in Asia.

It has just been announced that an agreement has been reached between the French (and Russian) railway interests in Asiatic Turkey, represented by the Ottoman Bank, and the German, represented by the Deutsche Bank. The negotiations have been conducted under the auspices of the two, or, rather, three Governments and with the knowledge of the other Governments interested. To make the agreement effective the railway companies concerned have still to come to terms with Turkey; but as Turkey is suing, both in Paris and Berlin, for money of which she is badly in need, it is not likely that there will be any great difficulty in getting her sanction to the arrangement just concluded in Berlin. Like the Anglo-German-Turkish agreement, which is practically complete, the Franco-German agreement is an essential part in a whole series of understandings which are being negotiated to promote the economic development of Asiatic Turkey, to protect the existing interests, both economic and political, of the various countries engaged in that work, and to forestall, as far as possible, the danger of international friction. Now that the most important competitors have come to a friendly arrangement it should not be long before the whole network of agreements is complete. When they are complete it is understood that they will be published, and we shall then know exactly where we are. In the meantime, it is already clear that the understanding takes the form of a delimitation of spheres of interest, combined with the protection of interests already acquired; and it is obvious how the main lines of the delimitation will run. Germany, whose enterprise and persistence have secured for her the lion's share, will be free to develop the Anatolian and Baghdad systems, and will enjoy a practical monopoly in the development of the plateau of Asia Minor and, perhaps, a preponderating share in that of Mesopotamia. France will occupy a similar privileged position in Syria, and, with the political support of Russia, French capital will be employed in the development of the Black Sea basin, from which German railway enterprise will be excluded. Italy will probably secure a sphere inland from Adalia. Great Britain appears to abandon any claim to participate in future railway construction, though it is understood that the rights of existing British enterprises will be carefully safeguarded. Just as the French Government has concentrated its attention on its Syrian interests, and the German on Asia Minor, so Great Britain has been mainly occupied with the defence of her vital interests round the Persian Gulf, and of her right to an adequate share in the economic development of Mesopotamia.

The developments which these agreements foreshadow cannot be regarded with unmixed satisfaction. When European Powers map out spheres of interest in an Oriental empire it not unreasonably causes foreboding among those who desire to see the independence and integrity of that empire maintained. The fact that all the Powers concerned loudly—and no doubt sincerely—proclaim their anxiety to safeguard that independence and that integrity by no means lessens the foreboding. In spite of all such declarations we shall see Syria becoming more and more French, Anatolia more and more German, Armenia and the Black Sea basin more and more Russian. We shall see a constant growth of the interests which the Powers will feel called upon to defend and to promote in their respective spheres, with a consequent increase in occasions and opportunities for outside interference. It is not even if these interests would, in all cases, be only economic. In France an influential school of politicians and publicists is continually speaking of Syria as if it were already morally a protectorate of the French Republic. Only the other day the French Prime Minister publicly defined French policy in Syria in terms which seemed to imply that he was aiming at the detachment from the Ottoman Empire of the Syrian provinces, now to be administered as a French preserve. The strong objection which Russia made, and made with success, to the proposed appointment by the Ottoman Government of an Englishman of high standing, already in the Turkish service, to an administrative post in the Armenian provinces is an equally plain reminder of what Russian policy may become. Hitherto Turkey has had a bulwark against the ambition of individual Powers in the existence of conflicting interests. Powers which were tempted to move were checked by the fear that other Powers might regard any forward movement as detrimental to their own rival interests and ambitions. These conflicting interests are now to be reconciled, and the Powers are to agree to a mutual recognition of spheres within which their rival ambitions are to be restrained. The agreement diminishes the danger of European conflict; but, as a direct consequence, it increases the danger to which Turkey is exposed from European ambitions.

No Power, except Turkey herself, is more interested in the maintenance of the Turkish Empire in Asia than is Great Britain. The difficulties in which Great Britain would be involved by its disruption leap to the eye. Egypt would march with a French Syria on the East, as it already marches with an Italian Cyrenaica on the West. Whatever territory we found it necessary to hold on the Persian Gulf—and some we should have to hold if we were not to abandon interests which successive Governments have recognised to be vital to our Indian Empire—would be threatened by Germany from the North-west and by Russia from the North and North-east. With our notorious military weakness no statesman could contemplate without alarm such an extension of our land frontiers. From the British, as well as from the Ottoman, point of view the agreements we are discussing are bound to be a cause for anxiety. Whether their advantages outweigh this grave drawback cannot be usefully discussed until we know their details. To whichever side the balance may incline, it must in frankness be admitted that some such arrangement had become inevitable. European capital and European enterprise had to be attracted to Turkey in Asia if it were not to remain derelict and the Ottoman State were not to become bankrupt. In the present condition of the Turkish Empire European capital and enterprise were not to be secured except under the aegis of the European Governments, which were bound to prefer a friendly understanding with one another to a scramble for concessions opening the door to all manner of dangers, both to the interests they were bound to defend and to the peace of Europe. It is true that by defining and reconciling their interests they weaken the position of Turkey; but the mutual jealousy of possible aggressors is, at best, but a temporary bulwark for a weak State. It is bound, sooner or later, to be broken through, when some Power decides that it is worth while to take what it wants and to leave the others to do as they please. The only way of safety for a State in the position of Turkey is to husband and to develop its resources, both moral and material, and to become strong enough to stand on its own feet in repelling aggression. That way still lies open to Turkey. If her statesmen have the wisdom and self-restraint to guide her along it, she can safely disregard the menace lurking in the partition of her territory into foreign spheres of interest. If they lack those qualities, if they neglect the arduous though unexciting tasks to which duty calls them in Asia, if they squander their strength on romantic but ruinous adventures in the Balkans, the future of Turkey in Asia would be endangered even were these agreements not to be concluded. The agreements may, they inevitably will, make the danger more urgent and more menacing; but with them, as without them, the future of Turkey is in the hands of Turkey herself, and not of the Powers.—The Near East.

Mr. Balfour on Theism.

His Last Gifford Lecture.

Mr. Balfour has held his great audience together to the end. In replying to some well-chosen words in which Professor Smart conveyed to him the thanks of his listeners, the Gifford Lecturer spoke gratefully of a sympathy the existence of which he had felt from the first lecture to the last, and he added that he did not believe that in any other country such an audience would have assembled on ten occasions to hear the discussion of metaphysical topics, says the Times: The large gathering in the Bute Hall responded as it has never failed to do and went home happy with a good conscience and the pleasant memory of the successful efforts of a great Scotsman to tell his fellow-countrymen his thought on these high themes.

The tenth and last lecture was partly a summary and partly an appeal to the audience. Mr. Balfour began by saying that his object had been to show that the values of our beliefs are dependent upon a Theistic setting. Beliefs, he insisted, could be and must be considered as natural products, and their values as natural products must depend upon their origin. We must find in their pedigree some source higher than our poor efforts at reason and not a source lower and more contemptible. It was no answer to say that certain fundamental truths make the world, and the world is what it is because of fundamental truths, for he had shown that among the unproved and unprovable assumptions which are required to justify common sense and scientific knowledge. There are assumptions neither necessary nor universal nor inevitable, yet assumed through the whole course of knowledge. He had also shown that there are probabilities, tendencies to believe, organizing inclinations, which can be seen in the history of science.

NATURAL SELECTION AND RELIGION.

Having thus dealt with a possible objection from the point of view of critical idealism, Mr. Balfour summarized his argument that natural selection is incapable of accounting directly for any of the great values he had dealt with. He was aware of the controversies raging among biologists about natural selection; but he had chosen it because it is the only substitute that we know of for what is commonly called design. Selection does imitate design up to a certain point, but even if it could, as it certainly cannot, be proved that the higher values of aesthetics of ethics, and of thought have a survival value, it would not help us to maintain these values. But in fact the higher a value the further it is removed from the primitive consequences for which selection is responsible.

His own argument about the necessity of a Theistic setting for our beliefs was not attached to any great metaphysical system of thought, nor to any intuitive sense of religious values. He did not under-estimate the direct argument from religious beliefs which rests religious value on religion itself. But religious values were for him the conclusion, not the premises of his argument, and he could only rest the value of religion upon other values which are universally acknowledged. He did not appeal to those who are satisfied with any of the great constructive metaphysical systems, but he urged the necessity for a philosophy of science and of common sense. He did so, not in the interests of common sense, but in the interests of philosophy itself.

THE GIFFORD LECTURER'S PUBLIC.

With this hint to philosophical experts, Mr. Balfour proceeded to ask himself to whom his argument was addressed. He thought that a Gifford lecturer should speak to the general public; but to what public?

Fortunately, he remarked, there are many to whom God is as immediate and as certain as anything of which they have immediate experience—to whom the existence of God is a daily and hourly certainty. They were above his argument and to them it would be superfluous. There are others immersed in the daily task, in the toil that cannot be put off, who have no interest in speculative questions, and who are satisfied to acquiesce in the common beliefs of science and in the religious beliefs of those among whom they live. On them depends the work of the world, and he did not think it was every man's duty to acquaint himself with all the arguments on all important issues. 'God,' he said, 'has not so made the world that its ordinary business is to be carried on by dialectic.'

Turning to the classes of men who are interested in such inquiries, Mr. Balfour contrasted the shallow and infinitely tiresome sceptics who base an intellectual reputation upon a few materialistic tags with the great doubters from whose ranks have come pillars of orthodoxy, leaders of heresies, framers of systems of speculation, makers of new modes of thought and of new pictures of the universe. Between these two extremes there are many educated persons greatly perplexed about the problems which science, philosophy, and criticism were forcing upon them. Such thinkers would agree with him that a world without God is a world in which aesthetic and ethical values are greatly diminished, but they might argue that their intellectual integrity required them to make the sacrifice. He hoped that his line of argument might suggest to these men some valuable forms of consolation. Their attitude was honourable, but it was mistaken, for it was based upon an entirely false contrast between intellectual and other values. Let them not be misled by the pernicious fallacy that speculative difficulties only begin when we go into supersensible regions under the guidance of hair-splitting metaphysicians. The real speculative difficulties touch our daily life, the very nature of the things on which our daily life depends. Let them remember, too, that the Theistic setting is not required merely for the values of religion and morality; it is an essential condition of all intellectual values, including those of the belief of science.

BELIEF IN GOD.

The real moral of his lectures is, he concluded, that a belief in Theism is not an accidental ornament which can be added or not added to the house in which you live. It cannot be superadded or not superadded to other beliefs, those other beliefs remaining unaffected and unchanged. A Theistic belief is essential on whatever values we cast our eyes; and for the retention of these values alike in beauty, in morality, and in science there is if we want to retain these values undiminished, but one setting. The setting is a belief in God.

Mr. Balfour's second series of Gifford lectures will probably be delivered in January, 1915.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes: "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that must is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiawar, India.

Our increasing output

bears witness to the ever-growing demand for our products for Cricket, Tennis, Hockey and all games. Sportsmen realize that "the Perfecta" quality is unequalled. Graceful in design, they are lightly yet strongly made, giving pleasure to every user.

At the same time we make other qualities—to suit every pocket and can surely please you. Many hundreds of Clubs and thousands of individual players are using our goods to-day.

be placed on the table in two or three days. It is, says the journal, unanimous with the entirely harmonious relations which existed between the Commissioners and Sir Benjamin Robertson, whose services were invaluable, greatly facilitating the adjustment of differences. The Commission will recommend the abolition of the three pound licence, settlement of the marriage difficulty, and removal of many irritations of the Immigration Act, and predicts corresponding legislation, as the Union Government is most anxious to assist the Imperial and Indian Governments in obtaining a final settlement. The Times correspondent forecasts legislation on the lines already indicated. The marriage difficulty, he says, will be solved by admitting one wife from India and making valid marriage with one wife in Indian marriages in South Africa, while not interfering with the liberty of Indians to take wives according to their own religion, though additional wives will not have rights attaching to wives registered under South African law.

In a leading article, the Times says that a compromise on the lines of the Commission's report will be honourable to both sides, and extremely advantageous to the prosperity of South Africa and the welfare of the Empire.

Mr. Munnik has withdrawn his motion with reference to the presence of Indians within the Union.

London, Mar. 20.

According to telegram from Johannesburg to the Daily Telegraph a Mohamedan deputation recently waited upon Sir Benjamin Robertson and requested that Government would recognise the religious aspect of the marriage, divorce and succession laws according to the Koran. They said that Mohamedans would accept nothing less. Sir B. Robertson while sympathising with the deputation twitted them with their long silence. He said that he would lay their request before the Viceroy, but held out no hope. It would be unfair, he declared, to ask the Union Government to change the laws.

The deputation begged Sir B. Robertson to thank the Viceroy for his efforts on their behalf and to assure him that whether the law was passed to suit them or not they would always be loyal to the King and the Flag.

London, Mar. 16.

The Senate of the University of London has appointed a Committee to advise upon the re-organisation of the Imperial studies in London and the creation of a Department of Imperial Studies. The Committee includes Lord Roseberry, Viscount Bryce, Viscount Hambledon, Sir Krishna Gupta, Sir Harry Johnston, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir Charles Lyall, Sir Theodore Morison, and Professor Hearnshaw.

Wife's Revenge.

Paris, Mar. 16.

The wife of the Minister, M. Caillaux, went to-day to the office of the Figaro, which has been vigorously attacking M. Caillaux's policy and fired several revolver shots at the Editor, M. Calmette, wounding him. He is in a critical condition.

Madame Caillaux sent word to M. Calmette that a lady acquaintance wished to see him, but refused to give her name. She waited in the ante-room for half an hour, and then the porter conducted her to M. Calmette's office. Directly she entered, she opened fire without a word.

M. Calmette had risen to receive the visitor, and collapsed into the armchair with two wounds in the region of the heart and one in the stomach.

A bulletin has been issued stating that M. Calmette is wounded in the chest, pelvis, and upper thigh. Prognosis is reserved.

London Mar. 17.

Mr. Calmette has been conveyed to a nursing home. Madame Caillaux is at the police station whither her husband at once went on learning what had occurred. The affair has caused a tremendous sensation.

Later.

M. Calmette is dead.

M. Caillaux has resigned.

Paris has been excited for days by a newspaper duel between M. Calmette and M. Caillaux. The former's animus was always marked and culminated in charges reflecting on the personal honour of M. Caillaux, whom he accused of using his position in the endeavour to obtain huge sums from the Radical party fund and of changing his opinions on income-tax.

M. Calmette was leaving the office with the novelist, M. Bourget, when he received a card from Madame Caillaux. The latter in the coolest possible manner followed the editor into his room and immediately opened fire upon him with a Browning pistol. Calmette fell at the first shot and Madame Caillaux calmly fired four more. Journalists poured into room. They heard Calmette muttering "I only did my duty."

Madame Caillaux, who was a leader of society and a noted beauty told the Police Magistrate afterwards that she only wanted to wound Calmette, that she regretted the act, and would be pleased to hear that her victim was out of danger. She said that she bought the pistol yesterday afternoon.

When M. Caillaux left the police station, a mob rushed forward brandishing sticks and umbrellas and shouting "Down with the assassin," and crowds marched along boulevards crying "Down with Caillaux."

The Mediterranean Problem.

London, Mar. 19.

In the Commons yesterday in Committee on the Naval Estimates, Mr. Aubrey Herbert moved a resolution demanding the maintenance of an adequate force in the Mediterranean in view of the present strategic and political situation and need for protecting the route to India. In reply Sir Edward Grey made a general statement regarding the British policy. He said Mr. Churchill's provision for the Mediterranean could not be described as an abandonment of that position. With reference to Turkey he pointed out that the Government had used diplomatic influence to preserve the Turkish Empire. There had been no financial boycotting of Turkey so far as we were concerned Government could not press British financiers to lend money to Turkey. We had had most explicit assurances from the Turkish Government in the last few weeks that it desires to put its house in order and so do nothing to upset the peace of Europe. If it were found that Greece was fortifying the islands ceded to her in the Aegean, the British Government would sympathise with and acquiesce in any measures adopted by the Powers to prevent the islands being used as a base against Turkey, and would do their best to protect Turkey. The motion was withdrawn.

Indian Reserves.

London, Mar. 18.

Mr. Roberts, replying the House of Commons to-day to Sir Scott Robertson, said that the total amount of gold now held in London in the Paper Currency Reserve and the Gold Standard Reserve is £10,420,000 sterling.

At the rate of interest earned in the past year by the interest-bearing portion of the Gold Standard Reserve, a sum of £10,420,000 would earn £840,801 per annum, but of the gold in question £6,190,000 which is part of the Paper Currency Reserve could not, under the existing currency law, be held otherwise than in metallic form. It was decided in 1912 to increase the amount of gold in the Gold Standard Reserve to five millions. The question when and by how much it shall be further increased is under consideration.

With reference to the recommendations of the Chamberlain Commission, Sir Scott Robertson asked: "Was it not conceivable, in the event of a financial crisis in London, that Indian gold might be employed?"

Mr. Roberts: "I think it is not conceivable that these reserve belonging to India would be used except in the interest of India herself."

Cawnpore Mosque.

Cawnpore, Mar. 17.

The Lieutenant-Governor, during his stay here yesterday, met the trustees of the Cawnpore mosque and discussed with them the plans for the proposed additions to the Mosque, about which there is considerable difference of opinion. The Raja of Mahmudabad was also in Cawnpore yesterday.

Future of India.

London, Mar. 18.

The Reverend Mr. Andrews addressed the East and West Society yesterday evening. He spoke of the heroic conduct of Bengali students during the Burdwan floods, the social service in the Punjab by the Arya Samaj, and the noble self-discipline of the Gurukula at Hardwar. He had found the same spirit among the Indians in South Africa, and saw a great destiny before India, which would be known in the future by her achievements in the moral and spiritual spheres. The education of India's children on the highest indigenous lines was the greatest task before all true lovers of India in the present generation.

Indians in South Africa.

The Viceroy on the Commissioner's Report.

The Viceroy's Appreciation.

SPAKING after the lunch interval at the meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council on the 17th March, the Viceroy said: "Before resuming the business of the Council I am anxious to avail myself of this opportunity to give to hon. members all the information in my possession on a subject which has recently occupied the very serious attention of the Government of India, that is to say the troubles that have arisen in South Africa in connection with the treatment of Indians in that country. This Council will recollect that in consequence of the outbreak of passive resistance and of the strikes in Natal in the month of November last the South African Government appointed a Commission to investigate the causes of the disturbances in Natal and to formulate proposals for dealing with the alleged grievances of the Indian population. That Commission was presided over by a judge of the Supreme Court assisted by two members and a forecast of their conclusions was made public yesterday in the daily Press. The report of the Commission has been laid on the table of the Union Parliament at 2 o'clock to-day and I should now like to explain in fuller detail to my Council, the significance of the Commission's report."

THE £3 TAX.

In the first place the Commission recommend the repeal of Section 6 of an Act passed by Natal Government, No. 17 of 1895, which imposed on indentured Indians who have completed their service of indenture and failed either to re-indenture or to return to India, an annual licence tax of £3. I do not desire to weary the Council with a complete history of the negotiations between the Natal Government and the Government of India in 1894 and subsequent years which preceded the imposition, and subsequent modification of the tax. Its imposition arose from the fear entertained by the Natal Government that indentured Indians on completion of their indenture, would settle in that colony in such numbers as to form an embarrassing problem to those interested in the future of the country. The Government of India at that time desired to secure the continuance of emigration to Natal as forming a valuable outlet for the surplus agricultural population while maintaining that failure to return to India or to re-indenture at the end of the original indenture period should not entail criminal prosecution and the penalties that are ordinarily attached to breaches of the criminal law. From this point of view the action subsequently taken by the Natal Government, that is to say the imposition of a £3 tax on those who failed to re-indenture, or to return to India after the expiry of the period of the original contract, was considered to be the most reasonable solution of a very difficult question. Modifications in the £3 tax have been made from time to time by legislation with the object amongst others of exempting such women as were not in a position to pay. But it has been felt for some time that the tax was undesirable and burdensome and since the complete cessation by order of the Government of India in 1911 of all indentured immigration to Natal, the retention of this tax and its capricious enforcement, even though it is not levied on more than a small number of those liable, has been a constant source of irritation among Indians in Natal. When the Immigration Act of 1913 was passed it was hoped in many quarters that the occasion might be utilised to repeal this objectionable impost, but this unfortunately was not done. The Government of India welcome the recommendation of the Commission for the repeal of the tax and although they fully realise that the Government of South Africa are not definitely committed to the findings of the Commission they earnestly hope that the Government of the Union may accept this proposal and give effect to it at the earliest possible date by means of the necessary legislation.

THE POSITION OF WOMEN.

Next in importance to this question of the repeal of the £3 tax, there is the necessity of providing by some form of legislation for the position of women either in South Africa or desiring to enter South Africa who are married to Indians by a form of union which is not at present recognised by the laws of that country. The South African legislature has hitherto shown disinclination to give any form of legal recognition to marriages performed according to the rites of any religion which permits the practice of polygamy. This attitude has been necessarily extremely embarrassing to Indians in South Africa whether married to one or more wives who desired to obtain recognition for at least one wife. The report of the Commission contains numerous recommendations intended to meet the reasonable requirements of Mohammedans and Hindus in respect of this difficulty. The substance of their recommendations is that a law should be passed providing for the appointment of marriage officers from amongst the Indian priests of different denominations whose duty it would be to solemnise future marriages in accordance with the religion of parties to the transaction and duly to register the same. Only one marriage in each case can be solemnised and registered and it will then have the great advantage of ranking entirely with any other marriage contracted under the laws of the Union. Existing actual monogamous marriages are to be similarly recognised by this law and further provision is to be made for the admission into the Union, along with her minor children of one wife in the case of any Indian who is married according to the tenets of his religion, whether it recognises polygamy or not outside the Union of South Africa, provided that she is the only wife in the country. Further, and this I venture to think is a very noteworthy and important proposal, it is recommended that Indians after registering one wife in the manner to which I have already referred, should not be debarred in any way from contracting other marriages according to their own religious rites, though it will of course be impossible to accord to such marriages any form of legal recognition whatsoever.

MINOR GRIEVANCES.

Next the Commission have dealt with some minor grievances which formed the subject of protest on the part of the Indian population in South Africa against the recently enacted Immigration Act. They have recommended that a clause in the Act, which repeats the provisions of a law of the Orange Free State directed against the immigration of Asiatics should, I understand, be made unobjectionable by the issue of executive orders of a nature calculated to remove all cause for dissatisfaction. Also that certain existing restrictions with regard to the issue of certificates enabling Indian residents in South Africa to leave the country and to return within a stated period should be modified in a very favourable manner. Measures are also recommended for increasing the facilities for the issue of permits to those Indians who desire to visit the Union for temporary purposes.

RECOMMENDATIONS "COMPLETE AND SATISFACTORY."

In these recommendations I find a very complete and satisfactory attempt to arrive at a final solution of the difficulties that have arisen in South Africa and I should like to take this opportunity of expressing the warm appreciation of the Government of India of the broad and statesmanlike manner in which these difficult questions have been approached and dealt with by the Commission. I believe the presence and active co-operation of Sir Benjamin Robertson, to whom we are indebted for his firm and conciliatory attitude, has very materially contributed to the formulation of these proposals and I feel confident that if, as I sincerely hope will be the case, they are adopted by the Union Government and combined with sympathetic administration of the existing laws, they should undoubtedly lead to a lasting settlement. The Commission of Enquiry regretted very greatly that the Indians, for reasons to which I need not refer, failed to appear before them and to give evidence, not only on the questions with which I have dealt but in connection with the various cases of ill-treatment which were alleged to have occurred at the time the Commission was appointed. I share that regret and I cannot help thinking that the Indians would have been better advised had they accepted the counsel I tendered to them in my speech in Calcutta in December last when I strongly urged that they should appear before the Commission and give their evidence on all matters that were referred to that tribunal for enquiry. The Commission, though labouring under some disadvantage as a result of this abstinence, have framed their recommendations on broad and liberal lines and should the South African Government give effect to these recommendations by legislation I sincerely trust that the settlement thus embodied in the law will be accepted in this country by all loyal subjects of His Majesty the King-Emperor.

Our London Letter.

London, 27th Feb.

FERID BEY ENTERTAINED IN LONDON.

The Leader of the Egyptian Nationalist Party, Ferid Bey, who came to London to take part in the Nationalities and Subject Races Conference last week, was entertained at the Savoy Hotel on the 21st inst. by the Sphinx Society.

In 1912 Ferid Bey had made a speech to which the Egyptian Government took exception, and the outcome was that sentence of three years' penal servitude was duly passed upon him in his absence. Previous to that, the Leader of the Egyptian Nationalist Party had already undergone a term of six months' imprisonment for writing a preface to a book of poems. He has since made Paris his headquarters and his presence in London on this occasion, as I have already said, is due to the annual Session of the above Conference, which, among other subjects, has discussed the "Press Laws in India and Egypt," with which I dealt in my letter of last week.

Hilmi Effendi, the President of the Sphinx Society, in an admirable speech, described the guest of the evening as a "democrat who believes in national and individual freedom and has sacrificed wealth and liberty and suffered banishment from his noble home for the cause he places above all others."

Ferid Bey, who was received with loud cheers on rising to reply, demanded the complete independence of Egypt from all foreign Powers. He foretold that the Nationalist Party would be very much to the fore at the next elections. "Egypt for the Egyptians," he declared amidst loud and prolonged cheers, "was still their motto and their war-cry."

A very large gathering was present at the reception.

THE LONDON MOSLEM LEAGUE.

In order to promote social intercourse and free and informal exchange of views between the members and the Committee, the Executive of the London Moslem League have wisely decided to entertain the general body of members in periodical social gatherings. The first of these functions was held at the League's Offices in Sloane Street on Wednesday, the 25th inst. Almost all the members of the League attended and every one of the Committee members, in addition to Mr. Ameer Ali himself, was present. The enthusiasm thus shown by the members, who have hitherto been members only in name, speaks well for the future career of the London League. So far the Young Moslems, who were members of the League in London, have been justly and rightly complaining of the utter indifference with which they were being treated by the Committee. They were absolutely out of touch with the proceedings of the League as well as with the 'personnel' of the managing Body, which, in their name, had been conducting the affairs of the London League. Perhaps the only occasion on which they met the office-bearers and the Committee was at the annual meetings of the League in the summer. Even then the purely academical character of such meetings would hardly enable the general body of members to get into that personal touch and personal contact with the Executive so essential in an association of this nature.

The series of social functions, which, as mentioned above, were inaugurated so successfully last Wednesday, will certainly go a long way to achieve the desired object. The senior members of the London League have evidently realised the necessity and the importance of gaining the confidence of the younger members, who form the rank and file of the whole organisation and are thus the very backbone of the League itself. There can certainly be no "leaders" if there is no "following" and nobody could deny, not even Mr. Ameer Ali and his supporters, that for the League in London to be able to speak with due authority, it is absolutely necessary and essential for the President and Committee to thus consult the opinion and the views of the bulk of its members, if not the whole League, as to be able to adequately interpret and echo their sentiments in matters of policy. The London League could only then become a living institution in the proper sense of the term, and it could thus be enabled to discharge its undoubtedly important duties in a manner worthy of the great Mussalman community of India.

I understand the Committee are also contemplating the holding of small informal dinners from time to time for the same reasons. Such functions, which it is hoped all the members of the League here will consider it their duty to attend, will further tend to the promotion of harmony and concord between the President and Committee on the one hand and the private members on the other and cannot fail to produce excellent results. Members can, on such occasions, give free expression to their views and ideas and offer any material criticisms they may think fit as to the actual working of the League. The Executive will likewise have the opportunity of offering such explanations as may be necessary as to their policy and the mutual understanding thus brought about will certainly lead to the common good and welfare of the League, the successful administration of which every thinking Indian Moslem has so much at heart.

The present younger generation of Indian Moslems in London, consisting almost exclusively of students, is fully alive to its responsibilities and duties. They are studying the great problems which are facing their community and their country with deep attention and earnestness. They are following the current events in the present history of India with no little concern. They are preparing themselves to serve the community in future disinterestedly and devotedly. It is, therefore, perfectly reasonable that even in their present transient stage they should claim to exercise an adequate degree of co-operation in the affairs of the League in London. Some of them are, no doubt, destined to take a leading and honourable part in the future public life of India. They may be a little impatient occasionally, but nobody, who has been in close touch with them, would at all hesitate to describe them as a "sober, level-minded and far-seeing lot" of young men.

Mr. Ameer Ali has a splendid opportunity before him at the moment. His eminent literary services to Islam and his varied and long experience of communal affairs, both in India and England, have given him a unique position in the Moslem world. The young Moslems in London have always treated him with due respect and admiration. They are only too willing to look up to him for advice and instruction, for which he is so well qualified. Due sympathy and encouragement from him would go a long way in winning over the young and perhaps inexperienced, though thoroughly sincere, members of the League. Differences of opinion in Committee can be soothed by sound argument and mutual but courteous give and take on both sides. The usual amount of laxity ordinarily allowed to a President will, of course, never be grudged to Mr. Ameer Ali by the young Moslem. On the contrary, from what I have been myself able to realise, they are only too anxious to extend to him all respect due to his position and all freedom of action as their President, but they would like to feel that, in taking any such action, Mr. Ameer Ali would consider himself as their spokesman. And after all no one could justly accuse the young Moslems of any unreasonable or extreme demand. However there are indications that League in London is going in future to be worked on popular lines, as suggested by the Aga Khan, and the President and his Committee are to be heartily congratulated on having at last given way to the cherished feelings of the community. The scheme they have adopted for the purpose of popularising the London League, referred to above, will commend itself to all those who have the true interest of the Association at heart. A new era is thus being opened in the history of the London League, which, if conducted honestly and conscientiously, will develop into a powerful and truly representative institution, worthy of the great Moslem community of India and equally worthy of this great Capital of the Empire, where it is so rightly situated.

THE TRAFFIC IN HONOURS.

The recent debate in the House of Lords, initiated by Lord Selborne, dealing with the question of "honours" in England, cannot fail to interest those who are familiar with the system of distributing titles in India to "worthy" sons of the soil. In this country, of course, as is well known, the Prime Minister of the day recommends the persons to His Majesty for the various honours, and this is almost always done on purely party lines. The recipients are generally people with long purses, who are contributors of large sums of money to the Party Funds. The Lords' debate was "supposed" to be a purely disinterested non-party discussion, though, reading between the lines, one could easily detect the detestable party spirit underlying their lordships' speeches.

It is true we have no "party system" in India, but the bestowal of honours there has nevertheless been carried on in an equally disgraceful manner. It is very seldom that we find in the usual Honours List names of people, who have been rewarded entirely on their own personal merits or that the recipients of such favours have been really distinguished citizens of the country, of which their fellow-countrymen could justly feel proud and whose genuine services to the community, in various walks of life, one could rightly appreciate. In the long list of titled nobility and decorated aristocracy there are, of course, honourable exceptions, but unfortunately such exceptions are few and far between. It is only fair to this deserving minority as well as to the interest of the purity of public life in India that the existing practice should cease. Let science, literature, arts and public service be rewarded by all means, but do not allow ulterior motives underly the distribution of such rewards. Then and only then could public opinion in India fully realise the proper value of such Imperial recognitions, and not until then could the bearers of such titles honestly and conscientiously appreciate the full significance of their rewards.

The Times of yesterday contains a letter on this question, the writer of which—under the pseudonym of "Pandion"—appears to be fully aware of the real facts in India. I cannot do better than reproduce his own words:—

Sir,—In the debate in the House of Lords, Lord Lansdowne said that in regard to the honours conferred upon the Sovereign's Indian subjects he did not think there was a word to be said. The statement may be applicable enough to the time when Lord Lansdowne was in India, but it does not bear examination to-day. In recent years titles of English origin have been bought and sold in India. It is not the Viceroys, but the heads of certain provincial administrations who have been to blame. The price has not been contributions to party funds, but heavy subscriptions to various public enterprises and institutions in which minor setraps happen to have been interested. I regret to add, however, that there have been instances in which politicians in England have not disdained to negotiate with Indians for help to party funds.

The result is that in India to-day there is a widespread and justifiable belief that the fountain of honour can be tapped at a price. Some Indians hold titles which are the well-earned reward of long and honourable service to their country and to the Empire: but others owe their dignities to nothing but a long purse.

THE PERSIA COMMITTEE.

A meeting of Persia Committee was held at the House of Commons yesterday. Among those present were Dr. Chapple, Mr. T. E. Harvey, Mr. A. C. Morton, Mr. Philip Morell, and Mr. A. Ponsonby. Lord Lamington was re-elected President, and Prof. E. G. Browne, Chairman of the Committee. A resolution was passed expressing regret for the severe loss sustained by the death of the late chairman, Mr. H. F. B. Lynch, who had devoted himself to the cause of Persian independence and integrity. Attention was drawn to the grave menace to the integrity of Persia caused by the continued presence of Shuja-ed-Dowleh as the self-constituted Governor of Azerbaijan, and it was resolved to urge the Government to use their influence to extend the Swedish Gendarmerie into that province, and to secure the withdrawal of the Russian troops.

THE "TIMES."

The Daily Chronicle learns from what it describes as a "reliable source" that The Times will shortly be reduced to a penny-paper. It will not, of course, come as a surprise to those who have been following the recent career of the "national" journal of England. The paper has been gradually though steadily losing its old influence amongst the thinking men and women of this country. In the good old days The Times was justly famous for its independence and its freedom and rightly enjoyed a unique reputation owing to its absolutely non-party character. As a matter of fact, even in the latter part of the Victorian era, the opinions and views expressed in the editorial columns of The Times would be everywhere accepted as the true interpretation of British public opinion, but, alas, circumstances, as usual, have altered the case. This hitherto great journal of Great Britain is now, as once described by a prominent member of the present British Cabinet, only a "two-penny edition of the Daily Mail." It now belongs to the huge Harmsworth concern, which is presided over by Lord Northcliffe. It is to-day one of the most bitter partisan papers in existence in the Conservative world and as regards its attitude on Eastern questions in general and Indian problems in particular, your readers need no further enlightenment on the subject. Sometimes, it must be frankly admitted, even The Pioneer of Allahabad and the The Times of India of Bombay must humbly take off their hats to this powerful contemporary of theirs in London for its superior and more genuine loyalty to the Anglo-Indian policy, of which they are such noisy advocates.

TETE À TETE

LAST week we had to record the enlistment of nine new subscribers and the discontinuance of fifteen; but we had pointed out that this was only for the week ending on 12th March, by which time our appeal could not have produced any appreciable effect, so that we could not grieve over it as a "response" to our appeal. There were indications, however, that we had not appealed in vain, and we alluded to two letters which we had received last Saturday. During the week ending 19th instant the promise of the first day or two was kept, and while we have to record nine cases of discontinuance, we have been glad to record no less than twenty-four cases of enlistment of fresh subscribers. This is, no doubt, encouraging in a way, but the response must be far more prompt and from many more quarters than has yet been the case. We shall quote only one instance to show what a single honorary canvasser can do. From the "unpromising district" to which we had referred last week we received four fresh subscribers again this week. Now if one man can do this in less than a fortnight in an unpromising place what can several thousand not do in a month's time in more promising places? Should the hope of 2000 fresh subscribers be considered extravagant in that case? We think we have earned some title to beg for ourselves by having successfully begged for others. As regards those whose names have been removed this week from the list of subscribers, it may interest our supporters to know that we have hopes of being able to re-enlist some of them as it appears that in some cases the V. P. packets were returned without the knowledge of the addressees. In some cases the Hamdard has ousted The Comrade while in others some subscribers have begun to share The Comrade with others who have asked us to discontinue their copies. Only in one case has a subscriber desired the discontinuance of the paper on account of its delays in 1913. Now in this last case we certainly sympathise with our subscriber, and our apologies have been sincere even if they have also been numerous. But we fear our subscriber has not sympathised with us as he should have done. When one man sets out to the work of a dozen, it is certain that he could not do it as well as a dozen would do. Something must be below the standard of efficiency, and when we were engrossed in work which was not ours only but of all the Mussalmans of India, it is a wonder that our own journalistic work did not show a much greater falling off. It would have been kind of our less indulgent subscribers to have shared our labours at the time and set us free for The Comrade. But they did not, and as a matter of fact encouraged us to persist in all we were attempting, and morally, if not legally, they are estopped from voicing a complaint against us for the shortcomings of The Comrade in 1913. As for those who wish us to discontinue sending The Comrade to them because they have commenced sharing somebody else's Comrade with him, will they let us know with whom we are to share the expenses of the production of The Comrade. Shall we apply to Government for a subsidy, give weekly puffs to "territorial magnates" and such other "natural leaders of the people"? Had we had a long purse we could have afforded to be philanthropic enough to take the Comrade as a propaganda. But we make no complaint that we have not the wealth of a Cresus.

فست بري من به طبيعت بري نهين

Under the circumstances our readers must be our only supporters, as they know we have always relied upon them and only sought their suffrage. Official or semi-official subsidies are not difficult to secure. The trick is an easy one and is within the meanest intelligence. But we think our readers also know something of our limitations.

(I know the reward of obedience and piety, But my nature can not be prevailed upon to incline that way.) If The Comrade does represent the views of a large and important section of the people and is in their estimation discharging the duties which they have imposed upon it, then it is for them to see that the paper is properly financed. It has no capital behind it now, nor did it start on its career with any such capital. Faith and Hope were the only assets and they have served us well hitherto. But Faith must be an easily convertible paper currency, and Hope may do well enough for a Reserve Fund, but cannot cover expenditure nor provide dividends. As a matter of fact one is likely to lose both Faith and Hope if subscribers who can well afford to pay for a copy of The Comrade cease to do so because they have found some one to share it with them. The devout believe that angels fought at Badr and filled the depleted ranks of Islam in its first encounter with the unbelievers. More recently Haji Baghlot, the antithesis of our valued confederate, the Hon. Mr. Gur, has given currency to the view that the number of pilgrims at Mecca is the same every year, angels making up all human deficiency, and that after the pilgrimage of "Political Hajj" all that will happen will be an increase in angelic contingent. We wish we could substitute angelic subscribers for all those who begin to show the far-from angelic tendency to share some other dev—, we mean subscriber's Comrade with him. We hope the Legislature would amend Indian Companies' Act once more and make such joint stock business punishable with transportation for life, or that the Executive would bring it under the provisions of the Press Act "directly or indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor or otherwise."

MR. ZAFAR ALI KHAN writes to us from London as follows:—"The appeal which I circulated to Members of the House of Commons has not been in vain. In addition to Mr. John Dillon, Mr. Keir

The Press Act.

Hardie, Mr. Phillip Snowden, and Mr. Josiah Wedgwood, who had already expressed their sympathy and promised to join in any Parliamentary protest, we have now received the support of Mr. Phillip Morrell and Mr. Rowland Hunt, who are Liberal and Conservative M. P.'s respectively. These two gentlemen took the earliest opportunity on the 24th instant to raise their voices on our behalf, and they received most welcome support from an unexpected quarter—Sir J. D. Rees. Mr. Morrell asked the new Under-Secretary to direct a further inquiry into the question of the Zamindar in view of the fact that the articles complained of contained no expression of seditious views and no incitement whatever to violence and disorder. Mr. Roberts replied that I must appeal to the High Court before the Secretary of State would consider the matter any further, and he refused to answer supplementary questions by Mr. Hunt and Mr. Morrell as to whether there was anything treasonable in the articles or anything but fair comment. It was then the turn of Sir J. D. Rees, who wanted to know whether it was proposed to amend the provisions of the Press Act in view of the judgment of Sir Lawrence Jenkins in the Macedonia Pamphlet case. Mr. Robert's answer was in the negative, and this brought up Mr. Morrell again, who spoke of the dissatisfaction caused by the Act and a number of suppressions, the worthlessness of the appeal, and the desirability of an alteration of the law. This timely speech brought a valuable statement from Mr. Roberts, who said that the hon. member was extending to all actions taken under the Act certain remarks which the Chief Justice of Bengal made with regard to action taken under Section 12. The only possible inference from this is that when action is taken under other Sections the High Court has wider powers. As the confiscation of the "Zamindar" Press and security takes place under Section 6, I shall not fail to take the hint to lodge an appeal in my own case, and I have cabled instructions to my people accordingly. Mr. Morrell also secured a promise that Mr. Roberts would inform the Secretary of State of the views expressed by Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah at the last meeting of All-India Moslem League. We have thus set the ball rolling vigorously, but we must not let it stop. It now requires combined and persistent agitation, and eventually the repeal of the Act is bound to follow." After reproducing the questions and answers to which he refers above Mr. Zafar Ali Khan writes:—"The next question is as to what is to happen in the case of successful appeals. A newspaper property in the great majority of cases receives irreparable damage if its publication is suspended pending an appeal, and it may, indeed, be impossible to restart it. How is that to help the aggrieved party? Is the loss to be made good by the Secretary of State? It is a poor consolation to the owner of the property who may have been reduced to beggary to admit that the action of the officials was arbitrary. Then we have to consider the case "of the unfortunate proprietor who cannot afford the expense of an appeal, and as his paper is gone, he cannot even appeal to his supporters for funds; for be it remembered that it is not every newspaper proprietor who is able to fly in the face of Deputy Commissioners and Lieutenant-Governors and wealthy enough to engage barristers to fight his case. An effective safeguard against the irresponsible action of officials must be provided. We have thus a number of points which must be pressed home to the public and to the Government both in India and in Great Britain. With the help of a number of sympathetic English friends I have been doing all I lay in my power by means of letters and articles in the Press, private interviews with M. P.'s, Editors, and other influential people. The Nationalities and Subject Races Committee held a Conference immediately after the Parliament opened, and they asked me to be the principal speaker on the Indian Press Act. Sir Henry Cotton presided. I took the opportunity to suggest the formation of an Indian Press Defence League, to be supported by British subjects, Indian and European alike. Dr. Rutherford (who, by the way, seems likely soon to return to a seat in the House of Commons) immediately moved a resolution welcoming the proposed League, Mr. William H. Seed seconded it, and it was carried unanimously, Sir Henry Cotton adding his personal word of support. The League is now in process of formation, and its prospects are bright. We are convinced it will be a powerful factor in the situation. It is essential to its success that Hindus and Moslems should work hand in hand in promoting it, and it will not be my fault if they do not do so. Your support and that of your friends is required to make it thoroughly representative. I ask you kindly to help the cause by taking it up in the columns of your paper and in any other way that may be open to you, as it will secure for every paper and Press in India a voice in the Press and Parliament of Great Britain in case they come under the harsh provisions of the Press Act. We have many friends in Parliament, and some eminent journalistic friends also, who are helping to found the League. I welcome the news that a Deputation is coming to England next April to agitate on the subject, and that it will include Messrs. Mazhar-ul-Haque, Gokhale, Jinnah, and Surendra Nath Bannerji. I hope by that time the League will be in full swing and in a position to give them a hearty welcome."

Owing to pressure on our space we have deferred a close and detailed study of the recommendations of the Commission appointed by the Union Government to enquire into the grievances of the Indians in South Africa, nor have we yet received as full a report as it required for a detailed study of the question. The £3 poll tax was of course doomed and no defence of such extortion was possible, and we are glad that the Commission did not undertake the impossible task of defending it. We shall therefore say nothing about it should the action of the Union Government be in conformity with this recommendation of the Commission. But we feel it necessary to say that the recommendation of the Commissioners on the subject of marriage difficulty is unsatisfactory. If the motive of the non recognition of Indian marriages is that fewer Indian women and children should immigrate into South Africa, we can understand the significance of the compromise that only one marriage would be allowed to be registered and recognised. If, on the other hand, there is an abhorrence of polygamy at the bottom of the marriage difficulty, then the compromise is futile, for the South African champions of monogamy refuse to recognise more than one wife and yet permit the polygamous Indian to wed as many as he pleases. That is a poor sort of social reform and we wonder how the Christian conscience of South Africa is going to tolerate it. We are told that monogamy must be the law of Christendom, but nobody has told us why South Africa is part of Christendom. In Natal while the European population in 1908 was only 91,448 the Indian and Asiatic population was 116,679 and the "native" population was nearly a million. In Cape Colony European population is a little over half a million, but the remaining population is three times as much. The proportion of Europeans to others in the Transvaal is 1 to 4 and in Orange Free State 1 to 2. If all Europeans may be presumed to be Christians, even then heathenism and other religions are in an overwhelming majority. We may be told that population offers no test as regards describing any country as part of Christendom and that such a test is supplied by the fact that Christians rule in South Africa. If that view be correct, we should like to ask for a definition of toleration. Mussalman at his very worst did not tolerate the worship of three gods when he is ruled over by Christians. The Christian at his best refuses to tolerate devotion to four wives. Which was the more awful and pernicious heresy of the two, we leave the world to judge. But there is not the least doubt that between the spirits of the non-recognition of three gods and four wives there is no more to choose than between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. Let none of our readers mistake us for advocates of polygamy under all circumstances. Only the married can appreciate single blessedness, and he was a genius who likened matrimony to a besieged citadel. Those who are out want to get in and those who are in want to get out. That being the case our tolerance of polygamy must be the tolerance of an institution which has to satisfy the requirements of every kind of circumstance imaginable. Wherever law has permitted polygamy, fact has put its veto in the majority of cases; and it is the glory of Islam that it alone among all the religions in the world sets a limit on the plurality of wives. No other religion has done it, although the civil law of European countries has supplied this deficiency in Christianity as a religious code of laws; but even this has gone far beyond the necessary limits and has given to the institution of marriage a rigidity which should not characterize laws made for all human beings. The result has been that Europe is not satisfied with its institution of marriage, and it is the perpetual theme of novelists who propound problems of life and attempt the solution in the form of stories. When Europe is itself in this state of discontent it is strange that Europeans in South Africa should impose their own marriage laws on people who are neither Europeans nor Christians. As we said before the ideal of monogamy will not be benefited to any appreciable extent by the proposed compromise, but an endless trouble would be caused to polygamous Indians in the matter of succession and inheritance. The matter is too serious to be settled by the "twitting" of a Mohammedan deputation in Johannesburg by Sir Benjamin Robertson on the score of "their long silence." We thank Sir Benjamin for all that he has done for our countrymen, but if he thinks that so important a matter can be settled so easily he is much mistaken. The argument of "Moslem leeches" should by now be quite familiar to us all, but familiarity must have produced the proverbial feeling. We shall refer to this question at a greater length in a subsequent issue and have written this only to ensure that we too are not accused of laches and twitted by Sir Benjamin Robertson.

THE readers of The Comrade have not perhaps forgotten the Sakhawat Memorial School for Girls at Calcutta in the fortunes of which we tried more than once, and not without success, to interest them. The late Mr. Malabari sent a contribution himself and got others to help it too, and we believe Her Highness the Begum Sahiba of Bhopal also assisted the institution with characteristic generosity when she visited Calcutta two years ago. Mrs. Sakhawat Husain is the widow of a Deputy Magistrate of Behar who died quite young and left a generous endowment for Mohammedan girls' education in which he and his wife were deeply interested. This high-minded lady not only carried out the wishes of her husband by starting a girls' school in Calcutta under strict purdah arrangement, but has devoted all her time and a good deal of her own money to the school. One could not but praise her courage when, in spite of the failure of the Burma Bank in which a good portion, if not the whole, of the endowment had been deposited, she resolved to carry on the school. We must confess the Mussalmans of Calcutta did not support her courageous and persistent efforts as they should have done, but her own determination met every discouragement and overcame a host of difficulties, and when we left Calcutta we felt certain that nothing would daunt her. Such examples are rare even among the sex that claims a sort of monopoly of courage and determination, but when one finds it one need not despair of the ultimate triumph of so determined and bold an endeavour. About this time last year we read in the Statesman of the opening of another purdah school which owed its existence to that talented lady, Suhrawardya Begum (Mrs. Zuhad-ur-Rahim Zahid). We must confess we prefer a large number of small girls' schools dotted all over a big city to one large school, for under the special social circumstances of the Moslem Community in India it is easier to manage a number of small girls schools, than to manage a single large school, and Moslem parents more readily trust their girls to a neighbouring small school managed by some one whom they know. We therefore rejoiced to hear of the rise of this new school and we felt sure that the talents of Suhrawardya Begum would be well utilised in such an institution. The Statesman of 18th February 1913 stated that the opening ceremony was performed by Mrs. Maynard and the Habul matin of the 29th February gave a portion of the speech of Suhrawardya Begum on the occasion of the opening of the school. In the course of this speech, however, Suhrawardya Begum seems to have ignored the existence of the Sakhawat Memorial School and of the brave sister who had been carrying on this school with so much self-sacrifice and determination. But we attributed this to the requirements of rhetoric, for when we indulge in jeremiads we cannot always pause to be accurate. But the Statesman of a year later took our breath away when we read that on the occasion of the "annual prize distribution" of the same school Suhrawardya Begum announced that the cost of upkeep of the school "during the five years of its existence" had been borne by herself. Now if the school was founded on the 16th of February 1913 it will take some time to understand how it could have been in existence for five years on the 28rd of February 1914. We also read of "the speaker's struggle and the difficulty of her task in attempting to remove from the eyes of Mussalmans the veil of prejudice and the bondage of ignorance and to emancipate their minds from the thralldom of bigotry and self-conceit." It appears that Suhrawardya Begum's address closed with a pathetic appeal to Her Excellency Lady Carmichael who attended the function and to other ladies present on the occasion. She said: "I appeal to Your Excellency and the ladies present here to-day not to let my humble efforts die with me but to induce someone to come forward to take up the cause of the women of Islam." This evidently touched the hearts of all present and, according to the Statesman's report, "Her Excellency briefly expressed her admiration and sympathy with the work of Suhrawardya Begum and exhorted her not to lose heart but to continue her efforts to make the girls of the Mohamedan community better mothers, better daughters and better wives." Now there is something peculiar in all this for, although we were near neighbours when we were in Calcutta only a year and a half ago, we never heard of a Suhrawardya Purda-nashin Madrasa for Moslem Girls, and unless the Statesman and the Hablat-matin both lied badly last year nothing short of a miracle could have made an institution founded last year of five years of age. A correspondent from Calcutta writes to us to say that "it is curious that in the list published yearly by the Education Department of all schools (both recognised and unrecognised by Government) in Calcutta and the Mofussil there is no mention of this school. In the list of educational institutions published in Thacker's Directory this institution is not to be found nor is there any trace of it in the 'Street Directory of the aforesaid publication.'" With reference to the statement that 104 girls had attended the school during the year he informs us that "it is a physical impossibility for so many girls to be accommodated in such a small building as the school has at 'No. 2 Beparitolla Lane, just behind the old Pumping Station at 'Wellington Square. To those who have seen the building it appears to be just large enough to contain only a quarter or a third of the number stated." Nothing could give us greater pleasure than the success of Suhrawardya Begum's endeavours and, if 104 girls have joined her school within a year of its foundation, we see no reason why she should talk of people letting her efforts die with her. But we must frankly say that we detest the very idea of self-advertisement on the part of our sisters for, as it is, our brothers are doing a little too much of it, and it may well be left to them as a special prerogative of the males. Purdah and modesty in all its forms should go together, and no one has much sympathy with the purdahnashin of whom Iqbal wrote:

یہ کہ پردے میں بی پردہ ہوی جانی

We are sure that Suhrawardya Begum whose abilities would do credit to any man would be the last to approve of such a type of woman, and we are inclined to think that in giving the report of the Prize Distribution ceremony some one has blundered. Suhrawardya Begum need not despair, for honest efforts seldom die with the person that makes them. Let us not talk of graves, but think of the perseverance of fellow-workers like Mrs. Sakhawat Husain, who has been doing a good deal of solid work quietly and without hope of any public reward.

Verse.

False Life.

Wouldst make God-gifted Life a glittering show,
And in false Seeming centre all delight ?
Wouldst thou, in Nature's and in God's despite Let thy soul's darker passions overthrow Its tranquil joys ? What charms from Virtue flow.
What motives pure the generous soul invite
To self-denial, what the heavenly light
In thee demands, wouldst thou disdain to know ?
The greed of wealth, the lust of rank and power,
Wouldst thou let these thy withering heart devour,
And mar the sweet serenity of life ?
Or let false aims and false desires control
Each wayward impulse and corrupt the soul ?
Behold thy gains—the bitter fruit of strife !

NIZAMAT JANG,

The Comrade.

A Moslem Ruler on Aligarh.

I.

ONE can have very little sympathy with theories that are entirely divorced from practice, and on the whole it is true that a long continued practice undermines a most deeply rooted theory to the contrary and finally destroys it. But it is an interesting philosophical speculation whether practice reacts more powerfully on theory or theory reacts more powerfully on practice. Indeed, some root-ideas have such a vitality that they survive even persistent and almost invariable practice to the contrary and finally mould it after the pattern of the original theory. Such a root-idea is the democratic spirit of Islam which has survived centuries of despotic rule throughout the Moslem world. Indeed, it is not often that one can put one's finger on any period of democratic government in Islam after the rule of the first four Caliphs, but so extraordinarily tenacious of life has been the principle of democracy which was practiced by the Prophet of Islam and his first four successors that even in the worst period of despotism, when the best of Mussalmans had to bow the head and bend the knee before tyrants, they clung all the more eagerly to the idea of that distant and short-lived democracy of the glorious days of Islam and dreamt through the miseries of the time of a millennium when once more their practice would conform to the divine behest

(And their affairs were decided by consultation among themselves.)

India has been emerging since the establishment of the British Rule from despotism into democracy ; but although she must be grateful to England for this change in the spirit of her government, Indian Mussalmans have found in the change nothing to which they could not readily reconcile themselves, for democracy has always meant to them a reversion to the practice of the earliest days of Islam. These are undoubtedly democratic days in spite of all the cheap sneers of some of our Anglo-Indian contemporaries, and having found their voice the educated section of the Mussalmans will not be silenced by any prince or potentate unless, it finds it more profitable for the entire community to hear and to obey than to be heard and to be obeyed. Nowhere in the world can one rob wealth and social rank of the consideration that is paid to them, and so young indeed is democracy in India that her Princes and territorial magnates will find the world hanging on their words for a long time yet to come. But much will henceforward depend on the words themselves which drop from the lips of Indian Princes and territorial magnates, and although even to-day their names are to be found amongst the foremost leaders of Indian Mussalmans, it is a happy augury for the future that these leaders of Indian Mussalmans maintain their position not by their wealth and social rank, but by their love of the people and their wise and wholly disinterested direction of popular affairs.

Her Highness the Begum Saheba of Bhopal occupies a unique position among Indian Mussalmans inasmuch as she is not only separated from the commonalty by the richness and extent of her possessions, but also by the rigid conventions prescribed in a by-gone age for her sex. But in spite of these disabilities, she has found her way into the hearts of her people, because her own conception of her position has not been that of a princess far removed from the occupations, haunts and ideas of the people, nor even of a preacher holding forth from a high pulpit to sinning masses far below her who deserve reams of sermons yet not a syllable of sympathy, but of one who is of the people, and must live with the people and for the people. Those who have been privileged to know Her Highness for any length of time have had ample opportunities of being able to testify to this, but even casual observers could not have failed to note that no one has appealed to her for assistance in a good cause and has failed to receive a hearty and a generous response.

Aligarh has benefitted in many ways from the generosity of Her Highness, but in our estimation Her Highness's latest gift to Aligarh far exceeds in value anything which it has owed to her generosity. She was the recipient during her recent visit to Aligarh of three important addresses by three important bodies, namely, the Educational Conference, the Aligarh College and the Girls School, and the advice that she gave on the affairs of these three institutions in the course of her replies to their addresses will prove of inestimable value if it is taken to heart and followed in the spirit in which it was offered. Her Highness has not preached homilies of the nature of those to which Indian Mussalmans in general and Aligarh in particular were becoming somewhat used in recent days. She has evidently studied the cases carefully ; she has rescued the real issues from a mass of trivialities more or less irrelevant and likely to warp judgment ; and she has judged impartially, with the result that where she has permitted herself to criticise, her criticism goes to the root of the matter and cannot be lightly treated.

In reply to the address of the Central Committee of the Mohammedan Educational Conference, Her Highness pointedly drew attention to the paucity of Local Committees and expressed a doubt whether such Local Committees as were in existence were doing their work satisfactorily. A perusal of the Conference's Annual Reports had created in Her Highness's mind the well-founded suspicion that the Conference had established more Sections than it had been able to organise effectively and Her Highness laid her finger on the weakest spot in the Constitution of the Conference, namely the absence of a well recognised relationship between the Central Committee and the various Sections.

Sahibzada Aftab Ahmed Khan has been the Honorary Joint Secretary of the Conference for many years now, and during all this time the control of the Honorary Secretary, who is of course the Honorary Secretary of the Board of Trustees of the Aligarh College, has been nothing more than nominal. The Constitution of the Conference provides for a periodical change in the personnel of the Central Committee and the Constitution of the Aligarh College provides for a similar change in the office of the Honorary Secretary. But apparently the office of the Joint Secretary of the Conference is immune from such changes inasmuch as no rule has yet been framed with reference to the election of that office. Sahibzada Aftab Ahmed Khan is, therefore, in a unique position among the office-bearers of the various institutions of the Community and may well be regarded as the Joint Secretary of the Conference for life. For some reason or other the Secretary of the Conference has, as we have said, left its affairs entirely to him and one by one the members of the Central Committee who took interest in its proceedings were tired out and have ceased to take any appreciable interest in its deliberations. Therefore whatever the Conference does to-day must be placed to the sole credit of Sahibzada Aftab Ahmed Khan, and whatever it is to-day must be regarded as his handiwork. We state this as mere fact and not as our criticism, for perhaps it is best to leave things for a while as they are and avoid the counter-criticism that if the end is failure it is so because of the intervention of the critics. Unlike the Aligarh College where there is danger of the work done being injurious to the growth and development of those who are studying in its quadrangles, the Conference can only suffer in one way, namely that no work, good or bad, may be done so that the community can suffer only from loss of time and money misapplied.

But such happiness as falls to the lot of a public man responsible for the well-being of a public institution by reason of his being left unmolested by critic, brings along with it a heavy load of responsibility. He enjoys the luxury of despotism for a time, but when the day of reckoning comes he must be prepared to show what he has done for his charge during the period of autocracy. The fate of the Female Education Section of the Conference, of which Mr. Shiekh Abdulla has been practically in sole charge from the date of its birth twelve years ago must be a warning to the Joint Secretary of the Conference. In spite of our criticism the Secretary of the Female Education Section succeeded in keeping off from its affairs everyone who could bring to them a fresh and independent judgment, and in spite of the liberal assistance given to the Girls School by Her Highness the Begum Saheba of Bhopal there is nothing to show for the work, so loudly claimed to have been done all these years, but a mere building, the praise or blame for such a result is entirely his own. Her Highness who had gone to Aligarh chiefly to open the Girls School Boarding House, was constrained to declare in her reply to the address of the Conference Committee that "in connection with female education 'also the Conference has not yet accomplished anything worthy 'of note.' This is a tremendous judgment on the work of the Female Education Section for more than a decade, and if after another five years Her Highness pronounces a similar judgment on the work of the Conference itself it would be a judgment far less on the community than on the individual in whose hand all real power in the affairs of the Conference is centred. "I had told you so before" is a remark worthy only of natures that find a malicious satisfaction in the fulfilment of their prophecies of evil, and we hope the Joint Secretary of the Conference would believe us when we say that it will cause us far more grief if in the end our fears are realised rather than his hopes.

But we see no chance of excellent results if the present apathy towards the affairs of the Conference continues in the community. It is not enough for the Joint Secretary to work himself, but he must also create in others a desire of co-operation with him. Her Highness the Begum Saheba very wisely laid stress on this point in a characteristically tactful manner. In the course of her reply she said: "Gentlemen, even in the days of intellectual poverty Sir Syed Ahmed Khan had "succeeded in gathering together from different parts of the country 'a select body of men who had devoted themselves to the work of the 'national College and the fruit of whose united efforts is the progress 'of the College on which we all pride ourselves. In my opinion in 'these days of educational progress and new light when the important 'question of the Moslem University is before us and the circle of your 'needs is being extended, it is exceedingly necessary that you should 'have at this educational centre a select body of men to pilot 'the ship of the community.' Co-operation is the touchstone of success in all national work, and the success of those responsible for the work of the Conference must be measured according to the success achieved in inducing other workers to co-operate with them in the work of communal education. No one can say that it is harder to find qualified men to run institutions like the Aligarh College and the Conference to-day than it was in the days of intellectual poverty when Sir Syed Ahmed flourished and Aligarh was not turning out sixty or seventy graduates every year as it is doing to-day. The problem now is not to discover the friends of Mohammedan education but to retain them, and it is according to the possession of this magnetic attraction that those who possess power in the management of various institutions at Aligarh will be judged.

The Muslim Deputation to the Viceroy.

I.

THE freedom that His Majesty's Indian subjects enjoy of bringing in a formal manner and collectively to the notice of the representative of the Crown in this country their hopes and fears, their gratitude and grievances is a privilege of inestimable value in the special circumstances of the governance of India. No doubt such a privilege must be exercised with a due sense of responsibility and we think it will be agreed that Indian Mussalmans have approached the Governor-General only when the importance and the urgency of the occasion have dictated such a course.

Now that the Mussalmans are once more approaching H. E. the Viceroy in a deputation it is not unprofitable to recall the circumstances when such a necessity arose and a deputation of Muslim representatives from every part of India waited on the late Earl of Minto at Simla on the 1st of October, 1906. It is difficult to exaggerate the debt which the Indian Mussalmans owe to the memory of one of their foremost leaders, the late Nawab Moshin-ul-Mulk, who realized the importance to his community of the new political situation that was just emerging into shape at the time and in collaboration with some of the leading Mussalmans organized the memorable Simla deputation. The need for such a step on the part of Mussalmans had grown urgent in the circumstances of the day. India was entering on a new era of political development and advance. Western education had been progressing at a steady pace for upwards of two generations, and its natural and inevitable results were beginning to manifest themselves in the broadened outlook, greater social activity and new political hopes and aspirations of the people. Their demand for a steadily increasing share in the administration of the country had become more vocal and persistent, and those responsible for the good government of India were, with their sure national instincts, beginning to perceive the undesirability of delaying the political satisfaction of a demand which was gaining every day in cogency and strength. Unfortunately this travail of a new birth was attended with horrors that heralded a new and sinister movement not only foreign to India but also alien to the spirit of constitutional advance permeating her educated classes. Lord Morley's advent at the India Office happened to synchronise with a period of grave unrest in parts of the country which made the direction of Indian affairs an exceptionally heavy and anxious charge. But it is a remarkable fact in British political history that the hour has always called forth the man. The situation in India at the time was met by Lords Morley and Minto with statesmanship of a rare order, and while the tide of anarchical crime was stemmed by the application of drastic measures, what was described as "healthy unrest" was dealt with in a wholly different spirit. The attitude and policy of Government were defined in terms of generous breath and wisdom and the task of governance was informed with a new spirit of courage and sympathy.

While a general wave of expectancy swept over the land and portents of organic changes in the machinery of Indian administration loomed above the horizon, the Indian Mussalmans also awoke to a fuller understanding of their own political situation. The prospect of important reforms designed to give to the Indian people a much larger voice in the administration of the affairs of their country could not but be gratifying to Indian Mussalmans, but could not also fail to arouse certain very natural apprehensions in their minds. Changes of such scope and character as were contemplated were to sow the seeds of constitutional development for the future of India, but the Mussalmans felt that the seed would grow into a vigorous tree and bear fruit only if due consideration was shown to the nature of the soil also. So long as the difference of creed, and all the differences that it involves in culture, social institutions and outlook, kept the Indian races distinct and separate, and so long as they lacked the vital impulse of a common patriotism urging them to address themselves unitedly and without communal bias to common secular tasks, so long would the Mussalmans have reasons to fear that in the absence of effective safeguards all new constitutional experiments tending towards the establishment of government by majority are likely to end in disaster. It was apprehensions such as these that took the Mussalmans in deputation to Simla in 1906. Lord Minto, to whom the Mussalmans can never be too grateful, and to whom the country as a whole owes not a few of its vitalising influences, recognised the justice of the Muslim attitude and accepted the principle of communal representation as the only suitable basis for representative institutions in this country. We have been led into making these observations because the Muslim Deputation in 1906 was a distinct landmark in the political history of Indian Mussalmans under British Rule, and recent Muslim activities owe to it their initial impulse. The generous policy of Government made it imperative for the Mussalmans to organise their forces with a view to co-operate with Government and with other communities in the common task of working for Indian progress. The earlier attitude of a resigned passivity would have made the community the sport of chance in the stress of the new political conditions. Government itself could no longer champion the Muslim cause without serious apprehensions of being suspected of partiality. These were the considerations that eventually led to the establishment of the All-India Muslim League which is and has always been the true representative of Indian Mussalmans and their only comprehensive political organisation.

The latent vitality of the community has been manifesting itself since the epoch-making Deputation of 1906 in all directions. Along with a keen appreciation of their political interests and an earnest desire to take their full share in the responsibilities of civic life, the Mussalmans of India realized even more vividly than ever that their salvation lay in devoting themselves whole-heartedly to the task of self-improvement through education suited to their peculiar needs and conditions. Within a year of the establishment of the reformed Councils they galvanised the scheme of the Muslim University, and all financial demands that were made by those who had to satisfy themselves that the proposed University was sufficiently well-endowed to be able to carry on its great work were met by the Mussalmans with an unprecedented and, in fact, unexpected promptitude. A no less important work, namely, the elaboration of a Constitution for the Muslim University, was undertaken in right earnest, and those who believe, or at least pretend to believe, that the present generation of Indian Mussalmans is capable of destructive criticism only will find it impossible to reconcile with this accusation the constructive work done by the community in this connection. Whenever required willing and competent workers were forthcoming, and neither time nor labour was grudged. Although it is impossible to forget that a good deal yet remains to be done, we hope we are justified in thinking that the prospect before the Mussalmans of India is far from discouraging. Unfortunately, however, the Secretary of State intervened at the eleventh hour, upsetting all plans and disconcerting the Government of India as well as the Muslim community, and the long-cherished desire of the Mussalmans for establishing a Muslim University still remains unfulfilled.

While the Mussalmans were still busy in planning their University, events of unparalleled magnitude and far-reaching importance followed one another with bewildering rapidity. Some of them were peculiarly Indian and concerned the Mussalmans of India directly, while others, although they occurred abroad, powerfully reacted throughout the Muslim World. First in chronological order came the intrigues of France and Spain in the country of the Moors, the tradition of whose conquest and domination over Spain, lasting as it did for many centuries, is a memory which could not be effaced from the mind of any Muslim that takes pride in the culture associated with his faith. Close on the heels of these sad events in Morocco came the unprovoked raid of Italy on an outlying province of the Ottoman Empire in the same continent, and it was not to be expected that the Mussalmans of any part of the world would remain unmoved by the tale of horrors perpetrated in the oasis of Tripoli. After the French conquest of Algiers and occupation of Tunis, and the British occupation of Egypt, Tripoli and Morocco were the only countries in Africa under effective Moslem domination, and on its disappearance the Mussalmans of the world could not fail to experience deep and sustained grief not accompanied by anxiety and alarm.

Affairs in an other part of the Muslim World, with which Indian Mussalmans were still more intimately concerned, had for sometime past worn a disquieting appearance, and before the year 1911 came to an end, the Persian crisis had become dangerously acute. Although Arabia is to the Mussalmans a land the sanctity of which no part of the world can equal, Persia can rightly claim to be almost in an equal degree the cradle of their culture, literary grace and artistic refinement. Her poets have in innumerable instances kindled inspiration in those of Indian Mussalmans and her philosophers and mystics have stimulated in only too many cases the thoughts of their best thinkers. Even the ethics of the Mussalmans, based as it is, on their Holy Scriptures, has often come to the Mussalmans of India through the moralists of Persia, while it must be manifest even to a superficial student of the language of their daily intercourse throughout India which they cherish so dearly that its poetic imagery, its fund of allusions, its many happy turns of expression and a considerable part of its vocabulary have been directly derived from the hand of Hafiz and Sadi and Omar the Tent-maker. Naturally enough, Indian Mussalmans could not contemplate the passing of Persia with equanimity, and when to the sad fate of her newly awakened political consciousness were added the unspeakable horrors of the hanging of some of her livings and the wanton outrage perpetrated at the shrine of Imam Riza at Holy Meshed, it was inevitable that a wave of indignation should sweep over the entire community.

About the same time His Majesty the King-Emperor announced at his Imperial Darbar certain momentous changes in India itself, one of which, namely, the modification of the Partition of Bengal, was received by the Mussalmans with considerable dissatisfaction. The fact that this announcement was made by His Majesty himself and that the promise of a gradual evolution of provincial autonomy was distinctly held out in the Despatch of the Government of India recommending the Darbar changes, reconciled the Mussalmans to them and they have no desire to re-open the settlement even though it was itself the result of the modification of a prior settlement. We only mention it in this connection because, coming as it did in the midst of the troubles of Indian Mussalmans, it could not but add to their distractions.

Just when things seemed to be settling down, there broke out in the Balkans with no less abruptness perhaps the bloodiest war that has yet been recorded in the annals of the world. So far as we know, there is no haven or creek, however remote and sequestered, that has remained immune from the ravages wrought by a tidal wave of anguish and indignation due to the sanguinary storm that raged in the Balkans. While bearing the amplest testimony to the wisdom and sagacity of His Excellency the Viceroy, who realized the intensity and poignance of the feelings of Indian Mussalmans at the time and showed his sympathy with them in many ways, we must say that the speeches of His Majesty's Ministers in England appeared to the Mussalmans to be not only lacking in sympathy with their sorrow but also unfeeling if not wantonly provocative. The foreign policy of Sir Edward Grey again appeared to be guided less by a desire to satisfy Indian Mussalmans than to please Russia and in fact submissively follow her wherever she led. We do not ignore the international commitments of England when we say that Sir Edward Grey seemed to have ignored her imperial responsibilities. Horror and indignation at the cruel spoliation of Moslem kingdoms and states was sufficient to create excitement among the Mussalmans in this country, but dangerous feelings might have been roused by a suspicion that instead of being a friendly advocate of Turkey and other Moslem states in the councils of Europe, England was unjustly siding with their enemies. Whether such feelings would have been natural or not can be judged best if we recall to mind what Lord Morley said in 1909 on the subject of the international position of the Indian Mussalmans in reply to a deputation of the London branch of the All India Moslem League that waited on his Lordship in connection with the projected Council Reforms. Speaking with all the authority of a Minister of His Majesty responsible for the good government of India, Lord Morley said on that occasion: "I know very well that any injustice, any suspicion that we were 'capable of being unjust to Mohamedans in India, would certainly 'provoke a severe and injurious reaction in Constantinople.'" It therefore follows only too clearly that any injustice or any suspicion that His Majesty's Government was capable of being unjust to Turkey must naturally provoke a severe and injurious reaction among the Mohamedans of India. Whatever criticism was levelled at Sir Edward Grey and the British foreign policy during the last three years was not inspired by the belief that His Majesty's Government was guilty of wanton injustice to Turkey or any other Muslim country, nor that responsible Muslim opinion ignored the well-known fact that Lord Hardinge invariably used a restraining influence whenever events in Persia provided a plausible reason for the forcible intervention of Great Britain. Indian Mussalmans were also aware of the fact, and were deeply grateful for it, that His Excellency availed himself to the full of every opportunity that presented itself during the recent troubles of Turkey to represent to His Majesty's Government the feelings, hopes and fears of Indian Mussalmans and to befriend their Turkish brethren. What the Indian Mussalmans felt and desired was that still greater friendliness should be shown by His Majesty's Government towards the Ottoman Empire and that a settlement should be effected whereby their unimpeachable territorial loyalty should run in the same direction as their unmistakable extra-territorial patriotism. Lord Curzon, who cannot be accused of any desire to seduce Indian Mussalmans from their loyalty to His Majesty the King-Emperor, voiced their feelings when speaking towards the end of 1911, at the banquet of the Persia Society, he was reported to have said that "the Mohamedan countries of the world were fully entitled to the benefit of the law of nations and with them treaties ought to be kept. When they sought their own salvation, we ought to give them all assistance. The loyalty and contentment of the Muslims was one of the strongest things of our rule in India, so we would like the Muslims of the world to feel that in England they had their truest friend, who was prepared to make every effort and to make a sacrifice on their behalf."

We have no desire to dwell any longer on painful topics such as the horrors perpetrated in Persia, Tripoli and the Balkans, but we desire to emphasise the fact that not in other things which may appear strange in Christendom are the accepted truths of the Muslim World. One of these is the fact that Mussalmans willingly share the joys and sorrows of their co-religionists although they may differ from one another in language, race and country and, in fact, in everything that goes in the West to constitute nationality. Islam is the greatest solvent of linguistic, geographical and ethnic differences, and however much one may desire to substitute a secular basis of nationality, he is bound to admit that as things are at present and so long as the Muslim believes in Islam, his creed provides and will continue to provide for him all the cohesion that language, country and race provide for Western nations.

That being so, was it strange that the troubles of Mussalmans abroad should have had a powerful reaction among the Mohamedans of India as in other parts of the world? The situation was wholly abnormal and, as an important English official interested in the Mussalmans of India said, they had some reason even to be unreasonable. But we defy even the most captious critic of the Moslem community to point to a single incident throughout the protracted sufferings of Indian Mussalmans suggesting, however remotely, that they had departed even by hair's breadth from the tradition of staunch and unwavering loyalty to the British Throne and to His Majesty's Government established by law in India. We challenge anyone to place his finger on any record of wanton disregard of law and breach of public peace by any section of the Mussalmans of India even during the period of their greatest misery. This historic community has been noted for its sanity of judgment and self-restraint during periods of unusual gravity, and we do not think it lost these characteristic qualities at any time during the troubles of the last three years. There is nothing in its record of which it need be ashamed, and we say this not by way of apology but as a full justification of its attitude throughout its protracted sufferings.

The South African Deportations.

THE Debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was resumed in the House of Commons.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald moved an amendment asking "that instructions should be given to the Governor General of the Union of South Africa that the Indemnity Bill, now under discussion in the Parliament of the Union of South Africa, should be reserved under Section 64 of the South Africa Act 1909, until a judicial enquiry was instituted into the circumstances of the proclamation of Martial Law within the Union and into the scope of the Indemnity Bill, particularly the provision relating to the deportation of trade union leaders." In dealing with the course of events in South Africa, he said that the subject was a difficult one. He was perfectly well aware of the jealousies of self-governing Dominions. He desired to be absolutely generous when giving self-governing powers, and was not anxious to interfere in the exercise of those powers once they were given. But there was another great problem now facing this Empire in a very acute form. He did not believe any Member of the House could appreciate what was the feeling as a result of the treatment of the Indians in South Africa unless they had been privileged to be on the spot, as he had been when it formed the subject of cables and articles in the newspapers every day. They had to face this problem regarding Imperial citizenship. Was there any meaning at all in the expression Civis Britannicus Sum? Had it any common meaning from one end of the Empire to the other? Was it going to give any pride, any inspiration? Was it, or not, a fact that the privileges attaching to Habeas Corpus, Petition of Rights, and so on, were to be carried wherever British subjects went provided they kept under the shadow of the Union Jack? If not, he ventured to say that the Empire could not possibly remain in the place of honour which it occupied to-day. If the civic liberty which had come to them, not merely by generous accident, but because it was essential to the very spirit and genius of our people, was not to be an assumption in the constitutional procedure of the Governments of the self-governing communities, then the expression "Empire" must be used in future in an exceedingly limited and exceedingly narrow sense. But it was because, at the back of his mind, he had an idea that Empire really stood for something that was constitutionally magnificent, he felt himself in duty bound to raise this question, even though at the same time he desired to be absolutely generous in his thoughts and in his criticisms of self-governing communities exercising their rights as such.

Mr. Pointer formally seconded the amendment.

MR. HARCOURT ON IMPERIAL-CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. Harcourt, in the course of his reply, said that autonomy carried with it no immunity from the Press or public criticism, but it deserved and it was entitled to the largest amount of relief from official interference and Parliamentary censure compatible with the inherent rights of freedom. The British citizenship to which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald referred was really a misnomer. It did not, in fact, exist, and was an attempt to make too literal a translation of the Civis Romanus Sum. What did exist was British subjecthood, which entitled its possessor to the protection of his Sovereign through the Executive. But it gave to the individual no right and no licence in any part of the Empire to violate the laws which it was within the competence of the Dominion to pass and to administer. The Imperial Parliament could not grant responsible self-government, as it had done throughout nearly a century in varying degrees, in different climes, and to different races, with practically unqualified success, and then hope or attempt, when feelings or prejudices were aroused, to interfere or intervene as if it were still dealing with a Crown Colony or a Protectorate. He did not want to discuss the matter of the so-called "passive resistance" by the Indians, because there was a Commission now sitting in South Africa, with the countenance of the Indian Government and with the assistance of a distinguished Indian Civil Servant, which would, he hoped, arrive at a settlement.

Mr. Wedgwood, speaking as one who had had the privilege of administering justice in South Africa, supported the amendment. In the long run, that which was unjust could never be expedient. Although statesmen in South Africa might come to the conclusion that it was expedient under the circumstances to break all the laws of individual liberty, it was well known that by drawing the sword in this way, by starting a class war, by objecting passive resistance to a strike, they were inviting the sword to be drawn on the other side. That was what came of action, with the best intentions, actuated by ideas of expediency, but neglectful of those more elementary laws which are based on justice. They had no right to put a man in prison who had committed no crime, or to deport him either in India or in South Africa.

Sir J. D. Rees: In India our laws are different.

Mr. Wedgwood: The fact that the laws are different in India does not make them just.

Sir J. Rees: It makes it legal in India.

Mr. Wedgwood said that things might be a little better in that respect in South Africa, although it did not make it accord with English ideas of justice. It had been said over and over again that they could not successfully interfere. But suppose an Indian or a Kaffir in South Africa were treated in a way so monstrously unjust that they could hardly conceive South Africa to be guilty of it. They would then be justified in saying, "Unless you refuse to pass this Act, or unless you consent to our vetoing this Act, we will withdraw the British troops from the country." The position of the ordinary worker on the Rand was to a certain extent comparable with the position of the Indian or the Kaffir in South Africa. It was more comparable to the position of members of those two subject nationalities than it is comparable to the position of the trade unionist in England.

Sir J. D. Rees observed that Mr. MacDonald had taken exception to General Smuts' statement that he had put in a memorial prayer for the deportation of Mr. Galbraith Cole from British East Africa. He immediately accepted that denial, but did he not heartily approve of the deportation of Mr. Cole, which was a perfectly legal act, because in British East Africa, as in British India, there were laws which allowed the Executive to resort to such measures?

After further discussion, the House divided, when there appeared—for the amendment, 50, and against, 214.

Supplement to the "Comrade", 21st March 1914.

The Muslim Deputation.

THIS week's Comrade was ready on Saturday, but in view of so important an event as the projected Muslim Deputation to H. E. the Viceroy which was to be received on the 25th instant we delayed the publication of the week's issue and now reproduce both the Address and His Excellency's reply. The Deputation was fully representative of various shades of Muslim opinion in India, and although some notable Mussalmans such as Dr. Iqbal, the Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi, and the Nawab Bahadur of Dacca were unavoidably absent, they have expressed their sympathy and full agreement with its objects. The veteran leader of the community, Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk Bahadur, was to have headed the Deputation at the invitation of the Hon. the Raja Sahab of Mahmudabad who organised it; but ill-health prevented him from doing so, and his medical adviser, Dr. Ansari, after examining him carefully could not agree to the proposal to bring the Nawab Sahab to Delhi in his present state of health. It is worth noting, however, that the Nawab Sahab expressed the fullest confidence in the Raja Sahab and said that although he was formerly a prey to grave apprehensions about the well-being of the community in the future, he was now happy in the belief that a man of the devotion, courage and determination of the Raja Sahab of Mahmudabad had been found to guide the counsels of the Mussalmans of India. The Raja Sahab headed the Deputation, reading its Address and subsequently presenting its Members to H. E. the Viceroy who shook hands with every one and graciously asked them to partake of refreshments served in the adjoining room. To-day we publish our first article on the subject of the Deputation and shall deal with His Excellency's reply in our next which we hope to bring out at an early date.

Address of the Muslim Deputation.

To

BARON HARDINGE of PENSHURST.

P.C., G.C.B., G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O.

G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., I.S.O.,

Viceroy and Governor-General of India.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,

WE, the representatives of the Muslim community, reflecting various shades of responsible Muslim opinion in India, humbly beg to approach Your Excellency on behalf of our co-religionists and ourselves with a view to lay before Your Excellency certain matters of the highest moment relating to our community. For this opportunity so graciously afforded to us by Your Excellency we cannot but be deeply grateful. The privilege which enables the Indian subjects of His Majesty the King-Emperor to wait in deputation upon his representative on occasions of importance is highly prized, and is, we venture to think, of inestimable value in the special circumstances of the governance of India.

As Your Excellency is aware, the political activity of our community in recent years took its initial impulse from the great Deputation that waited in 1906 at Simla upon Your Excellency's predecessor, Lord Minto, whose recent sad death we, along with the rest of the people of India, so deeply mourn. The extended opportunities for participating in public affairs which the liberal policy of the Government was then creating for the people of this country had brought home to the Mussalmans the imperative necessity of organising themselves for effective and fruitful co-operation with Government and with other communities. Responding to the call of such a generous policy on the part of Government, the Mussalmans succeeded in a great measure in drawing together and organising their social and political forces in an incredibly short space of time, and as a prominent instance we may quote the establishment of the All-India Moslem League, which has ever since continued to be the true representative organisation of Indian Mussalmans. The latent vitality of our community began to manifest itself soon after and marked the new era of an awakened consciousness. Along with an earnest desire to take their full share in the responsibilities of civic life, the Mussalmans of India realised even more vividly than ever that their future progress depended chiefly upon the energy and vigour with which they undertook the task of carrying out the educational policy formulated by their greatest leader, Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, more than three decades ago.

Your Excellency, we may with pardonable pride here refer to the unprecedented promptitude with which the community met and overcame the financial difficulties that stood in the way of the grant of a Charter for the establishment of a University of our own. In this connection it will not be perhaps out of place to mention that the extremely arduous and constructive work of elaborating a Constitution for the Muslim University was taken up by the community with earnestness and zeal, and the result leads us to hope that, whenever required, willing and competent workers will be readily forthcoming. That long cherished desire, however, for the establishment of the Moslem University still remains unfulfilled.

Before we could secure the result of our labours in this connection events of unparalleled magnitude and absorbing interest to Mussalmans followed one another in a rapid and bewildering succession. Your Excellency, it could not have been expected that they would fail to make a deep and painful impression upon the Mussalmans of this country. It must be apparent to all observers that the combination of such unfortunate events as then occurred was absolutely unprecedented, and the Mussalmans of India were face to face with a wholly abnormal situation. Your Excellency, whose great sympathy was with us throughout our protracted sufferings, is well aware of the intensity and poignance of our feelings in that dark hour. But no one can point to a single incident suggesting, however remotely, that the Mussalmans of India had lost their sanity of judgment and self-restraint during a period of unusual gravity, or that they had departed even by a hair's breadth from the tradition of staunch and unwavering loyalty to the British Throne and to His Majesty's Government established by law in India.

Despite these undeniable facts, we have noticed with deep pain and resentment a series of deplorable attempts that have recently been made in certain quarters to vilify our community, misrepresent our attitude towards Government, and cast unmerited aspersions on the character and motives of whole classes of His Majesty's Muslim subjects with a view to discredit them in the eyes of Government and of their British fellow-subjects. It has been openly declared that leaders of the Muslim community inflame religious passions, promote racial antagonism and lose no opportunity of abusing British Rule and vilifying the Christian religion, and that a new party already begins to dream of expelling the British from India. It has also been stated that a sinister feature of this new Muslim movement is that Aligarh graduates are in the van and are openly preaching hostility to British Rule, and that attempts are being made to tamper with the loyalty of Muslim troops.

Your Excellency, after having stood the repeated test of actual experience in times of great public excitement, we never expected such cruel attacks at a time when we were under the shadow of a great calamity and needed all the sympathy and good-will to which we were entitled. Your Excellency will, we trust, pardon us for any warmth of language into which we may be betrayed in repudiating such wicked libels on the fair name of seventy millions of His Majesty's loyal Muslim subjects in India. We, on behalf of our community and ourselves, unhesitatingly characterise these allegations as gross and baseless calumnies opposed in the highest degree to the best interests of the Empire. In ordinary circumstances irresponsible attacks on communities, as on individuals, may be treated with the silence of contempt. But those who have taken upon themselves the task of maligning our community are both persistent and resourceful, and their sinister efforts have been assisted by the wide publicity given to their allegations in England as well as in this country. We, therefore, apprehended that, unless some opportunity such as this was afforded to us, it was not possible for a community circumstanced as ours to give such allegations an effectual, authoritative and adequate contradiction.

Your Excellency, our desire is not to prefer requests or to give expression to grievances of a character such as in ordinary practice form the subject-matter of deputations. But there is nothing that we prize more highly than the recognition of our loyalty, and it is with reference to this that we have craved

Your Excellency's leave to approach you. We avail ourselves of this opportunity to declare with all the emphasis that we can command that Indian Mussalmans cherish this tradition no less dearly to-day than they did at any time previously in their history.

Your Excellency will, we trust, accept our assurance that we desire nothing better than this, that absolute confidence should exist between the people and the Government, and that that friendliest feelings should prevail between the various communities of India; but it has pained us greatly that sinister motives should be ascribed in some quarters to the efforts that are being made to make the relations between the two great sister communities of India more harmonious and friendly.

Your Excellency has endeared yourself to the whole of India by your large-hearted sympathy with the people of this country, your generous appreciation of their aspirations and the high statesmanship which has characterised your rule. Grateful as we are for the benefits that have resulted from your liberal and progressive administration in which we have participated with the rest of India, we have special reason to offer our respectful gratitude to Your Excellency for the unfailing consideration that you have shown for the feelings and sentiments of our community, and for the policy of Your Excellency's Government with regard to our educational requirements of which we hope to see an early fruition. It is, therefore, a matter of special pleasure to us to approach Your Excellency with this our humble address conveying to Your Excellency our heart-felt assurances of the continued and unimpeachable loyalty of the community we represent, and we trust Your Excellency will be pleased to communicate these assurances to His Majesty the King-Emperor.

We have the honour to subscribe ourselves

Your Excellency's

DELHI : March 25th, 1914.

H. E. the Viceroy's Reply.

GENTLEMEN,—

It is a source of much pleasure to me to have this opportunity of receiving a deputation of the Mohamedan community of such a representative character as that which I have the pleasure of seeing here before me to-day.

You have referred, in the address which I am very happy to receive from you, to the reinvigorated vitality of your own community during the past few years, and it is a fact to which I am able to bear testimony and at the same time to welcome. There is no doubt that during the past 40 years a great change has swept over Islam in India, but zeal for the Moslem faith and for the uplifting of the community, and the loyalty of the Moslems to the Government of this country where they live and find freedom of worship, have gone hand in hand, and have created a high ideal from which the community has never wavered. This indeed was the policy advocated by the late Sir Syed Ahmed, the distinguished reformer and leader of the Indian Mohamedan community, and I can only state my firm conviction that in pursuing that policy the true salvation of the Mohamedans of India is to be found. It is a policy worthy of a community of political and social importance such as your's. There is no doubt that Mohamedan sentiment has been greatly stirred by recent events outside India, and that for a time a restless spirit prevailed which might have been interpreted by those who regarded merely the troubled surface of the water as a dangerous portent, but which those who could see below the surface were well aware, betrayed no real antagonism between Government and your community. It is true that feelings have been sore, and that here and there this has found expression in bitter or heated words, which it would have been better to have left unsaid. And it is true, unfortunately, that writers in the English and foreign press have been misled by such expressions and, owing to a merely superficial comprehension of the Mohamedan train of thought, have misrepresented the attitude of your community and attributed to them actions and thoughts which those who know you well can only regard as a deep misunderstanding. I can well sympathise with your feelings of resentment at aspersions that have been cast upon you and your people as a whole, but I can only assure you that I and my Government have never doubted the unswerving loyalty which we know quite well to be one of the noblest and most sacred traditions of your community. I need hardly repeat to you here what I said in the Legislative Council at Simla on the 17th September last to the realisation by the British Government of the absolute necessity for the maintenance of the status quo as regards the Holy Places in Arabia, but I would point out that this is an important and powerful link between your community and the Government of our King-Emperor, for it is only in view of the religious interests of the Mohamedans of India and the value that the Government attach to religious freedom and Mohamedan control of the Holy Places that such a responsibility could rest upon Great Britain. Now that peace has been happily restored in Europe and Asia, I look forward with hope and confidence to a period of peaceful development of the Mohamedan community by means of self improvement and education, and to a policy of solidarity and co-operation with Government of all loyal, moderate and sober opinion for the welfare and progress of this Empire which we all of us have so much at heart.

In conclusion I thank you very warmly for the friendly tone of your personal references to myself and the policy that I have tried to follow. I cordially welcome the assurances that you have given me of the continued and unimpeachable loyalty of the community which you represent which I will not fail to transmit to the King Emperor, although for me such assurances were not needed, and I devoutly hope that the pure and unalloyed faith of your people in the unity of God and of loyalty to their rulers may burn like a flame and ever grow brighter to lighten your path for many ages to come.

India in the House of Commons.

THE SITAPUR MURDER CASE.

Mr. Morrell asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he could now give any further information with regard to the Sitapur murder case, and especially as to the trial and acquittal of a man named Bachan Singh, on the charge upon which two men who had been acquitted by the Sessions Judge were afterwards hanged, and the third man named Ganga Singh was still in penal servitude; whether he could say why no mention was made of the prosecution of Bachan Singh in the Papers laid before the House; and whether, in view of all the circumstances of this case and the suspicion that existed in the minds of many unprejudiced persons that there had been a serious miscarriage of justice, the Secretary of State would now advise the exercise of the Royal prerogative of mercy in favour of Ganga Singh.

Mr. Montague: Bachan Singh absconded after the murder and was not arrested until October 20, 1912, about six weeks after the execution of the other two men. He was tried by the Sessions Judge, Lucknow, on February 15, found guilty, and condemned to transportation for life. He appealed to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner. The appeal was decided on May 13 in favour of the appellant. At the time when Papers were presented this case had not been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State. Full information was received on August 25. After careful consideration the Secretary of State is convinced that the circumstances of this case in no way affect the justice of the decision in the previous case; and he has already, in reply to a petition on behalf of Ganga Singh, refused to advise the exercise of the Royal prerogative.

Mr. Swift MacNeill: Is the hon. gentleman aware that this man was tried and acquitted on the same evidence as the three other prisoners, two of whom were executed, and as to the one who is now in penal servitude, is he likewise aware that one of the judges, the Judicial Commissioners, who acquitted this man, constituted the bench that convicted the other three?

Mr. Montague: I think that the hon. gentleman has a question later upon the evidence. It is not the case that he was either convicted or acquitted on the same evidence. In regard to the question as to the judges, the Secretary of State took all the circumstances into consideration.

Mr. Morrell: Is it not the case that Ganga Singh, who is now in penal servitude, is serving that under a sentence which was never passed upon him by the judge who tried him, because he was acquitted by the judge who tried the case and was sentenced by a man who had never seen him?

Mr. Montague: I believe he was sentenced on appeal.

Mr. Morrell: Did my hon. friend himself say that the appeal was in no sense a re-trial, but was merely an appeal against a previous acquittal?

Mr. Montague: I believe my hon. friend remembers the elaborate discussion we had on a former occasion.

Mr. Swift MacNeill asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he was now aware that for the same offence for which Chalkau Singh, Sikhdan Singh, and Ganga Singh were tried by Mr. Ball, the Sessions Judge at Sitapur, and acquitted, and were, five months after their acquittal, re-tried by judicial Commissioners on the report of the evidence of witnesses in the Court below who were not examined or seen by the Commissioners, Chalkau Singh and Sikhdan Singh being sentenced to death and executed, and Ganga Singh being sentenced to Penal servitude, a fourth man named Bachan Singh was tried by another Sessions Judge on exactly the same evidence as was offered in the case of the Singhs, convicted by him and sentenced not to death but to imprisonment, and that that very appeal resulted in an acquittal; had he ascertained the cause of his having had no information from India as to the trial of Bachan Singh so lately as August 13 last; had he yet enquired what was the reason of this circumstance, which tends to throw additional doubts on the guilt of the Singhs and to show that the Government of India would have favourably entertained their petition for mercy if that petition had not been withheld by Sir John Hewett, not having been communicated to the India Office in the history of this transaction sent from the authorities in India and communicated by the Indian Office to this House; and whether the Secretary of State would now advise the exercise of the prerogative of mercy in the case of Ganga Singh.

Mr. Montague: I would refer my hon. friend to the answer I have just given to Mr. Morrell. But I must point out that the evidence upon which Bachan Singh was acquitted was not exactly the same as that upon which the other three men were convicted. With regard to the second and third parts of the question, I would remind my hon. friend that up to the time when Papers were presented, this House was concerned with the Sitapur case, so far as it concerned the trial of the three men acquitted by the Sessions Judge and convicted by the Judicial Commissioner on appeal, and thereby raised the general question of appeals against acquittals and the disposal of petitions of persons under the sentence of death. The records of the subsequent trial of Bachan Singh were not among the papers called for by the Secretary of State, who was then unaware of the proceedings against him, and were evidently not judged relevant to the specific issue raised. But when the appeal of Ganga Singh, under sentence of transportation, came before the local government, the possible hearing of Bachan Singh's acquittal was not overlooked by them, and the record was then transmitted to the Secretary of State, and was considered by him when he disposed of the appeal and refused to advise the exercise of the Royal prerogative.

Mr. Swift MacNeill: When did the Secretary of State first hear of this case? Bachan Singh was convicted on October 12, 1912, and the other case did not come up until June of last year.

Mr. Montague: If the hon. gentleman will look at the answer I gave to Mr. Morrell, a copy of which I will give him, he will see all the dates he asks for are set out.

Mr. Morrell: Can the hon. Member tell me if the appeal of Ganga Singh ever came before the Viceroy-in-Council?

Mr. Montague: I think it was granted, but if the hon. gentleman will give notice I will give him accurate information.

APPEALS AGAINST ACQUITTALS IN INDIA.

Mr. Swift MacNeill asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he was aware that during the years 1902-11 no fewer than twenty-six Indians who had been tried on capital charges by session judges, and having stood in peril of their lives had been acquitted were subsequently, on appeals preferred by Government against these orders of acquittal, convicted of a capital offence, sentenced to death, and actually executed; whether the system under which in India persons tried for murder and acquitted could subsequently be retried, convicted, sentenced to death, and executed, applied only to persons of Indian birth and not to persons of European birth and descent and was of recent origin; whether in these appeals from acquittals on capital charges instituted by the Indian Government, the witnesses in the court below were not produced, their evidence given in that court being simply perused by the judges, and that the accused persons themselves were not necessarily present; and whether the Secretary of State for India, who some months ago had decided to consider if there were grounds for re-examining this method of procedure in conducting such appeals, had yet taken the matter into consideration; and, if so, whether he had decided that the same method of trial for capital crimes should obtain for Indians and for Europeans alike, that in cases other than capital, in which appeals from acquittals were allowed this procedure should be reformed; and, if so, what were the contemplated reforms in that procedure.

Mr. Montague: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. The system dates, as my hon. friend is aware, from 1872; that it indirectly applies in the manner stated in the second part I have already explained in my answer to him on July 8 last. The answer to the third part is in the affirmative, except that the Appellate Court may take additional evidence. With regard to the remainder of the question, the Secretary of State has under consideration the whole of the important question of appeals against acquittals in all its bearings: no decision has yet been reached.

Mr. Swift MacNeill: Is the hon. gentleman aware that this appeal against acquittals was instituted by Sir Fitzjames Stephen in order to prevent Europeans being improperly acquitted, and that it is now being used against a different class of persons?

Mr. Montague: I heard the hon. gentleman argue that.

DEATH SENTENCES IN THE UNITED PROVINCES.

Mr. Swift MacNeill asked the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he was aware that, of the twenty-six cases, in which, during the years 1902-11, Indians acquitted as the result of trials before sessions judges on capital charges were subsequently retried, convicted, sentenced to death, and actually executed, no fewer than thirteen were in the United Provinces and not one in Bengal; and whether he could assign any reason for this divergence in the number of death sentences executed on prisoners in the first instance acquitted of murder in the United Provinces and in Bengal.

Mr. Montague: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. With regard to the second part, I would hesitate to give an opinion which, having regard to the differences between one province and another, would not be authoritative.

Mr. Swift MacNeill: Is the hon. gentleman aware that judges upon the Bengal Bench, especially the Chief Justice, have expressed themselves in unmeasured terms about Executive action?

WHIPPING SENTENCES IN INDIA.

Mr. Swift MacNeill asked the Under-Secretary of State for India the result of his enquiries into the prevalence of whipping sentences in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh and in Burma.

Mr. Montague: The Secretary of State has received reports from the two local governments concerned, and is satisfied that in both provinces the spirit as well as the letter of the Whipping Act of 1909 is carefully observed, and that the punishment of whipping is in neither case unduly awarded.

Mr. Swift MacNeill also asked the Under-Secretary of State for India if he would state how many judicial sentences for whipping were passed in India, province by province, during the years 1911 and 1912.

Mr. Montague: Burma—1911, 2,159; 1912, 2,205. United Provinces—1911, 2,992; 1912, 2,662. Punjab—1911, 1,135; 1912, 1,149. North-West Frontier Province—1911, 81; 1912, 120. Bombay—1911, 859; 1912, 901. Central Provinces—1911, 518; 1912, 529. Madras—1911, 618; 1912, 684. Bengal—1911, 816 (including Behar and Orissa, but not Eastern Bengal); 1912, 689 (including Eastern Bengal). Eastern Bengal and Assam—1911, 228; Behar and Orissa, 1912, 256; Assam, 1912, 125.

Mr. Swift MacNeill asked if the United Provinces did not top the list.

Mr. Montague said he believed that was the case.

THE SCHOOL OF ORIENTAL LANGUAGES.

Sir J. D. Rees asked the Prime Minister if he would state what progress had been made with the School of Oriental Languages.

Mr. Asquith: The charter for the school is now being considered by the Privy Council. The alterations in the buildings recommended in the first interim report of Lord Cromer's Committee are still under consideration.

Sir J. D. Rees: Is the right hon. gentleman aware that progress has been much faster in the smaller City of Vladivostok, where they already have a well-equipped Oriental School?

Mr. Asquith: I am not acquainted with that.

Ottoman Public Debt.

Sir Adam Block's Report.

THE annual report of the Council of Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt for the period from March 14, 1912, to March 13, 1913, is now published, with a special report by Sir Adam Block, the representative of the British and Dutch bondholders. Referring to the war, immense areas of territory, he says, were for months devastated by the opposing forces, and in those districts the collection of revenue was naturally almost out of the question. "Owing to the naval operations of the belligerents, all business and trade, as well as transport and sale of salt, were restricted on the coasts of the Ægean and of the Red Sea. By the closing of the Dardanelles communication with the Capital was almost entirely suspended for a considerable period. It is not surprising under these circumstances that the receipts of the Public Debt Administration should show a decrease compared with the preceding year. From the outbreak of the war with the Balkan States the Council of the Debt had to rely chiefly on the Anatolian Provinces for its revenues, and in spite of the natural reaction of the war in these districts the receipts have come in with praiseworthy regularity, the decrease on the total receipts being, as I have said, less than was to be expected. The results of last year compared with the preceding year show decrease of £1,886,461." "Pessimistic rumours," says Sir Adam Block, "have been so persistent that anything I may say of an optimistic nature may be received with scepticism, but nevertheless I have no hesitation in affirming that the check in the steady improvement of the economic condition of the country for a number of years past is only temporary; and that in spite of the war and the financial straits of the Turkish Government there is every reason to believe that with peace assured the revenues will continue to show a steady increase." The Bondholders, it is said, need have no apprehension of any serious fall in the yield of the revenues in general. The Turkish Government have been hard put to it to make both ends meet, but great credit should be accorded to them for having throughout scrupulously respected their engagements to their creditors. Not only have they observed a perfectly correct attitude with regard to the ceded revenues but they have, as in preceding years, afforded the Debt Council all possible assistance throughout twenty-four months of political and financial crisis.

THE PARIS CONFERENCE.

As soon as the Council perceived that the occupation of the Turkish Territories in Europe and in the Ægean Islands by the Balkan States would interfere with the collection of the assigned Revenues, urgent representations were made to the Great Powers with the object of protecting the rights of the bondholders of Turkey in those districts where the Turkish writ no longer ran. The Debt Council subsequently received assurances from the Balkan States that no prejudice would be caused to the creditors of Turkey. These assurances, unfortunately, were not entirely adhered to. A considerable loss of Revenue has been incurred which the States concerned will be called upon to make good. In spite of the representations made by the Council of Foreign Bondholders, and some of the other syndicates, the admission of a representative of the Debt Council was found unacceptable. The Council of the Debt has recently prepared tables for the next meeting of the Conference fixing the share of the Debt for each State in proportion to the new territory acquired, and it is to be hoped that the final decision of the Conference will not long be delayed, and that ultimately the Great Powers will ensure that the rights of their respective bondholders are duly respected. Should this prove to be the case, the bondholders will not suffer by the loss of territory to Turkey.

THE FUTURE.

The last two years have been a most critical period for Turkey, and it has seemed at times as if the financial resources of the country could not stand the strain without recourse to the adoption of regrettable measures which would have affected the acquired rights of the creditors of Turkey. If the Balkan States are called upon to pay their proper share of the External Debt of Turkey, the loss of revenue will not be so keenly felt, and the Anatolian Revenues, which will show renewed elasticity as soon as the effects of the war have passed away, will not be burdened by an increased share of the Foreign Debt, thus depriving Turkey of the means of ensuring a better administration and of consolidating the financial stability of the country. It is on this that the interests of the Bondholders of Turkey depend for the future security of their holding, and the settlement of the share of the Balkan States in the Foreign Debt of Turkey requires therefore the special attention and the vigilance of all those who possess a stake in the Ottoman Empire. The situation to-day is very serious, and the finances of Turkey will require careful handling and much care and attention. But, whilst the situation is undoubtedly critical, it is by no means desperate. If Turkey continues to be deprived of legitimate means of placing the finances on a sound basis, that danger becomes more imminent. If Turkey is to be financially boycotted for political ends, the Bondholders may have to suffer, even if only for a time. Immediate financial relief is necessary in the form of a consolidating or funding loan. The Government cannot without risk impose further direct taxation on the agricultural population of the country. Serious efforts are being made to reduce expenditure, and it is confidently believed that in the coming year a very large reduction will be effected both in the civil departments of the State and in the military estimates. It is hoped that the deficit of the coming year of the ordinary Budget will not exceed two millions. "Turkey," says the writer, "has for many months past been asking the Great Powers for foreign experts and inspectors, as well as for gendarmerie officers, for the reform of the Civil Administration of the Anatolian provinces, and for the reorganisation of the provincial gendarmerie. The Government have spontaneously offered to give foreigners so employed very extensive powers. Up to the present, however, for reasons which it is difficult to understand, no decision seems to have been come to, but I have reason to hope that the Great Powers will no longer decline to agree to the proposals made, nor further hesitate to award what they themselves have been advocating and insisting upon in the interest of Turkey for more than a quarter of a century."

The Morning Post's Opinion.

SIR ADAM BLOCK's annual report on the Ottoman Public Debt is one of the most trustworthy sources of information not only about Turkish finance but about many other aspects of Turkish government and Turkish affairs. Its author is a Member of the Council of Administration of the Debt and has the great advantage of a mastery of the Turkish language. He thoroughly understands the Turks and has their confidence, and in his reports aims at explaining their position, as far as financial report allows, to the British public. His official position on the Council of the Debt is that of representative of the British and Dutch bondholders, and he has therefore to consider their interests. This year he has to review a period in which Turkey was at war, and in which she has lost the greater part of the European territories from which two years ago she was still collecting revenue. During the war, of course, revenue was not to be had from the European provinces. But from the Asiatic provinces, especially from Asia Minor, the receipts were regular and the decrease of income was less than had been expected. The loss of Tripoli has not been a loss of revenue except for the period of the war with Italy, because the Italian Government has paid Turkey two millions, equivalent to the capitalisation at four per cent. of the revenue of Tripoli in the period before the war. Nor will the loss of the European provinces be more than a limited financial loss, for the Powers have agreed that arrangements are to be made by which the Balkan States are to make up to the bondholders whatever revenue would disappear in consequence of the annexations. The financial conference meeting at Paris for this purpose has not yet finished its work, but the principle of compensation by the Balkan States appears to have been established without question.

The war has upset for the time the attempts made for a year or two before it began to set in order the financial administration of Turkey. It was natural and necessary that all the resources of Turkey should be devoted to the war and that the civil departments of the State should be temporarily starved. It is now needful to restore those departments, without depriving the bondholders of the interest due to them. This will be difficult without a loan, and Sir Adam Block pleads for a loan. The total external debt of Turkey is a hundred and one millions, together with new loans, Treasury bonds, and advances from banks, amounting to twenty-four millions. Sir Adam Block thinks that sound security can be found for a loan which would pay off the recent advances and provide for immediate administrative wants. These are urgent. Officials, Judges, and Police cannot work unpaid, and though salaries were paid regularly from 1908 to the outbreak of the war they have fallen into arrears. Unless their regular payment is speedily resumed "the administration will slip back to the old system of corrupt and inefficient officialdom which had brought Turkey to the verge of ruin." The Turkish official, in the opinion of Sir Adam Block, is as good as the official of any other country so long as he is regularly and adequately paid and properly controlled. Meantime the receipts are not yet adequate to cover the ordinary expenditure. Accordingly Turkey must for some time to come practise economy. Her Government must understand that the only salvation consists in a policy of thrift, and that a period of peace is necessary for restoring the vitality of the country. This is, so far as the Turkish Government is concerned, the chief moral to be drawn from Sir Adam Block's report. But unless there is some assurance that the Turkish Government is determined on a peaceful policy there is little prospect of any fresh loan, at any rate from Western Europe. The expressions used with regard to the islands of the Ægean in the Turkish reply to the Note of the Powers were consistent with the intention to begin another war against Greece at an early date, and the recent expenditure of a large sum, which Turkey obtained not from revenue but by borrowing, upon a battleship seems to point in the same direction. The Governments of the Powers have in their hands a means of influencing the Turkish Government towards peace. It consists in making the settlement of the financial conference dependent upon the definite acceptance by Turkey of the decision made by the Powers in regard to the islands. This would be a right and proper step to take, for it would be absurd for Greece to pay Turkey money to cover the Turkish debt in respect of Macedonia and the islands if that money were to be used for mobilising the Turkish Army and Navy for an attack upon Greece. The improvement of Turkish administration is impracticable without European assistance. This Sir Adam Block freely admits, and he points to the excellent work done at the request of the Turkish Government by Europeans such as Sir Richard Crawford at the Customs. But he reminds his readers that Turkey has for many months past been asking the Great Powers for foreign experts and inspectors, as well as for gendarmerie officers, for the reform of the civil administration of the Anatolian provinces. Up to the date of the report, however, which was the 9th of January, no decision had been reached in regard to what Sir Adam Block evidently thought the greatest service the Powers could render to the Turkish Government and the population of Turkey. There were some reasons for this delay. Some of the Powers are jealous of the employment in the Turkish service of subjects of some of the others. The matter is therefore one requiring delicate and sometimes prolonged negotiations. But since Sir Adam Block wrote progress has been made. Only the other day it was announced that an agreement had been reached between Turkey, Germany and Russia for the administration of the two Armenian provinces under European inspectors.

If there is, among those who now have control of the government and policy of Turkey, a statesman large-hearted enough to be devoted solely to his country's welfare and large-minded enough to face the real facts he may learn from Sir Adam Block's report, of which he will be able to read between the lines, what are the conditions of the preservation of the Turkish Empire and of the restoration of its prosperity. They are to begin with a frank acceptance of the result of the late war and a resolute preservation of the peace for the next ten years. The first necessity is the establishment of efficient administration in Anatolia. That means competent and upright heads of provinces and districts; impartial courts administering justice to all classes, races, and creeds; and the construction of good roads through the country as adjuncts to the railways that have been made and are about to be made. If these three things are done the people will have security for work, for earning, and for saving. The revenue will then increase, and it will be possible to establish a budget and to have a series of years with a surplus instead of a deficit. Then it will be possible to look further into the future, for Turkey's credit will then be re-established. Any other course, and above all a fresh war, means that Turkey will run further into debt. In the case of a State in Turkey's condition an increase of debt means an increase of foreign control. Turkey is no longer independent. She is in the hands partly of her creditors and partly of the States that have created interests in her territories. If she aims at recovering her independence she must choose the right means, which consist in solvency or financial independence. A Turkey able to pay her way would be in a position to have a policy and to play a part in the world. A Turkey drifting towards bankruptcy must be drifting at the same time towards disintegration.—The Morning Post.

Honor.

The idea of honor is supposed to be one of the contributions of Norse chivalry to the ethical culture of mankind. In the age of chivalry, said Gibbon, all the men were brave and all the women chaste, and the two virtues embodied the distinctive 'points of honor' for each sex. The fusion of Christian sentiment, which in its original purity knew nothing of military bravery, with barbaric militarism produced the peculiar cult of personal dignity as centred on a restrained strength which could be used only in a righteous cause; and the very parfit, gentil knight, who might fight for God or his lady, for the weak and oppressed, but in no less noble contest, became a central figure, is the moral ideal of the western world. The code of honor supplied gaps in the ordinary system of morals and law. Debts of honor were those which a sensitive man felt to be only the more binding because they could not be enforced. Honor forbade to take the advantages which circumstances, law, or public opinion might allow. Even conscience was less sensitive. A thing might be within the bounds of actual right, but honor, as a super-conscience, would avoid anything that could seem tainted by winds wafted, however far, from the realms of the base or the weak. Who shall deny that honor has really meant these things to many, and has motivated acts beyond count, unnoticed and unrecorded, of chivalry and abnegation?

But, as with other servants of mankind, the best work that honor has done has been secret and unnamed. As a reality, she whispers in the ear of the individual man or woman, stimulating or shaming him in the most intimate of his personal dealings. When she goes forth into the market-place, or offers her wares as the badge of a caste or of a nation, her leadership is of very different quality. When we begin to hear talk of the national honor on the platform or in the Press, we know that there is going to be a hard time for common sense and common decency. The national honor, far from being hypersensitive on nice points of conduct, knows very little of the commonest obligations, and will barely leave to the public men who serve it the rags of private honesty to cover the nakedness of their dealings. It is in vain for a few to protest that the nation's honor cannot be exalted by acts that would disgrace its humblest member as a man; that, on the contrary, a great civilized people may win its highest honor by scrupulous regard for the rights of a weaker nation, and that a land which boasts itself the mother of liberty may add to its laurels by extending the borders of freedom within its world-wide empire or by holding out a hand to oppressed Armenians or threatened Persians. To the upholders of national honor, these are words, breath, garnished possibly for platform rhetoric when they happen to chime in with other needs of policy, but utterly incongruous with the real forces which underlie their appeal to public sentiment. To them the national honor means the power of the nation to make itself respected, and respect for a nation means fear based on physical force. For honour in this connection, we should read brute strength and the determination to use it remorselessly.

It is much the same when the code of honor is the creed of a caste. It may be even worse, for honor as a caste possession is something exclusive. Outsiders do not share it, and to admit them to its laws and usages is contaminating. All the circumstances of the birth of honor, all its history and lineage, play upon the meaning of the word in this connection. The code of honor is the appanage of those that bear arms, and except as mere 'common' soldiers, flesh for the cannon, men hired for slaughter at a shilling a day, or driven into battle under the lash of conscription, and commonly are not arm-bearers. The mastery of arms is the hall-mark of aristocracy.

and use of arms the foundation of honor. The shameful accusation, the insult, the blow, must be wiped out in blood. Not only is it a point of honor to give satisfaction to the man one has wronged, but to stand his fire, to measure swords with him, wipe out the wrong from the scutcheon of the door. The tarnish is removed from the name, baseness is redeemed by the overshadowing greatness of courage, which, like charity in the rival code, covers a multitude of sins. But if the wrong is due to or by the inferior, who can bear no weapon, no such remedy is of avail. To cross sword with such a one would be to derogate from the dignity of caste. He may be chastised, but not fought.

These conditions of the law of honor have been refined and softened in many dwelling codes. The duel could not wipe out all offences, and there are acts of baseness which would make a man unworthy to be fought. The duel, moreover, at least contemplates a fight on equal terms, in which each party exposes his life, and to most votaries of honor the principle of the fair field is elementary and the meanness of undue advantage axiomatic. The legendary chivalry of the duellist is replete with instances of the surrender of points vantage, the return of the dropped sword, the courteous delay till the opponent has recovered a slip. Here at least, if honor means anything but brutality, we expect to see her restraining hand at work in the hottest of the encounter.

It is reserved for Prussian militarism, with the characteristic national thoroughness, to work out the real implications of honor as the machine-soldier is to understand it. Honor for the German officers is that which can brook no insult; so far we are still in the duellist's code. But the Prussian officer in resenting insult must make no miscalculation of the chances as between him and his opponent. He must know no restraints, and submit to no delays. He must give chase to those who have ventured to smile in his dignified presence, and if he only catches a lame cobbler, he must then and there slash him over the head while his underlings hold the man's hands. To this he is prompted, not by hot resentment, not by innate brutality, but by the inexorable command of a lofty duty. It is his honor which is assailed, his personal dignity which is exalted, by this exposition of the power of ten men, armed, to deal with one in his shirt. To what strange uses do words come. The private schoolboy in his first term learns, if he did not know it before, that to hit a smaller boy is mean, that to get others to hold him for the purpose is still meaner, and to belabour him so held with a weapon, mean beyond the credibility of meanness. But with the Prussian the dialectic of honor, as a metaphysician might say, has worked itself through. Its inner contradiction has come to the surface, and it has passed over into its opposite of the utterly abased.

Take honor in its sub-intention as that title to the respect of others which is justified by their well-grounded fear, and you have its full meaning proclaimed in all its glory in the sabre marks on the lame cobbler's head. Hideous to all beholders in its nakedness, this same conception parades through the speech of many of us, muffled up in the trappings of lofty sentiment when we talk of saving the honor, it may be of a man, it may be of a family, a class, a profession, or a nation, by that which, if revealed to all the world in its essence, would only cover them with disgrace. The logical Prussian—worthy countryman of Kant—only shows us whither we are going, and where our half thoughts tend, just as he teaches us what the rule of the soldier means when it realizes its ideal of emancipation from the restraint of Parliaments and the checks of civil law. It is not our part to scold him but to thank him for a double object-lesson in sincerity and in political philosophy.—The Nation.

The Bagdad Railway.

In 1875 the first section of what was known as the Anatolian Railway was built by German Engineers to the order of the Turkish Government. In 1888 it was transferred to a German company. In 1890 the Sultan, Abdul Hamid, granted to the Emperor of Germany, whom he styled "his only friend in Europe," the concession "for the extension of the said railway from the Bosphorus, across Asiatic Turkey, to the mouth of the Shat-el-Arab, on the Persian Gulf."

This concession was transferred to a German Syndicate, which assumed the name of "The Bagdad Railway Company," and after certain modifications, it commenced business.

In 1903 the German company made certain proposals to England, Russia, and France to participate in the construction—by taking shares in the company.

Russia refused, as she believed it was an aggression against her spheres of influence in Armenia and North Persia, and her frontier south of the Caucasus. The interests of France were mainly financial, but the alliance with Russia compelled her to act in unison with her. England feared an intrusion upon her interests in the Persian Gulf and so also refused.

The concession to the German company was in the following terms:—

1. A ninety-nine years' lease.
2. The construction of the line from Konia, the terminus of the Anatolian Railway to Bagdad, the ancient capital of the Saracen Caliphate on the River Tigris, and from thence to the Persian Gulf. The distance from Konia to Bagdad is 900 miles, and from Bagdad to Bassorah, 350 miles.
3. The line to be divided into twelve sections of 200 kilometres each—and to be built under so-called "Kilometric Guarantees."
4. The company to receive an annuity per kilometre of 11,000 francs for construction, and 4,500 francs for working when the line was opened.
5. The capitalised value for each of the twelve sections to be calculated at 54 million francs, and Turkish 4 per cent. bonds to be issued to the company, before starting work on any given section.

These bonds, though not worth their nominal value, have nevertheless, so far, been enough to enable the company, not only to meet its expenses, but also to make a fair profit.

If Russia, France, and England decided to boycott the Bonds, then the German company could proceed only very slowly in the construction. This is what has occurred.

The line, so far, has been built to Burgulu, which is situated at the foot of the Taurus Mountains, a distance of 125 miles. It was opened in 1904. Tunnelling through the Taurus Mountains is proceeding. It has still to cross these mountains, and to cover more than two-thirds of the distance to Bagdad.

Financial difficulties, revolution, the deposition of Sultan Abdul Hamid, and the publication by the new Sultan, under the inspiration of the Young Turks (the so-called Committee of Union and Progress), of constitutional government, have all operated to retard its progress.

The Young Turks really disapproved of the concession, but German diplomacy, and the natural leaning and good-will of the leaders of the Turkish Army toward the German Government, restrained them from annulling it.

Since 1903, when the Conservative Government rejected the overtures of the Bagdad Company, our relations with the German Government have been very strained. This is indicated by the following extracts from German papers:—

1. Die Post brands English demands for control of the Gulf terminal of the Bagdad Railway as "interference with the rights of Turkey, which the Ottoman Government cannot, and will not, in any circumstances tolerate. The Bagdad Railway is a Turkish line, crossing Turkish territory. No State has a right to demand supremacy over any section of this work of civilisation. England has no right in the Turkish Bagdad Railway, other than financial. The railway is Turkish, and will remain Turkish, from the Bosphorus to the Persian Gulf."

2. The Vossische Zeitung accuses Great Britain with "trying to secure for herself rights of predominance, to the exclusion of Germany, which represents the capitalists concerned in the German portion of the Railway." And adds that "other ways and means to solve the problem must be found." Further, "that British proposals will not be considered satisfactory unless Germany approves of them, and that Germany can, if necessary, refuse her consent to the 4 per cent. increase of Custom duties"; also that "the Wilhelms-trasse will repay Downing Street on the Persian Gulf for unfriendliness shown in the Morocco question." With regard to 1903, it says that "Mr. Balfour was not wholly responsible, but he failed to resist the popular agitation aroused by an ill-informed Press. The mistake he then made continues to bring its own punishment to the present day, and it will grow worse the longer England delays to repair the mistake."

3. The Boerse Courier says: "If Great Britain fails to profit by Germany's conciliatory attitude with regard to the Gulf section of the railway, that section, like the rest of the line, will be built without the co-operation of British capital."

4. The Kreuz Zeitung says: "The British claim to a protectorate over Koweit is unjustifiable, and should be submitted to the Hague Tribunal."

5. The Berliner Tageblatt says: "Turkey, as the Sovereign Power over the whole region traversed by the railway, has the right to have the first word in the matter, also the final decision. The question whether Bassorah or Koweit shall be the terminus requires a solution by which Turkish interests are not threatened. Germany seeks nothing more."

6. The Abendpost says: "British influence at Koweit, which is the only possible Gulf outlet to the Bagdad Railway, has hitherto proved a fatal obstacle to this great project."

7. The North German Gazette says: "It is Britain's business, if she has any special wishes regarding the Bagdad Railway, to formulate and submit them to the only factors contractually concerned in the undertaking, namely Turkey and the Bagdad Railway Company."

8. The Frankfurter Zeitung: "While people in Germany have accustomed themselves to treating the Bagdad Railway as an exclusively commercial affair, Englishmen are apparently unable to divest it of the political aspect with which it has been artificially endowed. English supremacy in India, control of the Persian Gulf, the pretended protectorate over the Turkish town of Koweit, all serve as a basis for demands directly concerning what is, indisputably, Turkish territory. The British Government is urged to demand control of the terminal section of the railway, and to make the granting of this demand a sine qua non for future friendly relations with Turkey and Germany. That England lays claim to a protectorate over Koweit and to a control of the terminal section of the Bagdad Railway is an incontrovertible fact. But the question is: What right has England in connection with the terminal of the Bagdad Railway?"

"No matter how the Koweit pretensions may be settled, no sort of half, or full, protectorate would give the English any claim upon the southern section of the Bagdad Railway.

"As soon as the English Government applies the right standard of their own practical interest to this question, they will find the Turks and German sensible parties with whom to deal."

9. The Frankfurter Gazette says: "The Grand Vizier has made the important pronouncement that the construction of the Bagdad line as far as Bagdad is an absolute necessity, and he was personally, and irrevocably, determined to carry this policy into realisation. But in regard to the final section, from Bagdad to the Gulf, an understanding was inevitable; and he pledged the credit of the Government to the attainment of a suitable settlement."

A semi-official communication in the same paper offers to English people who are nervous about the danger to the Indian Empire the advice to consult a map, pointing out that the distance from Koweit to the Indian frontier is about the same as from Portsmouth to Naples. And it hopes that the sound instincts of Englishmen will enable them to overcome the political Chauvinism from which their handling of the question has hitherto suffered."

10. The Norddeutsche Zeitung invites England to formulate her wishes and demands regarding the final section of the line, and adds that they will be sure to receive friendly consideration on the part of Germany.

11. The Vossische Zeitung, in an issue subsequent to the one previously quoted, says: "Any proposal which would involve British control of the final section of the Bagdad line would, under no circumstances, be entertained by Germany. The agreement with Russia enables Germany to override British resistance. If England persists in her demands, Germany will know how to act, despite England."

"If Englishmen would reckon up the net profit which has accrued from their country's anti-German policy of recent years, they will find that the total is nil."

As a sequence to the above extracts, I will quote what the Tanin, a Turkish paper says:—

"In 1901 Great Britain undertook not to occupy Koweit, or to extend protection to Sheikh Mubarak. Turkey simultaneously agreed not to send troops to Koweit and to respect the status quo. Nevertheless, in consequence of the project to build a railway from Bagdad to Bassorah, the existing situation cannot continue. Moreover, there is a necessity for securing order in Mesopotamia."

It adds: "As Turkey will respect the rights of Great Britain in the Persian Gulf, she hopes, by friendly negotiations, to obtain a favourable solution of the Koweit question."

I think there is very little doubt that the article in the Tanin was inspired by German diplomacy, and that the Turkish Government has been tutored to lay claim to a suzerainty over the Sheikh of Koweit. It is borne out by a further article in the Vossische Zeitung, to the effect that "the British Government has proposed that the four Powers chiefly concerned, viz., England, Turkey, Germany and France, should each participate in the financing of the scheme, to the amount of one quarter of the capital required; in return for which England is willing to admit the Turkish claim to the suzerainty over Koweit." It appears, however, that the proposal of participation in the financing of the scheme emanated from Turkey, and not from England, and was to the effect that Turkey and Germany should each hold 80 per cent. of the shares, and England and France 20 each. As this would have placed the control of the line entirely in the hands of Turkey and Germany, England objected to the proposal.

Now let us examine the political status of Koweit. In 1899, when the Conservative Government was in power, and Lord Cranborne was the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Lord Curzon, then Viceroy of India, concluded a secret treaty with the Sheikh of Koweit, by which "the Sheikh agreed not to cede any territory to third parties, and to conduct all his foreign relations in accordance with our wishes." This treaty bears the date January 25th, 1899. Either the Sheikh had the power, or he had not, to make this treaty. It is argued that, though he was practically independent, as all the Sheikhs in those parts are, he acknowledged the suzerainty of the Sultan; and that the Crescent, as an emblem of the suzerainty, floated over his house. His explanation of it was that it was merely an emblem of the Moslem faith, and by no means a symbol of Turkish sovereignty; and that he paid no taxes to the Sultan.

When Lord Morley was Secretary of State for India, this subject was discussed in the House of Lords, and this is what he said on the 22nd of March, 1911:—

"The position as his Majesty's Government found it in December, 1905, when they assumed office, was that the concession of the Bagdad Railway, from Konia to Bagdad, Bassorah, and some indeterminate point on the Persian Gulf, had been granted some years before. The concession was not only for the main line, but also for certain branch lines, the most important of which was the line to Kanakin, on the Turco-Persian frontier. Articles appeared in the papers daily assuming that we had a right there to do what we pleased. But the fact was, it was not our soil, but belonged to Turkey. The Germans were there, because the Turkish Government had given them the right to be there." He understood that certain important arrangements had been recently arrived at in Constantinople, and that they were substantially as follows:—

"By arrangements between the Turkish Government and the German Concessionaires under the Convention of 1903, the Bagdad Railway Company acquired the right to build a line to some point on the Persian Gulf, to be determined thereafter. Under Article 12 of the Convention, the Company acquired certain preferential rights to construct branches to the Mediterranean, on the coast of Syria."

"Under the arrangements now arrived at in Constantinople, His Majesty's Government understood that the Company renounced their right to the section of the railway between Bagdad and the Persian Gulf, and also their right to construct a port of Bassorah, on condition that they received a certain share in any new Company—presumably a Turkish Company—formed to carry out the parts of the line which they had now renounced. On the other hand, in fulfilment of the terms of the Concession, the Company had come to an arrangement whereby first their branch line was to be built from Oormanich on the main line to Alexandretta—on the Gulf of that name. And secondly, that certain revenues were to be allocated to them, in accordance with Article 35 of the Concession of 1903. By this arrangement the Turkish Government had regained its liberty of action regarding the section of the railway between Bagdad and the Persian Gulf. His Majesty's Government now wished to arrive at a settlement which would remove all apprehension that the Bagdad Railway and its terminus would create diplomatic friction between the parties interested. But Germany, as the original Concession-holders would have to be consulted, and her agreement would be necessary."

Since the 22nd. of March, 1911, when the above speech was delivered, further developments have been as follows:—

1. A correspondent, writing from Constantinople to the German paper, Lokal Anzeiger, says: "The Porte has decided to negotiate with Germany alone about the construction of the Bagdad Railway as far as Bagdad. There is to be an exchange of views between Turkey and Germany with reference to the extension of the line to the Persian Gulf, and on the basis of these views negotiations will be opened with England and France."

2. In furtherance of these views, the following proposals were made:—

The capital to be equally divided between Turkey, Germany, Great Britain, and France. Each to have equal participation on the Board of Directors, the President to be an Ottoman, with, however, one vote only. Regarding the branch railway to Alexandretta, mentioned by Lord Morley in his speech, the Ministry of Public Works in Constantinople, having finally approved the plans for the Mediterranean port of the Bagdad Railway at Alexandretta, and the Branch line from Toprakale to Alexandretta work on these lines is being carried out.

The negotiations regarding Koweit, and England's sphere of influence in that State and the Persian Gulf, were temporarily suspended when the Turco-Balkan War broke out. Russia has withdrawn her opposition, as the result of the meeting between the Czar and the Kaiser at Potsdam in November, 1910, and no longer desires to have a share or any control over the railway. The reason for the withdrawal is said to be an arrangement that Germany will not oppose the construction by Russia of a railway in the north of Persia, linking on to the Bagdad Railway at Khanikin on the Persian frontier.

I really cannot see what interest financial or otherwise, France has got in this matter. She certainly poses as the protector of the Syrian Christians, and has done so ever since the Druses and Maronites of Mount Lebanon were at war with each other about fifty years ago; but this does not give her any claim to share in the construction of the Bagdad Railway. And now that her ally and predominant partner, Russia, has retired, we ought, if our "Entente Cordiale" is more than a name, to get her to retire also.

It appears from the Paris papers, notably the Temps and the Libre Parole, that the French Foreign Office still thinks it has an interest in the negotiation. We ought to be able to convince it that the continuance of this attitude only perpetuates the existing friction between ourselves and Germany, and prevents an amicable settlement. The question would then concern only Turkey, Germany and ourselves. And with resolution and firmness, we ought to be able to arrange that Germany should construct the railway as far as Bagdad, and we from Bagdad to the Persian Gulf. We should strive to get our protectorate over Koweit acknowledged by the Sultan (Germany has no right to object to it) or under his suzerainty. If possible, we should try to arrange matters amicably, and not be deterred, or intimidated, by bluff and bluster. Our attitude must be immovable; we cannot divide with Germany the control of the line between Bagdad and Koweit. In the words of Lord Lansdowne, spoken in 1903: "We should regard the establishment of a naval base, or of a fortified port, in the Persian Gulf by any other Power as a grave menace to our interests, and should certainly resist it by all the means at our disposal."

The following is the present Grand Vizier's statement on the subject:—

"The granting of the Concession to a German Company, with kilometric guarantees, in preference to an English Company, which was ready to undertake the enterprise without such guarantees, was the work of a previous Government. It would be useless to criticise it now.

"The duty of the present Government is to respect the arrangement. We shall never tear up the convention which we have concluded. The state has lost nothing through kilometric guarantees. The prolongation of the line has been definitely decided. The linking up of Constantinople and Bagdad will guarantee our future prosperity. The £300,000 a year which the final section to Bagdad will cost us is nothing beside the result we are determined to attain. We will never abandon the scheme. Regarding the line from Bagdad to Bassorah, we hope to conclude a satisfactory arrangement. We shall overcome all obstacles. Our only aim is the interest of our Empire."

It will be observed that he has said nothing about the German Company's right to continue the construction of the line from Bagdad to the Persian Gulf, nor has he touched on the claim of Turkey to the suzerainty over Koweit.

Since the above statement was made, a considerable change in the demeanour of Germany has occurred. Some people attribute it to Lord Haldane's mission to Berlin, followed by Lord Morley's visit; others, to Sir Edward Grey's firm attitude, he having declared that it was England's firm intention to insist on our rights in the Persian Gulf. These combined appear to have impressed Germany and Turkey with the conviction that England cannot be trifled with, and that without her adherence and whole-hearted consent, the difficulties which exist at present cannot possibly be removed. This is shown in the more moderate language now used by the German Press.

In almost similar terms, the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, and Kölnische Zeitung publish the significant statement that "there is not the least reason, political or otherwise, why English money should not be allowed to share in the construction of the final section of the line, the railway being nothing more than a route intended to open up the districts of Turkey-in-Asia, at present unapproachable, to the trade of all nations."

The Frankfurter Zeitung and the North German Gazette say: "We desire to call special attention to the fact that the name of Koweit does not appear in any form in the Bagdad Concession. The Bagdad Company is authorised to build the line from Zobeir (near Bassorah) to some point on the Persian Gulf. It need not, therefore, be built directly to Koweit, although the harbour of that place has many advantages."

The North German Gazette further "assures England that doubts regarding anti-British preferential rates on the Bagdad line are groundless.

The French paper, Le Temps, remarks on this: "The English Government will, no doubt, recognise Turkish sovereignty at Koweit, on the condition that the autonomy of the Sheikh is respected, and that English interests are fully admitted and safe-guarded."

It is now said that an Anglo-Turkish understanding, in connection with the Persian Gulf, has been arrived at, as follows:—

"The Turkish Government recognises the British protectorate over Koweit, and concedes the eventual right of the construction of the line from Bassorah to Koweit; that Bassorah shall be considered the terminus of the Bagdad Railway, and that the line shall be continued from Bagdad on the same conditions as the other sections of it.

"At least two British delegates shall be appointed to the Directorate, in order to supervise all transactions, and prevent discrimination in the treatment of goods."

Now let us consider the agreement at which the Emperor of Germany and the Czar of Russia arrived, when they met at Potsdam in November, 1910.

By this agreement, as already stated, "Russia withdraws all opposition to the construction of the Bagdad Railway, on condition that she is allowed a free hand in the building of railways in the North of Persia. That is, that Germany will raise no objection to it." And that the "Bagdad Railway Company will connect at Khanakin with the projected Russian line."

I presume that, if our present relations with Russia continue, the projected railways, from Baku on the Caspian Sea to Julfa, Tabriz, Enzeli, Resht, Kazvin, Teheran, and Meshed in the north of Persia, and branch lines from Teheran to Astrabad, and from Tabriz to Khanakin—as shown on the accompanying map—will be constructed. Although they will not pass through Turkish territory and do not concern Turkey, they are a much greater menace to our Indian Empire than the Bagdad Railway, and apparently beyond our control. Meshed the sacred city of Persia, is only 200 miles from Herat, which is on the boundary of Western Afghanistan, and about 340 miles from Merv in Russian Turkestan. Russia has already a railway line extending from Merv to the borders of Afghanistan. If we should ever be at war with her, and this, owing to her tortuous policy and the difficulty of our placing any reliance on her diplomatic methods, is very probable, she would have two lines of railway, by which she could throw large bodies of troops into Afghanistan, and overthrow all the force that the Afghans might bring against her, long before we could reach Herat, which is 399 miles from Kandahar and 881 miles from Peshawar. The Noroye Vremya of December 9th, 1912, says, with regard to Lord Curzon's speech in the House of Lords: "It is criminal. Even England's enormous influence in Asia would not avail to put back for a single day the inevitable destiny of Persia, if Russia determined to bring matters to an end there. The invincible British Fleet could not prevent Russia from occupying Teheran, if she so desired."

It does not appear probable, at the present moment, that the Ameer of Afghanistan would agree to our extending the Scinde-Peshin Railway to Kandahar, and from Kandahar to Herat. Even if he did, it would take years, and cost millions of money, before it could be completed. What is there to prevent Russia from forestalling us, and occupying Herat on the commencement of hostilities?

It cannot be too seriously impressed upon Parliament and the Foreign Office that our interest in Persia and the Persian Gulf have been in existence ever since the founding of our Indian Empire; that Russia's interest, if at all admitted by us, is, in comparison, of very recent date; while Germany's interest in Asia Minor and Asiatic Turkey dates only from 1888 and 1899.

Our entente with Russia, for which France is responsible, has not only created ill-feeling in the hearts of all the Mohamedan races throughout the world, but has also discredited us in the eyes of Europe. It is openly talked about on the Continent that the war between Turkey and the Balkan States, with its dire results, has been due to the intrigues of Russia and France. That they were both jealous of the influence which Germany had acquired in the councils of the Sultan, and of the concession for the construction of the Bagdad Railway. The first step in the intrigue, it is said, was the instigation of the Young Turks (a great many of whom were educated in France, and who formed a large proportion of the leaders of the army) to depose the Sultan Abdul Hamid, and to set up a constitution. The second step was an attempt to induce the new Sultan and the Young Turks to cancel the Bagdad Railway concession, on the plea that, owing to his deposition, all the acts and concessions of Abdul Hamid lapsed de jure et de facto. But the Young Turks, and the Turkish people generally, had for years been in favour of the railway, believing that it would be of great advantage in assisting them to consolidate their military strength, and to bring over large bodies of fighting men from the Asiatic provinces, and thus enable them to cope with the Balkan States in the war which they knew was approaching. The Balkan States had not completed their arrangements when Montenegro precipitated matters by proclaiming war. It is said, and believed, by Germans, Austrians and Hungarians that this was done at the instigation of Russia. We have been drawn into the negotiations which are now taking place, although we have no political interests in the quarrel.

An article in a French paper, Le Temps, now states: "The position in the negotiations between Turkey on the one hand, and England and Germany on the other, in connection with the Bagdad Railway, is as follows:—Several months ago Turkey and England arrived at an agreement with regard to the Bagdad-Persian Gulf section (1) that English capital was to be represented in the Bagdad-Bassorah section by two English administrators ;

(2) that the Bassorah-Koweit section was not to be constructed ;
(3) England obtained certain advantages in the Koweit region."

The German Government, on being informed of these negotiations, declared that "it by no means considered the rights appertaining to it by virtue of the Firman of concession of the Bagdad-Persian Gulf section had been annulled by the concession of the port of Alexandretta. It claimed, therefore, to participate both in the negotiations and the construction of the Bassorah-Koweit section of the railway, or at any rate to secure compensating advantages."

"The advantages it claimed were : A promise that, at the financial conference in Paris, the representatives of Great Britain will support those of Germany when they ask that the Customs surtax affected by the guarantee of the Bagdad Railway be maintained, and renunciation on the part of England to construct a branch starting from Mohammerah. This matter is being discussed with the French Government." 1.

In connection with it, let us carefully study the announcement just made in Parliament by Sir Edward Grey, viz. :—

(1) "That Great Britain withdraws objections to German construction of the Railway as far as Bassorah."

(2) "An extension of the Railway from Bassorah to the Persian Gulf must be conditional upon British approval"

(3) "Two British Directors will have seats on the Railway Board, as a guarantee against differential rates ; not that these have ever been a subject of grievance on the Anatolian and other German Railways in the Ottoman Empire."

(4) "Great Britain waives the idea of participation in the construction of the line."

(5) "The navigation of the river up to and beyond Bagdad is a substantial British interest which may be developed and consolidated." 2

(6) "Turkey's suzerainty of the Gulf is recognised ; and the proposed agreement is direct between Great Britain and Turkey, not between Great Britain and Germany ; but Turkey recognises the autonomy of the Sheikh of Koweit at the Gulf."

(7) "In south Persia Great Britain claims the right to construct railways ; and such a railway is under survey from Mohammerah to Khoramabad." 3

As we have "waived the idea of participation in the construction of the Bagdad line," the right of it, of course, will belong solely to Germany. Suppose—and it is not an impossible supposition—that Russia and Germany were at some future date to join hands, the peril to our Indian Empire would be very serious.

In the explanation given in 1908 by Sir Edward Grey in Parliament, in connection with the treaty with Russia regarding spheres of influence in Persia, he said : "The main part of the agreement is not commercial but strategical, and of the strategical position Seistan is the key. To have left Seistan within striking distance of Russia would have been a real danger, and would have led to an increased charge on India for extra defence." No doubt this was all quite true. But when Russia has completed her railway from Batoum and Baku, on the Black and Caspian Seas, to Meshed—within striking distance of Herat—the danger to India will be very much greater, and very real.

A French paper, the Journal, now states that, in addition to the diplomatic negotiations relative to the interest of Germany and Russia in Turkey and Persia, pourparlers have been opened for floating a Russian loan of twenty million pounds in Berlin ; and that the banking firm of Mendelssohns will undertake it.

I append a translation of an article in the Berliner Tageblatt of December 29th, 1913, alluding to one in the Tagliche Rundschau, regarding the developments which have taken place in this matter :—

"For years this undertaking (the Bagdad Railway) has threatened to become a bone of contention between Russia, England and Germany. The German Government has now, through its cleverness and tenacity, succeeded in removing all differences, and in bringing the line altogether into German possession.

(1) Evidently the above article has been inspired by the French Foreign Office.

(2) Bagdad is on the River Tigris, 190 miles above its junction with the Euphrates. Nothing is said about the latter river, although it is also navigable almost up to Aleppo.

(3) It will be noticed in Germany's claims already mentioned, and underlined by me, she claims "renunciation on the part of England of her claim to construct a branch starting from Mohammerah." There is therefore, apparently, a conflict between her and England on this point ; and she very probably thinks that as she has gained her wishes on all other points, she will succeed in this one also. The Government (Conservative) which was then in power is very much to blame for allowing her to obtain a footing in Asiatic Turkey. Perhaps it was in return for the assistance she gave us at the Berlin Conference in 1878, regarding which the Earl of Beaconsfield declared that "he had brought back peace with honour."

"When the 'Deutscher Bank' sought and succeeded in obtaining the first concession for the Anatolian Railway, that forerunner of the Bagdad Railway, nearly twenty-five years ago, the first section of the Anatolian Railway was granted to France, as later the section of the present Bagdad Railway to the Mediterranean (Adana-Merina) fell to an English Company. At the present moment the completion of the whole line from Constantinople to Bassorah via Bagdad ; from the Bosphorus to the Persian Gulf ; is secured by a Company controlled by the 'Deutscher Bank' without English or French participation. And in three years' time the Bagdad Railway will run from the Bosphorus to Cassarah, via Bagdad, and will be able to convey its passengers and goods to the steamers of the Hamburg-America line. Not only is the main line across Asia Minor secured, but also two branch lines, stretching east and west—from Bagdad past Khanakin into Central Persia, and from Aleppo to the Mediterranean, via Alexandretta. In addition, three forts, Constantinople-Haiderpasha on the Bosphorus, Alexandretta on the Mediterranean, and Basra on the Persian Gulf, all bear witness to the result of German enterprise and capital."

In this way will be accomplished, says the Tagliche Rundschau, a work in which Germany has from the beginning invited the participation of all the Powers, including France, England and Russia ; it will be achieved without Russia, England, and in spite of their opposition.

Russia was the first to come to terms with the Bagdad Railway—which, though it could not be prevented, could still be delayed—in the Potsdam Treaty of two years ago, which brought about the understanding between Germany and Russia, and arranged that they should share in an extension from Bagdad to Teheran. By this, Germany obtained the yield of the rich petroleum wells on the Turco-Persian border, and access for her trade with Persia itself ; Russia gained access to the Mediterranean and, via the Bagdad Railway, to the Persian Gulf, both hitherto prohibited by England.

England has also, during the Balkan war, seen her way to change her Eastern policy, and that with regard to Germany especially. An understanding was arrived at in the Anglo-German negotiations, and an agreement was reached as to the future extension to Bassorah by the Bagdad Railway Company, to give it its present title ; and, in addition, the completion of the harbour of Bassorah on the Gulf, by means of an Anglo-German company under a German board of directors.

Paul Dehn reckons the Indian parcel traffic over the Bagdad Railway at fifteen trucks a week, and 15,000 passengers per annum.

With regard to shipping on the Tigris, and the African and other questions, the Anglo-German agreement shows a satisfactory understanding. Turkey on her part, changes her false position in Koweit for the real advantage of the consent of England to the increase of the Customs duties there, and the employment of them for the Bagdad Railway.

Finally, France also has now made up her mind. She was originally invited to join, but Delcasse refused, putting, as he did the policy pursued by Russia before the consideration of the interests of the French railways in Asia Minor in connection with the Bagdad Railway. France now renounces all further opposition to the railway, and agrees to the increase in the Turkish Customs, and its employment on the line.

She also gives up all influence in the Bagdad Railway by returning to the Deutscher Bank all her shares (one-third).

Le Temps is right in saying, with resignation, that only one settlement could be expected in the future. There were two possibilities ; the admission of the Bagdad shares on the Bourse, or the return of them to the Deutscher Bank. It is the second of the alternatives that has taken place.

With Russia and England indifferent, the French share in the capital of the railway, a mere third, ceased to have any practical influence on the management of the German undertaking in Asia Minor. Therefore, a settlement was obviously necessary.

This shows clearly that German diplomacy, backed up by German bluff and bluster, has gained its ends. It will, no doubt, in time squeeze us out of Asiatic Turkey, as it succeeded in squeezing us out of East Africa, where we surrendered to her country which was ours by virtue of having been explored by Speke, Grant and Stanley.

Parliament alone should have the power in the making of treaties. The Foreign Secretary should be only the medium for presenting the necessary information.

—T. A. O'Connor in the Fortnightly Review.

Going to Work.

SCHOOL was only yesterday, and yet it was finished for ever. The little world of green fields, of wide walls covered with maps, of well-thumbed, dog-eared books, of all kinds of friendships, jealousies and competitions had already faded so distantly that it seemed faint as a dream.

About him now were wide, long streets, and all the bustle and movement, of a strange world. Outside, cars with their eager drivers were spanking past; there were cabs and trams, lorries and bicycles—a very whirlpool of movement, which seemed to have no other direction nor purpose. They came from all sides, and they went away from every side without as much as a look at him. The footpaths were equally thronged. So many different people, and all grown up! Only now and again were boys to be seen. The world had suddenly become mustachied and grave, and yesterday a mustache was the badge of age! It seemed that the world was full of people who had mustaches and spectacles. Yesterday a person who wore spectacles was called "Old Four Eyes." It meant a silly person, an incompetent, at whom one flung snowballs or clods in their season, and whom one held at a distance always.

A fat man was waddling along the road, but no person looked at or made fun of him. A woman fought with her umbrella, which had become twisted among parcels—not a living soul laughed at her! A driver had just set down his fare, and, climbing to his seat again, he slipped on the greasy wheel and fell, but nobody shouted the funny things which were customary.

These matters would have been enough to make one die of laughing yesterday, but yesterday was undoubtedly dead, and to day was a world in which he had no part. Things had always centred about him before. Lessons, fights, games, all had swung in his immediacy, not alone within focus, but actually within reach of his hand, and here, suddenly, he was out of focus and out of touch. There were happenings on every side, which had nothing to do with him. None of the drivers of these cabs and cars looked to him for approbation or assistance. Not a tram-man suggested that he should do anything for him. The very cyclists kept their eyes for themselves as they whizzed steadily past. No one stopped even for a minute to ask him a question, or to say—"It's a nice day!" or "That's a fine building over yonder!" Nobody said a word. They went here and there, and if he did not get out of their way, they got out of his without so much as looking at him.

He was lonely, it is true, but he was not unhappy. A curious person has no time to be miserable, and he was very curious. There were such multitudes of things to look at and listen to—the never-ceasing stream of people who came towards him on the pavement, and the hurrying swarm of those who caught up, passed, and disappeared every moment. Where did they come from, and to what places were they going? They appeared before him, vital and human, for one brief moment, and then they disappeared. Had he anything to do with them? Was there no point of contact between himself and these hurrying strangers? Were they hastening utterly out of his sight, or would they return to-morrow or the next day to clap him on the shoulder and say—"You and I must know each other well: we will walk together and tell our secrets to each other and be friends"; for, without knowledge, he knew that people must be friends, and that no other life than that of friendship is possible.

He had these feelings, but not these thoughts, and even the feelings were not verifiable because the sun was shining, and the bustle and movement of the world forbade any exercise other than those of eyes and ears, but somewhere, without effort and without cognizance, he was recording and storing away impressions and intricacies, raw stuffs of every kind, which his mind would digest later on when it got a little time to itself.

Meanwhile, there was something to be done which did not admit of loitering. He looked again at the paper in his hand: it was crumpled and dirty, but he clung to it as to an anchor. The pencilled address on it was almost indecipherable, but, although he knew it by heart, he read it again with the same care as at first. At the end of each street he had asked some hurrying stranger "Did he know the way to—Street?" and they had all given him a complicated direction, of which he could remember nothing but the first turning. He halted again and asked one of those flying nobodies, and the stranger replied without looking at him—"You are almost beside it," said he: "it is the second turn on the right," and the stranger melted away as all the others had done.

He paced on. All kinds of thoughts were in his mind. Perhaps that man did not really know where the street was. He might have answered only to get rid of him, or he might have thought, honestly enough, that he was giving the proper direction and yet was mistaken, for in a place of the hugeness of this city one might easily be mistaken. There were streets everywhere, and off each street other streets branched endlessly. It did not seem possible that one could know with such readiness where any particular place was in such a congeries of streets: furthermore, he had a feeling that the place for which he was seeking could not be so easily discovered as the man's remark implied. It was only one street off! Can one reach a place of wonder and terror in half-an-hour's easy walking? One should take ship and fight through savage forests and naked enemies to come to any place worth winning to.

At the end of this street also he halted, and although his heart began to beat painfully, yet he was chilled. There was a sensation of emptiness at the pit of his stomach. He felt that now he had come so near to the end he would be glad not to search any farther. The end was too definite, too immediate. Half-an-hour was not sufficient time to make one accustomed to any consummation. He might have turned and walked away again, but there was no place to go to. He would not be allowed back to school, and his parents were away in England—he walked on.

At the next turning he halted again, and asked another man where—Street was?

The man looked at him.

"This is it," said he calmly. He raised his hand slightly and pointed, "There it is," said he, and he also went quickly away.

He was standing by the very street. Six paces more, and he was standing in it. It was a narrow place. Two lines of high houses frowned over a long strip of road. The road was dotted here and there with a few cars, and there were perhaps half-a-dozen people walking in it. It was very silent.

He walked down the street consulting his crumpled piece of paper, and at a certain house he halted. Then he put the scrap of paper in his pocket, and knocked very gently on the door.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that muscle is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (13s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parache necessary.

Indian Finance.

London, Mar. 19.

Presiding at the meeting of the Chartered Bank of India, Sir H. C. Turner said that it had been decided to open a branch at Peking. It was impossible to look for great improvement in China until the finances had been put in order. He suggested that the Powers should reduce or abolish the Boxer indemnity payments in return for which they might arrange for the abolition of Ekin on foreign goods, paying only Customs duty of 5 per cent.

He referred to India's adverse balance in trade and thought that over-importation was symptomatic of India's increased spending capacity. He endorsed Sir William Meyer's statement that "the staying power of the Indian people had increased." The collapse of native banks was entirely due to the absolute disregard of elementary principles of banking. The position of European banks had not been impaired. It had even been strengthened. He paid tribute to the prompt and skilful action of the syndicate which restored confidence by taking over silver, and extolled the Currency Commission's report, which he said would dispel many misapprehensions, and show that the Government of India had not mismanaged the finances as was believed. He agreed with most of the conclusions of the Commission, notably in regard to more liberal granting of loans to Presidency Banks from treasury balances, which the mercantile community of India would much appreciate. As regards a State Bank, he endorsed the opinion of Mr. Robert Campbell of the National Bank of India, that it would be a serious and new departure for the Government of India to interest itself in a State Bank.

Patna University.

Banpikore, Mar. 21.

The Government has published the report of the Patna University Committee to-day for opinion. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council will consider the report on 1st May before which suggestions should be submitted. There are eleven notes of dissent appended to the report. The Beharee members have opposed the introduction of the School Final Examination. The report states that the University Colleges will be teaching and residential, and admit a number of non-collegiate students also. There will be the Patna College, the Bisheshwar College, (the present Behar Nation College), a Missionary College, besides Law and Sanskrit Colleges. The mofussil colleges which have all been made Government Colleges will be affiliated to the University for examination purposes. There will be a paid Vice-Chancellor. Students, after passing the Intermediate Examination, will be admitted into the Law College for a three years' course for a degree in Law. Science teaching in B. A. will be concentrated in the University College and also the Outback College.

Later.

The report of the Patna University Committee is just published. The University will be located west of the new capital on a comparatively high plot of ground, well-wooded and suitable for building purposes. It comprises an area of nearly two square miles. It is proposed to open a railway station close to the University area and run trains at convenient times and issue cheap season-tickets. There will be a good direct road from Banpikore to the University and a subscription of a rupee a month can place the student in possession of a bicycle "which would ultimately become his own property." The new University will be composed of the following colleges situated within the University area:—Patna College, Bisheshwar College (by which name the Behar National College will henceforth be known), King's College, a Mission College, a Sanskrit College, a Training College for teachers, and a non-collegiate department. For the present the following will be the external colleges of the new University: Greer College of Muzaffarpur, T. N. J. College of Bhagalpore, Ravenshaw College of Cuttack, and St. Columba's College of Hazaribagh. Of these, Muzaffarpur and Cuttack Colleges are shown as Government institutions. One feature of the University will be the Archaeological Department. The fees paid for tuition, residence, athletics, and social amenities will vary in the different University Colleges and classes from Rs. 7-8 to Rs. 17. Another feature characteristic of the Patna University will be that students will be allowed after passing the Intermediate Examination in Arts or Science to sit for the L.L. B. Degree without being required to graduate in arts or science, as is at present the case. The administration of the University will be vested in a Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, Convocation and Council. The Lieutenant-Governor shall be the Chancellor and the Vice-Chancellor will be paid at Rs. 2,250 a month, in addition to a sumptuary allowance of Rs. 250 a month and free quarters. The Convocation will consist of about 160 members, of whom 25 will be elected by the general body of registered graduates. The Council will be the supreme executive authority of the University, and will be responsible for its general and financial administration. The capital expenditure has been estimated at Rs. 77,40,030, and the recurring charges will amount to a little over Rs. 10 lakhs. There are in all 16 notes of dissent, of which the most important are the two signed by all the five Behar members. There appears to be considerable opposition to the abolition of the Matriculation Examination. The Raja of Kanika, in the course of his note of dissent, given expression to the hope of the Uriyas to have a University of their own in the near future.

Indians in South Africa.

London, Mar. 20.

According to a telegram from Johannesburg to the Daily Telegraph, a Mahomedan Deputation recently waited upon Sir Benjamin Robertson and requested that the Government would recognise the religious aspect of the marriage, divorce, and succession laws according to the Koran. They said that the Mohamedans would accept nothing less.

Sir Benjamin Robertson, while sympathising with the Deputation, twitted them with their long silence. He said that he would lay their request before the Viceroy, but held out no hope. It would be unfair, he declared, to ask the Union Government to change the laws.

The Deputation begged Sir Benjamin Robertson to thank the Viceroy for his efforts on their behalf, and to assure him that whether the law was passed to suit them or not, they would always be loyal to the King and the Flag.

Greek Navy.

Athens, Mar. 20.

In the Chamber to-day, the Minister of Marine announced that orders had been placed for additional three dreadnoughts, three armoured cruisers, and a proportional number of light units.

Gardens of the Moghals.

London, Mar. 20.

At a crowded meeting of the Indian Section of the Royal Society of Arts yesterday, Mrs. Villiers Stuart epitomised her recent book on the Gardens of the Moghals. She urged that the possibilities of the new capital were not even yet fully realised. "It is not necessary," she said, "to confine ourselves to the Indian craftsmen to imaginative reproductions of the East. The new needs and our modern wealth of flowers would give a fresh life of loveliness to the ancient symbols and ideas, while by busts and statues, Indian heroes could be honoured in the garden of their Emperor."

Mr. Abbas Ali Baig said that the idea of beautifying New Delhi in conformity with the traditions and sentiments of the Indian people was both realisable and desirable.

Mr. Lawrence Weaver, of Country Life, pointed out that Mr. Lutyens had done more than any other architect to develop the water gardens so praised by the lecturers in this country.

Delhi Sedition Trial.

Delhi, Mar. 28.

The application made by the defence in the Delhi sedition trial to have the case heard at Lahore, instead of Delhi has been refused by the Chief Court.

Rash Behari Bose, the absconding accused, has not yet been arrested. Rewards of five thousand and two thousand rupees are offered for information concerning him. The preliminary examination will be resumed to-morrow.

Esperanza Riots.

Durban Mar. 22.

Thirteen of the Indians charged with public violence in connection with the affray at Esperanza last November have been sentenced at Umtata to six months hard labour. The fourteenth Indian was acquitted.

Epirotes' Revolt.

Athens, Mar. 24.

Fifty-two Albanians, including 25 gendarmes, were killed and many wounded and seventeen Epirotes wounded in a four hours' battle at Andritsaina, which ended in the rout of the Albanians. Many bands of Epirotes are marching on Korytza, which Albanian gendarmes have abandoned.

Vienna, Mar. 24.

The Neue Wiener Tagblatt understands that in yesterday's conversations between the German and Austrian Emperors the international situation was adjudged absolutely peaceful and reassuring.

Petroleum Near Bagdad.

Constantinople, Mar. 24.

The British and German Governments have reached an agreement with regard to joint exploitation by an Anglo-German Company of petroleum fields in the Vilayet of Mosul, the concession for which a British petroleum syndicate obtained two years ago. An application will be made to the Porte with a view to the transference of the concession to the new Company.

Constantinople, Mar. 24.

The British and German Ambassadors have informed the Porte of the agreement reached with regard to the exploitation, for petroleum in the Vilayet of Mosul, and negotiations will now proceed with the Porte.

Kurdish Revolt.

Constantinople, Mar. 24.

The newspapers report a serious riot on the Bagdad Railway near Jerablus. Several hundred Kurdish labourers, it is said, revolted on the question of pay. Firearms were used and three Kurds were killed and five are missing. It is believed that they were drowned. Many were wounded in the affray, including seven employees of the Company. The Vali with the British and German Consuls and troops here started for the scene.

London, Mar. 24.

According to advices received at the offices of the Anatolian Railway Company, the rioting at Jerablus was more serious than was at first supposed. Eight German engineers, one Austrian, and one British were among the wounded.

British Consul's Report.

Constantinople, Mar. 25.

A telegram received from the British Consul at Aleppo on the subject of the rioting at Jerablus makes no mention of any British subject having been wounded, but states that two British subjects, who were excavating on behalf of the British Museum, had difficulty in restraining their own Kurds from joining in the fray.

The Circassian Guard belonging to the Germans fired on a British subject, who, however, was not hurt.

Our London Letter.

London, 6th March, 1914.

THE LATE EARL OF MINTO.

THE death of Lord Minto will undoubtedly cause as much sorrow and grief in India as it has caused in this country. His opponents in common with his supporters could not fail to recognise in him that broad sympathy, honesty of purpose and courage of conviction so essential for an administrator and a governor. The late ex-Viceroy was by no means a brilliant Governor-General, but he was amply gifted with an unusual degree of insight into affairs and fortitude, which proved of immense value to him during his trying period of office in India. It was Lord Minto who had to face the perils and the dangers of a situation that had been created by his immediate predecessor. To him fell the burden of ruling an India which had been saturated with sedition and anarchism as a direct sequel to the misdeeds of Lord Curzon, whom the Times, by the way, has described as "the most brilliant and energetic Viceroy India has had since Dufferin." The Indian situation on Lord Minto's appointment was indeed critical and required very sound statesmanship for its solution. His appointment to the Indian Viceroyalty did not at the time create any degree of confidence in those who "knew" India, both in that country as well as in England. Lord Curzon's resignation, they argued, was nothing less than a disaster from the Imperial point of view. The retiring Viceroy, who had revelled in the most barbarous splendour, who had always looked down upon the Indians from a lofty eminence of superiority and who was ever remote from the spirit of the Indian peoples, according to them, was the only man who could successfully tackle the then existing condition of affairs. In other words, these "well-informed" personages did not hide their well-known doctrine that India was to "be ruled with a rod of iron," if all discontent and sedition were to disappear. They had openly drawn their swords against the new Viceroy with malice gleaming over the steel. They had condemned the man before he was tried. Things, however, proved otherwise. From the very moment Lord Minto landed in Bombay, in the end of 1905, he won the affection and the esteem of the Indian population by his characteristic courtesy and his well-known amiable disposition. India at once recognised in him that genuine sympathy which he so vividly demonstrated throughout his term of office. It cannot be denied that Lord Minto, notwithstanding his faults and shortcomings, was a sincere man. He was no slave to the detestable characteristics of self-consciousness and conceit, which were the prominent features of his predecessor, who had attempted to act the despotic Moghul of Delhi. Lord Minto had at once made it abundantly clear that his first and foremost aim was to "serve" India. On the other hand Lord Curzon had endeavoured to "rule" the great Dependency of the Empire with such disastrous results. The contrast was indeed astonishing. The changes brought about in the political life of India during Lord Minto's Viceroyalty were equally bewildering.

During the epoch-making five years, when Lord Minto presided at the head of the Government of India, a series of measures were for the first time introduced in the administration of the country, which will render his association with the government of India truly historical. The appointment of two Indian representatives on the India Council and the subsequent inclusion of an Indian Member in the Viceroy's Executive Council were the most important steps on the programme which Lord Minto's far-sighted policy had laid down in active co-operation with Viscount Morley, that Veteran "Guru" amongst the Liberal statesmen. The enlargement of the Councils, in spite of the not unjust criticisms levelled at them in certain quarters in India, was another honest attempt on the part of Lord Minto towards the more extensive and closer association of the Indian people with the administration of the country. It has not really provided for the long-felt want, but it has certainly proved itself as the first step in the field of representative Government. The creation of the All-India Moslem League in 1906, when the late ex-Viceroy received the famous Mohamedan deputation at Simla, is another great event, which will for ever maintain his memory fresh and revered among the successive generations of that great community.

There are, however, one or two factors connected with Lord Minto's administration which do not unhappily permit of the period under review being recorded as wholly and completely successful in every respect. Part of the repressive measures directed, contemporaneously with reforms, towards the suppression of sedition, was a very serious restriction on the freedom of the Press. Attacks upon the liberty of opinion are always dangerous, just as a plausible case for them can usually be made out; but in India they went beyond the point at which justification ceased, and the change in the temper of the new India makes their inaptness to-day particularly glaring. Here is the opportunity for a simple and highly desirable change. It is also to be regretted that Lord Minto did not succeed in throwing open the commissioned ranks in His Majesty's Indian Army to the Indians themselves. Had his government introduced this over-due military reform in India, his name would have certainly gone down to posterity in the annals of the Empire's military history and the introduction of such a highly desirable measure would have added the crowning glory to his undoubtedly otherwise successful Viceroyalty. The martial races of India keenly feel the persistent denial meted out to them, on the part of the authorities, of their traditional privilege of defending the country and the Empire. The loyalty and the bravery of the Indian soldier have been repeatedly tested and found true. The Indian subject of His Majesty is second to none in his devotion and attachment to the King-Emperor's throne and person. The Indian commissioned officer will be equally devoted to his King and country and in fact will be able to exhibit his loyalty to, and his sense of duty in the service of, the King-Emperor to a still higher degree. It is now well-known that Lord Minto was personally in favour of awarding commissioned ranks in the Army to suitable Indians and that as a matter of fact he had strongly urged upon the India Office the adoption of his scheme. But the Secretary of State did not find himself in agreement with Lord Minto's views and the proposed reform was necessarily dropped. It is certain that at no distant time this matter will again become prominent, and let us earnestly hope the authorities will see their way of immediately removing this stigma, which has for so long stained the military administration of the Indian Empire.

It must be mentioned to the great credit of Lord Minto that in spite of numerous trials and ordeals, which had fallen to his lot in India, and notwithstanding the admittedly difficult and serious questions which had constantly engaged his attention throughout the stormy and critical period of his office, the late ex-Viceroy never mistook the constitutional demands of the Indians for revolutionary agitation and never for one moment confused the legitimate "unrest" in the country with sedition and anarchism, as has been done in certain ill-informed quarters. Lord Minto was a true servant of India and in that noble capacity promoted her interests and welfare to the best of his ability. He may have had his weaknesses and his failings, but judging his work in India as a whole, it will be no exaggeration to say that to-day India mourns the loss of a man who had treated her with that sincerity, sympathy and devotion, which the millions of His Majesty's subjects in the great Eastern Dependency of the Empire rightly and with justice expect in their Emperor's representative. Lord Minto discharged the duties of his high office honestly and conscientiously, and his name will hold an honourable, if not an eminent, position on the distinguished roll of Indian administrators.

MR. SHAW DESMOND'S ARTICLE ON INDIA.

"Shall We Lose India?" forms the subject of a remarkable article by Mr. Shaw Desmond in the March number of the London Magazine. The article is illustrated and contains the portraits of Lord Morley, Lord Carson and Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal. Mr. Desmond, according to the editorial note inserted in the Magazine, has for some years been in very close touch with prominent people—both English and Indian—who have made a close study of the question of Indian unrest in the great Dependency itself. That Mr. Desmond honestly believes the statements made in his article to be absolutely true the editor does not for one moment doubt, but he is quite prepared to find that many well-informed people will take a different view of the Indian question and he (the editor) will probably be able to publish letters taking a more hopeful view of the situation in an early issue of the London Magazine. What is wanted, of course, is to get at the absolute truth about the matter, (says the editor), whether that truth is pleasant or unpleasant. Nothing can be gained by living in a fool's paradise; and if there is any justification at all for what Mr. Shaw Desmond says in his article, it is only right that the British public—which, after all, is responsible for what occurs in India—should be acquainted with the facts.

A careful study of the article itself makes it clear to an impartial observer that, notwithstanding the true representation of the Indian situation on the whole, as far as poverty, discontent and strained feelings go, the writer is certainly acting the alarmist to an unusual degree. He is creating an "Indian peril" almost akin to what was so recently dealt with in the columns of the Times. Mr. Desmond's article is also deficient and imperfect in the sense that, in spite of his having narrated at length the various factors responsible for the present "dangerous" situation in India, he concludes his communication without in any way attempting to offer any remedial measures for its solution. This is to be regretted as the panic, which his article is bound to cause in the mind of the average Englishman, would have been necessarily mitigated, had he tried to produce a suggestive plan on the lines of which he would advise those concerned to follow, if peace and happiness were to be restored in India.

"The cord", Mr. Desmond proceeds, "which binds Britain to India may be cut at any moment. The great Brown Continent is 'becoming so packed with combustible matter that a flare-up is only 'a question of time unless Britain wakes to the truth at once, and, 'by sweeping reforms, sets her Indian palace in order.' One, however, searches in vain in the article for the expounding of the "sweeping reforms" referred to in the above lines. He shows, however, a proper acquaintance with facts when he goes on: "The men who are 'sending home 'official versions' have a dreadful blood-guiltiness on 'their shoulders. Official versions are—well, just official versions. 'They are routine—'comfortable' versions. They represent the 'skeleton, not the soul, of India.' He again shows a real grasp of affairs in India in the following lines:—"Official reports may be some- 'where near the truth when they start from the men at the bottom 'of the ladder, but they are trimmed and pruned as they ascend, 'through higher officials, until, on reaching the Imperial Government, 'they are merely documents of deceit. Heaven help the lower official 'who tells the naked truth"! "India," the writer concludes, "is the 'powder magazine of the world, into which a spark at any moment may 'be thrown, followed by such an explosion as will reverberate around 'the globe. If English officialdom has any imagination, it will tackle 'the problem of India ere it be too late." But the reader is not enlightened as to how Mr. Shaw Desmond would require English officialdom "to tackle the Indian problem." It is not without its significance that this article on the "Indian bogey" has been prominently advertised in the Times, from which your readers will no doubt draw their own conclusions.

"India" has been rather a favourite theme on which great "authorities" have been lately airing their views in the periodical Press of this country for the "benefit" of their less-informed fellow-citizens. Mr. F. H. Brown has written an article on the "Social Dawn of India" in the current issue of the Nineteenth Century. It is a harmless communication, which deals more with the recent report on the Indian Census than with anything else and is not likely to furnish the reader with any particularly intelligent material for consumption. Incidentally we are told by Mr. Brown that Christianity is "spreading" in India and also that the number of Indian literates is likewise increasing, which is a new "discovery" indeed. The former piece of information will, let us hope, bring some consolation to the broken-hearted Church dignitaries in this country, who are at loggerheads with one another over the Kikuyu controversy, though those who are in touch with the missionary propaganda in India can well understand what is meant by Mr. Brown when he says Christianity is "spreading" there. However, as I have said before, his article is perfectly harmless, thoroughly uninteresting and absolutely devoid of any special significance and as such, I suppose, has been unfortunately considered well worthy of publication in the Nineteenth Century. In fairness to the high reputation this periodical enjoys amongst thinking men and women of to-day, it must be frankly admitted that the article under review is not likely to enhance its good name by any means.

"Asiatics" contributes an article in the National Review on the South African Indian problem, in which he takes the Indian National Congress and its leaders to task for having deliberately neglected the question until lately, apologises himself with becoming modesty for his past efforts in warning the public men in India of the urgency of the situation in South Africa and thinks Sir Muncherji Bhownagree is the only Indian deserving any praise for his constant advocacy of the cause of his fellow-countrymen in that Colony. The Hon. Mr. Gokhale and Sir Pherozeshaw Mehta and the other Indian leaders, who have devoted all their energy, time and attention to this burning question it is curious to note, do not receive any recognition of their services at the hands of the superior "Asiatics."

The current number of the Fortnightly Review also contains an able article on the same subject from the versatile pen of Sant Mital

Singh, who is a frequent contributor to the British periodical Press. Obviously he traverses the old familiar grounds of argument, but on the whole his article is certainly entitled to careful consideration on the part of those who are desirous of studying the present Indian situation in South Africa.

TURKISH AVIATION DISASTER.

The recent disaster to the two Turkish airmen, Fethy Bey and Sadick Bey, at Samha Station on the Hedjaz Railway, during their flight from Damascus to Jerusalem, will no doubt cause universal grief and sympathy throughout the Moslem world. Fethy Bey was one of the most daring aviators that has ever ascended in the air and his death will certainly be a great loss to the Ottoman Army. He had distinguished himself during the Balkan Campaign and had proved himself of immense value to the military authorities for "information" purposes. Sadick Bey, though an officer of bright promise, was comparatively a novice in military aviation and was in the fateful flight, which has cost him his life, merely a passenger.

Such sacrifices are the necessary toll of the conquest of the air and Turkey, ever ready to sacrifice her sons for the defence and welfare of the Empire, will in this case accept over her recent bereavement with her traditional and accustomed fortitude. The loss of two gallant lives in the service of the Caliph will still infuse greater enthusiasm and keener passion amongst the Ottoman soldiers for further proficiency in this modern arm of the Sultan's forces. It is satisfactory to note that aviation is very popular in the Turkish military circles.

KHWAJA KAMAL-UD-DIN'S WORK AT WOKING.

I have from time to time informed your readers of the useful work which is being done at Woking by Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din. Gradually though steadily the Khwaja Sahib's work in that secular little town in Surrey has been expanding, and now the influence of his spiritual activities is being happily spread over the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. He has recently started a series of lecture-sermons in the beautiful Mosque at Woking mainly for the benefit of the local residents, for whose convenience he has selected Sundays for his meetings. Men, women and children flock to the Khwaja Sahib's sermons on Islam every Sunday afternoon, and though a good many of them are no doubt attracted to his meetings in the mosque by the novelty of the proceedings and merely out of curiosity, yet from what I could see last Sunday, the learned lectures of the Khwaja Sahib on matters Islamic and his eloquent sermons on the teachings of the holy Prophet are undoubtedly creating a sympathetic interest in Islam among the townfolk, who are being greatly impressed by the simplicity and straight-forwardness of the faith of the Moslems. In spite of obvious difficulties which are facing him in his sacred work—to a great extent due to the missionary reaction in Woking, brought to bear just recently in order to counteract the Khwaja Sahib's religious activities—the attendance is increasing week by week and last Sunday the mosque was overcrowded. As a matter of fact, the lack of accommodation in the mosque, judging by the present enthusiasm that prevails in Woking, will be a serious drawback, as the small rooms in the adjoining Sir Salar Jung Memorial House do not permit of the sermons being delivered there. Besides the sanctity of the mosque itself and the sacred character of its environment naturally exercise a unique and wholesome influence on those present. Our old friends, the missionaries, now preaching at Woking, almost all of whom have served in India, have started, it seems, a regular campaign against Islam in that particular locality. It appears that they have been trying their utmost to convince their congregation of the fact that the Islam preached to them with such dignity and force by the Khwaja Sahib is quite alien to the Islam practiced in India and other Moslem countries. The reason for this, of course, is not far to seek. Finding, much to their disappointment, that all their usual tricks had hopelessly failed in Woking to prevent the "Christian" public from entering the mosque and week after week listening to the truly practical, common-sense and self-convincing doctrines of Islam—which they had themselves for years deliberately and wantonly kept away from their hearers and which they had studiously represented as a terrible form of heathenism—the ever-zealous missionaries have now adopted this new line of attack. Nothing could be further from the truth. Every true Moslem in England is fully alive to the fact that the advocacy of Islam in Europe on sectarian principles would serve a fatal blow to the great cause in this part of the world, and nobody has acted more conscientiously in accordance with the letter and even the very spirit of this sound and only possible doctrine—one of the unwritten laws, so to say, for the promotion of Islam in non-Moslem countries—than the Khwaja Sahib himself. Those who have had the privilege of listening to his sermons in London will, I am sure, completely bear me out in what I have stated. His lectures at Woking similarly deal with that beautiful and magnificent picture of "United Islam," which has been checking the Christian missionary efforts abroad with such telling effects. For the moment, at any rate, Woking is the centre of Islam in England, and until the proposed mosque in London is an accomplished fact, that little town in Surrey will continue to be our religious head-quarters. Where are the workers?

THE ORIENTAL SOCIETY INAUGURATION AT NEWCASTLE.

An Inaugural Dinner was held last week for the Orientals residing in Newcastle-on-Tyne, at the Collingwood Restaurant, to form an Oriental Society, with Mr. M. Ba Gyaw, B. Sc., in the chair.

After the loyal toasts to their "respective rulers," the Chairman proposed the toast of the "Oriental Society," which was eloquently supported by Messrs. F. C. Li (China), A. K. Motawi (Egypt) and A. David (India).

The object of the Society is to promote the spirit of co-operation and closer social intercourse amongst all the Orientals in Newcastle; to discuss and adjust matters that relate to their well-being, both as a class and as individuals and to carry with them the spirit of good-will to their respective homes. This was the greatest gathering of its kind ever held at Newcastle and the large presence of the representatives of different Oriental nationalities showed promising signs that this small beginning will have a great future. Mr. A. Fahmy was appointed Honorary Secretary, after the Provisional President, Mr. M. Ba Gyaw, and Vice-Presidents, Messrs. David and Li were duly confirmed in their respective posts. The Society deserves every encouragement and has the best wishes of all Orientals in this country for its successful career.

INDIAN BOXER AT CAMBRIDGE.

Mr. P. L. Roy of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, a son of the well-known lawyer of Calcutta, who obtained his boxing Blue at the University last year when he was still a fresher, has won further laurels in the art. He went up to the Varsity with no little reputation as a boxer, which he had gained for himself at St. Paul's School. While at Cambridge Mr. Roy has fully maintained his reputation as a young pugilist and the expectations of his friends about him have been realised. He represented his University as a bantam-weight in the recent inter-Varsity competition held at Oxford on the 3rd inst. when the Light Blues won by five events against four. The Indian on this occasion met R. Balcombe-Brown of Oriel College, Oxford, whom he beat fairly easily on points. All these St. Paul's boxers have been well taught, but Roy is exceptionally good. Footwork and quick leads (left or right) are all his; moreover, he has nice height and reach. Roy outclassed his man from the start. Balcombe-Brown went the three rounds with great pluck, but Roy, like a chivalrous boxer, let his man off lightly when he had him beaten. Everyone was impressed with the class of Roy; a year's experience has made a wonderful difference to his general work, and it looks as if he had had a good turn with Jim Driscoll. His future career in the ring will be followed with great interest by the lovers of this branch of sport.

MR. H. E. A. COTTON.

Your readers, I am sure, will hear with great interest of the appointment of Mr. H. E. A. Cotton to the Deputy-Chairmanship of the London County Council, on which he has sat as a Progressive for some years and where he has been, until his present appointment, acting as Junior Whip to his party. As a son of Sir Henry Cotton, he has a traditional connection with India, where the honoured name he bears is a household word throughout that vast continent. Mr. Cotton is the prospective Liberal candidate for the Harrow Division of Middlesex at the next General Election and his success at the polls will be undoubtedly an immense advantage to the cause of India in Parliament, where he is certain to enhance the significance of an illustrious name.

MR. MUSHIR HOOSAIN KEDWAI.

Mr. Mushir Hoosain Kedwai attended, by special invitation, the ordinary monthly committee meeting of the Islamic Society yesterday, at which he was requested to take the chair, as a mark of the universal esteem in which he is held by the present members of the Society. Mr. Kedwai, it will be remembered, had for several years ably acted in the capacity of Hon. Secretary to the Society, which in his days was known as the Pan-Islamic Society. His many friends in India will be glad to hear that his cardiac affection is giving way under treatment since he has arrived in London, and it is hoped he will be soon restored to his normal health.

THE LONDON MOSLEM LEAGUE.

During the temporary absence of Mr. G. M. Ebrahim in India Mr. Ghulam Rasul is officiating as the Honorary Secretary of the Moslem League in London. Mr. Ebrahim's tour in India, it is understood, will extend over three or four months. He has been away from his home in Bombay for several years now, during which he has made a prolonged stay in the United States, where he was busily engaged in business. It is interesting to recall that, before finally settling down in London, Mr. Ebrahim, whose knowledge of Persian is very great, had acted as Mr. Morgan Shuster's Secretary, during the whole yet only too brief period of the American Treasurer-General's term of office at Tehran.

TETE À TETE

HIS EXCELLENCY HALIL HALID BEY, who has resigned his post as Ottoman Consul-General at Bombay owing to ill-health, sends to us for publication the following farewell message to his co-religionists in India:—"To all my moslem

A Farewell Message to Indian Moslems.

"friends,—Fate has been against my residing amongst you longer. "Ever since my arrival at Bombay I did not enjoy good health and "therefore I have been obliged to resign my post as the Ottoman "Consul-General. I deeply regret to go away from India so soon, "but I shall always take a most sympathetic interest in the affairs of "Musulmans of India and will always remain a devoted servant to "the cause of Islamic regeneration wherever I go. With affectionate "greetings to you all." We deeply regret that the stay in this country of such distinguished and cultured Ottoman representative as H. E. Halil Halid Bey should have been so brief. The Indian Musulmans share our regret in full measure, and it would be their earnest wish that Halil Halid Bey may be speedily restored to health and continue his life of active service to Islam and his country for many years to come.

THE situation in Ulster has suddenly grown desperate and it is difficult to exaggerate the appalling magnitude of the disruptive elements that have dramatically emerged into view. The Government proposals for the conciliation of Ulster have not proved to the taste of the Tory leaders. They have almost rejected them and declared that nothing would satisfy them short of a Referendum or a Dissolution. The Liberals who are not mere tyros at such game fully understand what it means. The subtle plans carefully laid by Sir Edward Carson and his followers have in the meantime begun to move with fearful rapidity and the results of the bold preaching of Ulster's right to rebellion are revealing themselves. Several high officers of the army resigned as they refused to fight against Ulster. The discipline of the army has been undermined. The War Minister has resigned and other high officials of the War Office are said to be contemplating resignation. The Liberal Ministry has evidently been shaken by the new developments. The end is difficult to foresee. It is quite possible the Opposition may succeed in forcing the dissolution before the Home Rule Bill is passed. But the political situation in Great Britain has grown in consequence of the Tory campaign of an utterly unscrupulous character to be the most desperate within living memory. The most democratic and oldest Parliament in the world is face to face with the supreme issue whether it shall, in the last resort have to bow to military dictation. The issue carries tremendous implications and we will consider them at some length as soon as the situation becomes a little clearer. It is enough to remember for the present that the Tories have, by reckless playing with fire, raised a conflagration with which may destroy some of the most cherished political symbols in their history.

We have received a letter for publication which has been issued by the Hon. Nawab Sir Salimulla Bahadur of Dacca and K. B. Syed Anlad Husain Secretary of the Reception Committee of the Bengal Moslem Educational Conference.

The Bengal Moslem Education- of Conference.

The letter, after referring to the recent administrative changes and the creation of the Presidency of Bengal and the need for the amalgamation of the two Educational Conferences now existing in Eastern Bengal and Western Bengal, states that a conference of the Mohamedans of the whole presidency has been invited to meet at Dacca during the Easter holidays, i.e., on the 15th and 13th April next. This will be the first session of the amalgamated conference after the constitution of the Presidency and urgent matters are obviously pending the decision of the community. The chief office-bearers such as President and Secretary are to be elected; rules and regulations have to be finally amended and framed; the whole organisation is to be adapted to existing needs and placed on an efficient basis; and definite and practical programme is to be devised for the future. The letter proceeds: "No patriotic movement can be successful, unless men "of education, culture, position and wealth take an active and vigorous part in all its affairs. It is hoped that the Mohamedan public "will be pleased to extend their kind co-operation and sympathy by "joining the Conference and taking part in the proceedings and "also by trying to return delegates and send visitors to attend the "Session of the Conference. The Reception Committee will make "necessary arrangements for accommodation, etc., and concession "certificates in respect of Railway fares will also be issued on getting "reply. All correspondence should be addressed to Khan Bahadur "Syed Anlad Husain, Secretary, Reception Committee, Dacca."

THE custodians of the European commercial interests in Calcutta and their mouthpieces in the local Press have never forgiven Lord Hardinge for abandoning that city and transferring the seat of the Government of India to historic Vested Interests and New Delhi.

Delhi. The change was announced on a peculiarly solemn occasion to which the King-Emperor himself had set the seal, and it was hailed throughout the rest of India as highly appropriate and gratifying to the people's instincts. But neither the direct association of the King-Emperor with the announcement nor the approval of an overwhelming body of opinion in the land could restrain the press stalwarts in Calcutta from engineering a peculiarly vindictive and violent campaign against the change. The papers like the Statesman and the Englishman have raved disconsolately since the dethronement of Calcutta and they have disdained to choose their epithets in their rabid and vulgar attacks on Lord Hardinge and his Government. In the delirium of their frenzy they have permitted themselves to say all sorts of wild and bitter things, all manner of devices have been pressed into requisition that the authors of the change might be held up to public ridicule both in India and England. Delhi was first of all pronounced to be insanitary, the haunt of mosquitoes and of snakes, of malaria and cholera and all the dire pestilences that the flesh is heir to. When this scare refused to "boom," the glories of Calcutta were discovered with unctuous pride. It was declared to be the living monument of the rise of British power in India, the mighty symbol of the creative energy of the British muscle and mind. To desert it was a rank betrayal. This tune, too, yielded few stirring notes, and finally fell flat. Recourse was then had to the primitive human instincts, and the stuffed chambers of superstition and creeping legendary horrors were exploited to the full. Delhi was the grave of empires and the spirit of death brooded over her traditions. The activities of a modern State would be unconsciously affected in the atmosphere of a vast, silent graveyard, with its haunting memories, its perpetual reminder of the unreality of things, its gaunt, unnerving suggestions. Arguments of less supernatural pretensions were of course not neglected. Government of India, we were told, would be condemned to isolation and would degenerate into a cumbersome, ill-fitted machine after the manner of all self-sufficing bureaucracies. It would be shut out from all healthy influences of progressive opinion and independent and enlightened criticism. As if the great "critics" of Calcutta were the sole guarantee for Great Britain to hold together its Empire in India! But the one argument that has helped to feed the fury of the Calcutta journalists has centred round "the cost of new Delhi." These reputed and well-tried "well-wishers" of India feel immeasurable anguish at the horrifying prospect that the backs of the poor Indian tax-payers should be bent with the addition of enormous burdens to gratify the vanity of a wasteful and reckless Government. To embark on fresh expenditure necessary to rear huge palaces in Delhi has been described as little short of criminal extravagance. India is too poor to be saddled with a huge capital outlay on an object of sheer vainglory. And the cost would be enormous. The Government of India know this, but they have been afraid to make a clean breast of themselves lest they should provoke hostile criticism and alarm public opinion in England. They have been deliberately bungling with figures. Their estimate of probable cost of £4 million, as set forth in their despatch of 1911, was false; the cost in no way could be less than £10 million.

ONE would have thought that such misrepresentations would be effectually stopped after the clear exposure of the Government attitude and policy in regard to the building of new Delhi which was given by the Viceroy in the course of his speech at the close of the Budget debate in the Imperial Legislative Council. According to a careful revision of the estimates the cost of new Delhi would not probably exceed £6 million. Lord Hardinge emphatically declared that "you may "safely rely on my vigilance and on that of the Hon. Finance Member and the Chief Commissioner of Delhi, whose experience in the "Finance Department stands him in such good stead, to see that no

"extravagance or waste of public funds is permitted." He rightly emphasised that India is worthy of a capital and the capital must be worthy of her. All the non-official Members of the Council who spoke on the subject made it fully manifest that the people of India would not grudge the cost of building a capital worthy of India. Yet the Statesman, whose love for India has become so demonstrative in this case, returns to a fresh attack on Lord Hardinge and his Government with habitual virulence and delivers itself with a malicious vulgarity that it would be difficult even for its henchman of the Liars Street to rival. It accuses the Government of bad faith and deliberate suppression of facts and starts by saying that "at the outset of the undertaking it was necessary to keep 'down the estimate to a minimum. If the full facts had been disclosed, the British public, who have a certain amount of conscience 'in matters of this kind, would have rebelled against the monstrous 'proposal to spend ten millions sterling upon a new capital." After this uncharitable fling it charges in full fury at Lord Hardinge, who had dared to describe the falsehoods of his Calcutta critics as "irresponsible 'statements made by interested persons." It absolves the innocent merchants of Calcutta of all ulterior, sordid motives in their denunciations of the change of capital. "They have not lost 'a rupee by the transfer," it declares triumphantly; though an unkindly critic may discern in the agonies of "disinterested" Calcutta merchants the sting of a very human pang at the loss of opportunities for social "distinctions," and for figuring in Viceregal functions and levees. But the Statesman and its clientele are, of course, above such petty snobishness. It is only the Viceroy and his colleagues who may succumb to a petty desire for selfish gains. "Lord Hardinge and his 'Council have been considerable gainers." Says the Statesman, "His 'Excellency receives a considerable entertaining allowance. How 'much has he saved by the attenuated hospitalities of Delhi? Members of Council are paid an absurdly high salary to compensate 'them for the expensiveness of Calcutta. What rent are they paying 'in Delhi?" And after a lengthy rhodomontade on the "project 'estimate" and "probable cost" it rounds off with a hope that public opinion in India and England may be roused to perceive "the 'cruelty and folly of wasting the resources of a comparatively poor 'people upon a luxurious toy." The insinuations in the words we have quoted are pointed enough. All we need ask is if the Press Act is impotent to stop this wicked campaign to discredit the Viceroy and his Government, a campaign which is frankly directed to bring into disrepute their motive, attitude and policy.

teaches them the universal brotherhood of mankind in the faith of Islam; making no distinction of colour or race. He tells them that Moslems are brothers, and that there are none higher or lower in the faith of Islam. He endeavours to turn them into orderly members of the society in which their lot is cast. He impresses on them the value of human life and the responsibility of man to God. He weans them from drink and the barbarous rites of heathenism to the simple worship of an All-Seeing, All-Wise Creator, and he asks them to revere the great Teacher who, in an age of utter darkness, called back the world to worship and the love of God. Is this the 'menace of Islam' against which the Protestant conference at Kikuyu has invented a pretended 'unity' in order to disguise the real divisions and contradictions of the sects represented at Kikuyu, in order to induce a factitious combination against the work of the Moslem missionary? The fundamental differences of belief, doctrine, and ritual are accordingly to be kept in the background with the object of driving the preacher of a simple faith, which admittedly raises the degraded heathen in the scale of humanity, from the field in which he has laboured so successfully. Upon the great question of the equal and absolute brotherhood of all men in Islam, without distinction of race or colour, are the Protestant sects agreed to denounce the colour line in Protestant civilisation? Will they abolish the colour line before asking any longer the natives of Asia and Africa to become members of a Protestant Church? They ask the African and the Asiatic to desert the faith of Islam in the One God, to desert the human brotherhood in the faith of the One God which Islam teaches to all mankind. What do they offer them in return? Had the religion they try to spread among the people of Africa helped to raise the proselytes in the scale of humanity, weaned them from drink, kept them from the vices of what is commonly called 'civilisation,' there might be some justification for the attitude they have assumed against Islam. But when every candid observer admits the difference between a convert to Islam and a convert to any rival creed, in sobriety, manliness, observance of parental and filial duties, and such homely virtues, we ask, would it not be a crime to prevent the Moslem missionary from pursuing unmolested his humanising work? The letter of the Bishop of Uganda published in The Times of Saturday, the 14th, shows exactly the spirit which animates the Christian pastors who seem bent on carrying into 'benighted Africa' the intolerance common in Europe and Asia."

The Times published extracts from the letter of Khwaja Kamal-ud-din in its issue of the 20th February to which Mirza Abbas Ali Baig Sahib refers in his letter to us. We have, however, received the letter as published in its entirety in another journal, and reproduce it here. It runs as follows:—

Kikuyu and the "Menace" of Islam.

"On behalf of 'the members of the Islamic faith residing in England we desire 'to enter an emphatic protest against the hostility to Islam displayed 'at a conference of missionaries belonging to a number of Protestant 'denominations at Kikuyu, in East Africa, and we rely on your courtesy 'and the fairness of your journal for the publication of our letter in your columns. We are convinced that the whole of the hundred millions of Moslems within the British Empire share our feelings of regret and indignation at the gratuitous attack on our faith; and we feel no doubt that the vast numbers of Christians, who believe with us that conscientious opinions are too sacred to be made the subject of attack by the followers of rival creeds, will consider our protest fully justified. A single quotation from the proceedings of 'The Committee of the Church Pastoral Aid Society' on the 15th January of this present year will be sufficient to show the latent hostility which animated the proceedings of the missionaries' conference referred to above. According to a published resolution of this body:—

The Committee of the Church Pastoral Aid Society desire to express their gratitude to the Bishops of Mombasa and Uganda for their patient efforts to promote unity on the East African Mission Fields in the face of the menace of Islam; and to assure the two Bishops of unreserved confidence, and also to express to the Committee of the Church Missionary Society their sense of fellowship with them at this moment of solemn responsibility.

There can be no doubt that those important agencies of Protestant missionary enterprise have adopted against Islam the device of an artificial and pretended unity, for the purpose of increasing the chance of Protestant propaganda against Islam. We are entitled, therefore, to ask, What is the 'menace' of which the Protestant missionaries are afraid? The humble missionary of Islam, without the accessories of wealth and power at the back of others, carries his simple faith to people immersed in absolute darkness; uplifts them from pure heathenism, teaches them the duties of life, and turns them into beings with a true conception of the relation of God to man; he preaches to them the power, glory, and love of God, the Omnipotent, the All-Seeing, Who is not made by hands, Who is the Creator Eternal, Who alone can give happiness to man. He

The Hon. Mr. Surrendranath Banerjee moved a resolution on the 19th instant in the Imperial Legislative Council, which, among other things, pleaded for the creation of advisory councils to help the district officers in the discharge of their executive duties. A similar resolution was moved the year before last which was negatived. Mr. Banerjee's resolution has also met the same fate. As we said on the previous occasion we do not think a district advisory council would prove a very useful institution. There are obvious reasons to fear that it might become an embarrassing dead-weight to a district officer who has real enthusiasm for his work and has genuine sympathy with the aspirations of the people. The district administration depends for its success on the type of the official that is placed in charge of it. A district officer with little sympathy for popular hopes and wishes would have little patience for his advisers, and if they mutually quarrel only the public interests would suffer. A sympathetic officer needs no formal advisory boards, for he would rather be hampered than assisted in his work if he is obliged to hold formal consultations at every step in the discharge of his duties. The real object that evidently underlay Mr. Banerjee's motion was to bring the district administration more closely into touch with the needs and wishes of the people. This object can best be gained by the appointment of increasing numbers of Indians of capacity as district officers. This is the real direction in which the reforms should move. It is also desirable that the district officer should be relieved of some of the duties that he has now to discharge. At present he has to do enormous work as he controls all the threads of the district administration. He is responsible for the peace of the district and for the collection of revenue and the control of a large revenue staff; he supervises the work of subordinate magistrates; he is the head of the Police and the Forest departments and is President of the District Board; he is District Registrar and Political Agent for any Native State attached to the district; he is the head of the P. W. D., supervises the work of Municipalities and is responsible for famine administration and for measures to deal with cholera and plague epidemics. In the first place he should be divested of his magisterial powers, and there are some other functions which he should hand over to District Boards or Municipalities or other local bodies which may be deemed necessary to create for the purpose.

The Hon. Home Member said that the proposed advisory council would impair the responsibility of the district officer. It would however, be well for the Home Member to bear in mind that the almost unlimited range of the district officer's duties makes it exceedingly hard for him to attend to his responsibilities with unimpaired efficiency. His functions should be distributed and purely local matters such as sanitation, education and sundry other things should be administered by local bodies. And for the efficient administration of the district generally more Indians should be raised to the position of the district officer. As things are, the Hon. Home Member's defence of his attitude is not altogether reassuring. If the reform along the lines suggested by us is opposed on the score that the district officer's authority would be impaired by the intrusion of middle men, we would rather have this "intrusion" inspite of its obvious drawbacks, for it is far better to have a sluggish administration of district affairs than to leave them to be looked after by a single man enjoying almost unlimited authority and occasionally possessing eccentric views on matters closely related to the welfare of the people.

We have received a copy of the pathetic petition which the grief-stricken and aged mother of Mr. Mohamed Husain Khan B.A. (Alig.) has submitted to His Majesty the Amir and in which she humbly prays for the release of her son.

It is an appeal for mercy and no one can read it without emotion and fail to be affected by the deep anguish that moves the heart of the hapless mother. The story of Mr. Mohamed Husain Khan's luckless plight in Cabul is already known to most of our readers. He is one of the most earnest-minded and talented graduates of Aligarh. He comes of a respectable Afghan family in the Jullundar district, and his love and enthusiasm for the progress of his race was boundless. Soon after he left Aligarh he applied for service under His Majesty the Amir in the new Education Department which the enlightened ruler of Afghanistan was organising with a view to create facilities for the education of his subjects on modern lines. The services of many Indian Moslem graduates were requisitioned for the purpose, and Mr. Mohamed Husain Khan was chosen as the head of the Translation Department. He went to Cabul filled with characteristic zeal for his task. The letters that he used to send to his friends in India in the course of the first two years of his service furnished a measure of the devotion that he felt for H. M. the Amir his master, and of the enthusiastic joy with which he dwelt on the prospect of the great Afghan race eventually reaping a glorious harvest of an up-to-date training and culture of which they were beginning to sow the seed. By a curious turn of the fortune's wheel this glorious vision of his was shattered, and he found himself one day suddenly flung into prison with several others including Dr. Abdul Ghani, the then Director of Public Instruction in Afghanistan. How this came to pass no one can exactly tell. Only wild rumours reached India at the time suggesting that Mr. Mohamed Husain Khan and his fellow prisoners were implicated in some sort of a revolutionary plot aiming at the introduction of a democratic form of government in Afghanistan. No authentic facts have come to light since then, no trial of the prisoners has been held up to this moment, and as far as we know no charges have been regularly framed or substantiated against them. In these circumstances it is not difficult to believe, especially in view of the conditions in Afghanistan, that Mr. Mohamed Husain Khan along with his fellow sufferers has been the victim of some cruel conspiracy. All those who know him well can hardly believe him to have been capable of plotting against His Majesty the Amir to whose personality he was attached with loyal and fervent devotion. He has suffered terribly and long—it is upwards of four years that he has been in prison. The sufferings of his poor old mother and his wife, who have none else to support them, have been no less great and pitiful. We appeal to His Majesty the Amir, and we are sure millions of Mussalmans in this country join us in this appeal, that he may exercise a gracious act of clemency and restore the unfortunate prisoner to freedom and to his home which his sufferings and those of his mother and sisters and his wife and his little child have made desolate. We do not know whether the case of Mohamed Husain Khan is ever allowed to come to the notice of His Majesty; but we trust it would be dealt with fairly whenever it reaches his ears, for the ruler of Afghanistan is well-known for his sense of justice and his kingly attribute of mercy. We hope the appeal of Mohamed Husain Khan's mother will reach His Majesty, and we are confident that it will not go unheard.

The Comrade.

A Muslim Ruler on Aligarh.

II.

LAST week we referred to the criticism that Her Highness the Begum Sahiba of Bhopal offered in her reply to the address of Mohamedan Educational Conference. To-day we deal with her to reply the address of the Trustees of the Aligarh College. Although Her Highness disclaimed any desire "to receive an excellent address and say a few pleasant things in reply," one must read Her Highness's reply to the Trustees' address carefully before he can discover the slender thread of criticism that runs throughout her speech. It must be remembered that unlike the reply to the address of the Conference, this speech of Her Highness was addressed to a mixed audience of Trustees, members of the staff, Old Boys and present students of the College, and this fact always makes it difficult for a critic to speak on such occasions as frankly as could be desired.

Despite these difficulties Her Highness has indicated clearly enough where progress has been slow and improvement is necessary. Referring to the growth of the College and the increase in the responsibilities of those who manage its affairs, Her Highness said: "It would be a clear indication of the evil fortune in store for the community if strained relations should exist between those who had devoted a valuable part of their abilities, time, wealth and life to the work of the community, spread education, founded this great College, strengthened it and endeavoured to spread its fame, and those others who had tasted the fruit of the tree which they had planted, that is to say, had received their education at this College and had become capable of sharing their educational efforts and the great responsibilities of the management of the College."

We do not think it would be difficult for those who are interested in the College to recall the time about ten years ago when one or two Old Boys of the College were the only critics of those who managed the affairs of the College. There was no "Young Party" then in existence, but only a couple of young men ten years younger than they are to-day. If the poet's principle be true and the Brahmin should deserve burial in the Ka'ba, because devotion, if steadfast, is the very essence of faith, then these early critics of Aligarh have ensured for themselves a grave in those sacred precincts. Nothing has yet daunted them, nothing has effectively discouraged them. But that is not their only merit. Their criticism was just and they did not stop at mere criticism. They fought for the good as well as railed at the evil. And the result is that many of those, that did not then comprehend their motives and their meaning are now their friends and comrades. You cannot name a single man, whether old or young, about whose independence of character there is no question who does not agree with them in interpreting the educational policy of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan. At least this is incontrovertible that you cannot point out a single Mussalman whose sycophancy is above suspicion who does not invariably vote against them. And because sycophancy is every day losing ground and independence of character, which generally, though not invariably, follows English education, is every day on the increase, the old Cabal can no longer count upon a comfortable majority, while the old minority of two or three is every day enlisting fresh recruits and compels respect for its views even if not acceptance.

Had there been any antagonism between those that planted the tree and those that ate of its fruit, it would have been very strange indeed, and the fault would have had to be traced to the seed that had been sown, the soil on which it had been cast or the husbandry that followed. As ye sow ye reap. But if the affairs of Aligarh are closely examined it will be easily discovered that the grouping of men into parties follows neither the line of cleavage between the Young and the Old, nor between those who created Aligarh and those whom Aligarh has created. Who among those living to-day could be older or more intimately connected with the foundation of the College than the venerable Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk Bahadur or could be younger than some of the Old Boys of the College who have only recently been co-opted as Trustees with the votes of some of the oldest of Trustees? Yet the late Honorary Secretary of the College is undoubtedly the leader of the so-called Young Party, and it is some of the Old Boys of the College themselves who do not yet boast of wrinkles and gray hair that lead the so-called Old Party. Had it been only a cleavage between the young and the old, those who side with the young would have easily found consolation in patience, for time is always on the side of the young. But the party of privilege which is in power can always secure a few recruits for its depleted ranks by dangling a certain amount "of distinction," and the victory of those who desire to place the control of a national institution in the hands of those whom the nation elects is thereby delayed. But it is encouraging to know that even under the present system of co-option more Trustees are being recruited on the side of democracy than on the side of oligarchy, and though delayed the hour of victory is not distant.

In the meantime those who are hostile to the interests of the Mussalmans and have recently knocked their heads against the wall of Muslim solidarity have spared no efforts to create a breach. At first a split between the All-India Muslim League and its London branch was loudly proclaimed and many Cassandra's prophesied a second Surat at Agra last December. But even when the prophets were proved false, hope was not altogether lost and it was believed that the two meetings of the Trustees within a month would provide sufficient sensation. We are glad that even this hope was belied and it is a pleasure to note that Her Highness the Begum Salaba has fully grasped the significance of the result of those meetings. While inviting attention to the mischief that every division in the ranks of the Trustees is likely to cause, Her Highness said that she thanked God that the sagacity of the Trustees had suppressed the mischief a great deal. We have so often appealed for a better understanding and with so little avail that we must frankly admit the only cure for the evil is that the reforms which we have long advocated in the Constitution of the Trust should now be speedily adopted and the Board of Trustees should be wholly composed of men periodically elected by independent constituencies. They alone can rightly claim to represent the community, for they alone would reflect the views of the community that elects them. So long as this is not done, Aligarh will be shot from one crisis into another as the experience of the last decade has amply shown.

We have referred to two efforts made by the enemies of the Mussalmans to create a split in the community. We have now to refer to a third and still more sinister attempt, namely the effort to create a split between the Shias and the Sunnis just at the time when Mussalmans had removed from their minds every sectarian bias in secular matters. Shias had sympathised with the troubles of the Turkey as sincerely as Sunnis, and Sunnis had felt the same grief at the troubles of Persia that the Shias had experienced. It was at such a time that old grievances were brought out and clothed with a new significance, and a most unfortunate series of incidents that occurred at Aligarh came to be looked upon as a God-sent by these enemies of the community. Much as we are inclined to praise the present solidarity of Mussalmans we must acknowledge that the foundation is none too strong as yet, and the greatest care must be taken in building up a superstructure that it can bear. But in spite of our intimate acquaintance with the time-honoured unsectarian traditions of Aligarh we must say we did not anticipate that Aligarh undergraduates of to-day would be able to bear the tremendous strain of recent incidents so well as they have done. Her Highness devoted a considerable part of her speech to an earnest appeal to the students on this subject, and we know how it will rejoice her heart to know that the appeal was not made in vain. The recent meeting of Aligarh undergraduates and the resolutions that they have passed on the subject of sectarian differences has a great and an unmistakable significance, and although we are loath to pamper men who have yet to win their spurs in the world, we shall be guilty of injustice if we did not say that by displaying such brotherly affection among themselves in the face of such difficulties the Aligarh students have set a noble example of unity and toleration to the older members of the community. They have magnificently upheld the traditions of their elder brothers and the ideals of Khalifa Mohamed Hasan Khan Sahab and Sir Syed Ahmed Khan.

Her Highness quoted two from among the many encomia passed on the Old Boys of Aligarh and in doing so said: "This is a kind of 'praise which should be handed down from generation to generation as a heritage and trust, and the present generation of students has always regarded it as such. But this heritage and this trust can remain safe so long only as your own character remains as high as that of your predecessors." Had we to select two testimonials from among the many earned by the Old Boys of the College that do justice alike to the claims of the Mussalmans and of the Government under which they are progressing, we could not have improved upon Her Highness's selection. The first testimonial which Her Highness recalled to the minds of the students was that given by Sir Auckland Colvin, formerly Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces. He had said: "To have been an Aligarh man is, I have

"over and over again found, a passport to the respect and confidence both of Englishman and Native. They carry with them the stamp 'of their training, the impress of the man under whom their training has been accomplished.'" He had also said: "An Aligarh College man has become synonymous with a man of liberal ideas, advanced education and independent character. He has become, above all, the type 'of the class of Indian who endeavours to do full justice to English desires, but expects us to do equal justice to his own.'" Another former Lieutenant-Governor of the Province had made the following observation with regard to Aligarh students. "They have the 'character of being upright and manly, loyal to the Government 'under whose protection they live, courteous and respectful 'without servility, and fitted by their upbringing for the 'practical work of their lives.'" This and no other is the heritage and trust which Her Highness would like to be handed down from generation to generation, and this and no other is the character Her Highness would like an Aligarh student of to-day to possess. He who would seduce the undergraduates of Aligarh from their loyalty to the Government under whose protection they live, he who would teach them to be discontented and disrespectful, he who would like them not to do full justice to English desires is no doubt a traitor and we are willing to consign him to the worst hell in Dante's Inferno. But what of him who would make them servile, who would not have them expect the English to do equal justice to his own desires and would rob them of manliness and make them too selfish to be upright? We feel certain that at least Her Highness would not open the gate of heaven for such a man if she had in her hands the keys of St. Peter.

Her Highness did well in reminding the students that for them the present is only a time for study, contemplation and research, and that all active participation in the daily recurring affairs of the practical world is for the present absolutely disallowed. If we can presume to add something to this advice, we would like to say that many of those whose duty it is to take an active part in the daily recurring affairs of the practical world envy them the leisure they now enjoy. They must not yet attempt to do prematurely that which they will only too soon be called upon to do on pain of their community's serious displeasure if they neglect or bungle. But the object of sound education must be to create the complete citizen, and obviously the study of politics in an academic fashion cannot be tabooed. As Sir Charles Crosthwaite had said, they must be "fitted by their upbringing for the practical work 'of their lives.'" Her Highness has therefore done well to place these time-honoured ideals of Aligarh once more before all concerned, and we trust those who press for their translation into reality will not be accused of innovation and heresy and a departure from the policy of Sir Syed Ahmed.

Her Highness praised the work of Mr. Towle and the College staff and expressed the hope, which we fully share, that their students will long continue to profit from their affectionate treatment, and that, because gratefulness is a sentiment inculcated by their religion, they would repay this affection by sincerity and obedience. Her Highness also said that she trusted that the European members of the staff would not only consider it a duty to impart instruction to the students but would also guide the students to the goal of success by impressing upon them the stamp of their character and personality, so that on the one side they would earn the gratitude of Mussalmans and on the other they would discharge the duty towards their nation and their Empire which is imposed on them by the very fact that they are Englishmen. Her Highness added that "this must always be kept in view that the 'relations of the staff, the students and the Trustees should be pleasant 'and sympathetic, for the hopes of Muslim success and progress are 'bound up therewith, and on this also depends the object which the 'former popular Principal of Aligarh, the late Mr. Beek, expressed 'in these words: 'the political aim of this College is to produce 'harmony and friendship between the English and the Mussalmans.'" We have no wish to to rake up the past, but if it is in the least true that the relations between the Mussalman and the English are strained then it will serve no useful purpose to blame only the Mussalmans for such an undesirable situation. The name of Theodore Beek must rank among those of the greatest Empire-builders that England ever sent out to India, and those that bear the impress of Theodore Beek under whom their training was accomplished cannot reasonably be suspected of attempts to create ill-will in the minds of the rising generation towards his countrymen. This is not the place nor the time to apportion praise or blame; but we hope we shall not be guilty of injustice in reminding the English staff of the College that it is within their power to win over the younger generation of Mussalmans, all efforts of any others in the contrary direction notwithstanding. As we said once before, he who would like to win the heart of Muslim India must win the heart of Aligarh, and Mr. Towle and the band of able and vigorous young Englishmen who are working with him at Aligarh can have the affection of Aligarh for the asking.

The Muslim Deputation to the Viceroy.

II.

LAST week we had dealt with the various events that had sorely tried the temper of Indian Mussalmans and had challenged any one to point to a single incident throughout their protracted sufferings suggesting, however remotely, that they had departed even by a hair's breadth from the traditions of staunch and unwavering loyalty, or to place his finger on any record of wanton disregard of law and breach of public peace by any section of the Mussalmans of India even during the period of their greatest misery. We had declared that this historic community, noted for its sanity of judgment and self-restraint during periods of unusual gravity, had not lost these characteristic qualities at any time during its recent troubles, and that in short there was nothing in its recent record of which it need be ashamed.

Despite these undeniable facts, however, a series of vile attempts had recently been made in certain Anglo-Indian quarters to misrepresent the attitude of the Mussalmans towards Government and to discredit them in the eyes of Government and of the British public. We need not refer here in detail to these wicked libels as we have had on more than one occasion since last summer to refute them, and our readers can easily recall the articles that appeared in the Times and in the National Review and our rejoinders to them. But it had now become clear that those who had taken upon themselves the task of maligning the Indian Mussalmans were both persistent and resourceful, and the unscrupulous manner in which some organs of the British Press for obvious reasons lent themselves to this evil propaganda made it necessary that the repudiation of such calumnies should not be left to a single newspaper, no matter how representative, but should be undertaken by a Deputation of a very comprehensive character which should reflect every shade of Muslim opinion in India.

This project was discussed by the Hon. the Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad with some prominent Mussalmans who were then at Delhi, and was referred to some others who were invited to Delhi for the purpose by the Hon. the Raja Sahib. The project met with general approval among those who could be consulted at that early stage, and encouraged by this response the Raja Sahib consulted some more prominent members of the community, and when their assent was obtained, a long and comprehensive list of more than 200 Mussalmans, representing all provinces and every shade of Muslim opinion, was prepared in consultation with many prominent members of the community and letters were despatched to them inviting their co-operation. The object of the Deputation was clearly explained in the letter, and soon after several rough drafts of the proposed address were despatched to the gentlemen who had been invited to join the Deputation. Unfortunately the interval for organising the Deputation was extremely short, but it is a noteworthy fact that men of all recognised shades of opinion agreed to the project and showed their willingness to co-operate with each other in this matter and the general framework of the address was universally approved. On the 22nd and 23rd instant, the Address was fully discussed and finally approved. The list of the signatories to the address is remarkably comprehensive, even though many prominent Mussalmans who heartily approved of the Deputation and had given their assent to the general framework and tone of the address were unavoidably absent. Nevertheless the eighty-four Mussalmans who signed the address and who were received by H. E. the Viceroy on the 25th instant were fully representative of the community and well qualified to speak in its name.

The address, which we reproduced last week very closely followed the views we expressed in our last articles on the subject of the Muslim Deputation, and it seems needless to dwell on it any further. Turning to the reply of H. E. the Viceroy, we note that it deals in the first place with what the address of the Mussalmans called "the new era of an awakened consciousness." In the next place, it deals with the reaction in India of the "events of unparalleled magnitude and absorbing interest to the Mussalmans," which, in the words of the address, "followed one another in a rapid and bewildering succession." In the third place, it deals with the charges that had been levelled with such rancour and persistence against the Mussalmans for more than half a year in some sections of the British and the Anglo-Indian Press. In the next place, it deals with the question of the Holy Places in Arabia, and, finally, with the improved outlook for the future.

The address of the Muslim Deputation had referred with significant prominence to the All-India Muslim League, which, according to the Deputation "has ever since its establishment continued to be the true representative organization of Indian Mussalmans." We are glad that so comprehensive a Deputation expressed itself in such clear terms and with such emphasis about the All-India Muslim League, for although the matter is too obvious, attempts have not been wanting to create misunderstandings as regards the scope and character of the Muslim League since its acceptance of the ideal of self-government suited to India.

In this connection it may be stated that no progressive institution or country can stand exactly where it did some years ago, and thanks to the progressive character of British rule in India, the changes which are taking place from day to day in this country make it difficult for India to remain stationary in its policies and ideals. Even in 1906, Lord Minto told the Simla Deputation that it had addressed him "at a time when the political atmosphere is full of change." "We all feel it," said Lord Minto, "It would be foolish to attempt to deny its existence. Hopes and ambitions new to India are making themselves felt. We cannot ignore them. We should be wrong to wish to do so. But to what is all this unrest due? Not to the discontent of misgoverned millions, I defy anyone honestly to assert that; not to any uprising of a disaffected people; it is due to that educational growth in which only a very small portion of the population has as yet shared, of which British rule first sowed the seed, and the fruits of which British rule is now doing its best to foster and to direct." It would have been a poor recognition of the progressive character of the present regime to suggest that the progress which was going on in 1906 had since been arrested, and that the new hopes and ambitions which were then making themselves felt had now ceased to vitalise the people of this country. Even in the short space of time since Lord Hardinge took up the reins of office, education, financed much more generously than before, has been able to move with great strides, and every day an increasingly large harvest is being gathered from the vast fields wherein British rule had sown the seed. The atmosphere is still full of change and even the Mussalmans, who seemed to have been tied to the spot by ancient traditions and more recent intellectual poverty, are now beginning to become more and more amenable to the changes of the political weather. In the words of Lord Minto, it would be foolish to deny the existence of an atmosphere full of change, and we should be wrong to wish to do so. The new voyage of political discovery on which the Mussalmans set out in 1906 has necessitated a revision of their political charts. The recent activities of the Muslim League simply mean a much-needed defining of the direction where it was comparative vagueness and uncertainty before. As the attainment of the ideal of self-government depends not upon any drastic changes in the system of administration almost amounting to a revolution, but on the slow growth and evolution of a nationality based upon the co-ordination of and harmony and goodwill prevailing among the various communities of India, the All-India Muslim League has rightly held out the hand of friendship towards the great sister community of Hindus. But sinister motives were ascribed even to this, although the Mussalmans had only just commenced to practise what the officials had preached so often before. This the Mussalmans naturally resented very deeply. In his reply to the address the Viceroy was able to say: "You have referred in the address, which I am very happy to receive from you, to the re-invigorated vitality of your community during the past few years, and it is a fact to which I am able to bear testimony and at the same time to welcome." His Excellency added that "zeal for the Moslem faith and for the uplifting of the community and the loyalty of the Muslims to the Government of this country, where they live and find freedom of worship, have gone hand in hand, and have created a high ideal from which the community has never wavered." This is a testimony which should easily sweep away all the cobwebs of suspicions and sinister surmises woven with a crafty malice by the calumniators of Indian Mussalmans.

As regards the reaction in India of a bewildering succession of events to which the address referred, His Excellency the Viceroy was equally emphatic when he said that, although Muslim sentiment had been greatly stirred, and for a time a restless spirit prevailed, there was no real antagonism between the Government and the Muslim community. The charges that the leaders of the Muslim community inflamed religious passions, promoted national antagonism and lost no opportunity of abusing British rule and vilifying the Christian religion, that a new party had already begun to dream of expelling the British from India, that Aligarh graduates were in the van openly preaching hostility to British rule, and that attempts were being made to tamper with the loyalty of Muslim troops were condemned by His Excellency the Viceroy as clearly as they deserved to be. According to His Excellency, writers in the Press had "misrepresented the attitude of your community and attributed to them actions and thoughts which those who know you well can only regard as a deep misunderstanding." After all, the Mussalmans must take into consideration the limitations of the phraseology suited to the pronouncements of His Majesty's representative in his Indian Empire, and must treat the phrase "a deep misunderstanding" as a synonym for Mr. Churchill's "terminological inexactitude" and Mr. Kipling's "unmitigated--misstatement." Their consolation must, however, be that lies are lies and stink in the nostril just as much in whatever phraseology we may clothe them. It is sheer charity, however, to suggest, as His Excellency has done, that these writers were misled by the troubled surface of the water and gave currency to such foul libels merely on account of "superficial comprehension of the 'Mohamedan train of thought.'" No doubt, His Excellency was not called upon to sit in judgment upon these men, and it was enough for His Excellency's purpose to indicate clearly that their charges were false. But if His Excellency had been sitting as a judge upon them, we have no doubt he would have also found them guilty of malicious conspiracy. The deputation had said that "after having stood the repeated 'test of actual experience in times of great public excitement,' we never expected such cruel attacks at a time when we were 'under the shadow of a great calamity and needed all the sympathy 'and goodwill to which we were entitled.'" The Viceroy, to whose unfailing sympathy offered in the most practical manner throughout their protracted sufferings, the Deputation's address bore such willing testimony, assured the Deputation in the following words:—"I can well sympathise with your feelings of resentment at aspersions that have been cast upon you and your people as a whole, but I can only assure you that I and my Government 'had never doubted the unswerving loyalty which we know quite well to be one of the noblest and most sacred traditions of your community.'" Again, when cordially welcoming the Muslim assurances of the continued and unimpeachable loyalty of the community, the Viceroy said he would not fail to transmit them to the King-Emperor, "although for me such assurances were 'not needed.'"

This is as clear and emphatic a testimony against those who charged the Mussalmans and, particularly the Aligarh graduates, with sedition as the Mussalmans could have ever desired, and it would be conceded that a Viceroy who has come forward to clear the reputation of the Mussalmans in this manner is entitled to address words of counsel to the more ardent spirits in the community. But the Mussalmans must be thankful to His Excellency that he showed no inclination in the course of his reply to preach a long-drawn sermon such as more than one provincial satrap has indulged in recently. All that the Viceroy offered by way of criticism or advice was a passing reference to the use "here and there" of "bitter or heated words which 'it would have been better to have left unsaid.'" But no one of a different faith and nationality was in a better position to judge the extent of the Muslim temptation than His Excellency, whose words and actions proved such a great corrective of the silence Edward Grey and the speeches of several of Sir Edwards' colleagues. His Excellency did not, therefore, forget even in his reply to suggest that, however unwise the use of heated or bitter words here and there, it was after all only natural. For His Excellency prefaced this slight criticism with the observation that this was due to the fact that the feelings of Indian Mussalmans were sore.

As regards the Viceroy's reference to the Holy Places of the Mussalmans, His Excellency's pronouncement, following as it does the Guildhall pronouncement of Mr. Asquith and His Excellency's own speech in the Legislative Council at Simla in September last, would, we feel sure, be welcomed throughout the Muslim world. His Excellency wishes the Mussalmans to understand that the British Government has already realized "the 'absolute necessity for the maintenance of the status quo as regards 'the Holy Places in Arabia,'" and in view of the fact that it is a great religious interest of the Mussalmans and the acceptance of the British responsibility for the maintenance of such a status quo would strengthen the loyalty of Indian Mussalmans, His Excellency was fully justified in pointing out that this is an "important and powerful link 'between your community and the Government of our King-Emperor.'" This shows what value the Government attach to religious freedom and Mohamedan control of the Holy Places, and if the intensity of the Mussalmans' feeling on the subject of a Muslim control of the Holy Places can induce the British Government to accept the responsibility they have taken upon themselves, that intensity of feelings provides a much clearer justification for the action that the Mussalmans have themselves been taking recently in order to safeguard the sanctity of their Holy Places from violation. If it is the Government's political duty to maintain the Muslim control of Holy Places, it is only because it is a Muslim's religious duty to maintain such control. Therefore it is a first charge on the Mussalman himself and then on his non-Muslim Government. We hope His Excellency's pronouncement will set at rest all those who pretend to see danger in such a frankly peaceful religious society as the Ahuddam-i-Ka'ba.

In this connection it may not perhaps be amiss to say that although it is only in view of the religious interest of the Mohomedans of India and the value that Government attach to religious freedom and the Mohamedan control of the Holy Places that such a responsibility rests upon Great Britain, it will not be right to conclude that the views of seventy million subjects of His Majesty can be of no moment in the shaping of an Imperial foreign policy. Great Britain has already accepted the eleven million European Colonials to partnership in the business of Empire, and it would be strange if India alone, which, as Lord Morley once told the House of Lords, "is your Lordship's only Empire", should be excluded from the benefits of such a partnership. She has always shared most willingly every Imperial liability with Great Britain, but we should like to know what Canada, or, in fact, any other Colony has yet done in this matter. Indian Mussalmans do not ignore Great Britain's Imperial commitments and do not ask for the impossible. We repeat once more that they only desire to maintain a permanent friendship between Great Britain and Muslim States, and they can be relied upon to insist on a friendly attitude towards Great Britain on the part of the Muslim States just as they can be relied upon to complain if they are led to think that Great Britain is lacking in its friendly sympathy towards them.

His Excellency referred in conclusion to the restoration of peace in Europe and Asia, and we trust Great Britain would be able to induce the Powers to be fairer to Turkey in finally settling the question of the Aegean Islands, and that every assistance, such as the loan of British officers for the administration of the Armenian Vilayets of Asia Minor, would be rendered to Turkey. On the face of it, it is unfair to strengthen the position of a Christian Prince in Muslim Albania by offering to Greece as a compensation some islands of Turkey vital to the existence of her Asiatic Empire. Nor is it fair to complain of mis-management in Armenia when Turkey so willingly offers to appoint British officers in those regions. The way to preserve the independence and integrity of her Asiatic Empire is not by recognising spheres of influence of European Powers such as Russia and France in that Empire. Surely British diplomats could have not forgotten the fate of Persia's integrity and independence which the Anglo-Russian Convention with its spheres of influence was created to preserve. We trust these matters will result in speedy and just settlement, and we look forward with His Excellency with hope and confidence to a period of peaceful development of the Muslim community by means of self-improvement and education. The Muslim community is loyal, moderate and sober and can desire no better policy than one of solidarity and co-operation with Government and with other communities for the welfare and progress of this Empire, which, His Excellency rightly said, we all of us have so much at heart. We too devoutly hope that the pure and unalloyed faith of the Mussalmans in the Unity of God and of loyalty to their Sovereign may burn like a flame and ever grow brighter to lighten their path for many ages to come.

The Unitarians of Islam.

MR. KHAWA KAMAL UD-DIN (of Woking) has addressed a letter to the Times, in which, "on behalf of the Islamic faith in England," he enters "an emphatic protest against the hostility to Islam displayed at a conference of missionaries belonging to a number of Protestant denominations at Kikuyu, in East Africa." "There can be no doubt," he writes, "that important agencies of Protestant missionary enterprise have adopted against Islam the device of an artificial and pretended unity for the purpose of increasing the chance of Protestant propaganda against Islam. We are entitled therefore to ask: 'What 'is the 'menace' of which the Protestant missionaries are afraid?' What indeed? We are inclined to think that the fears of the excellent Mr. Ud-din are quite unnecessary. One prominent figure of the Kikuyu Conference appears to hold views which, to the mere lay mind, are practically indistinguishable from those of Mr. Ud-din's co-religionists. We have just learned that a communicant in the diocese of Mombasa was informed by the Bishop of that diocese that unless she desisted from the practice of making the Sign of the Cross before receiving Holy Communion she would be refused the Sacrament. We can well understand that the Cross, which was to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness, would be also an occasion of offence to our brethren of the Mohamedan religion, and we had hoped that it was in their interest that the Bishop was acting. It appears, however, that the excellent policy of inclusion inaugurated by the conveners of the Kikuyu Conference is limited in its sphere of operations. We are far from suggesting that the antiquated and poisonous superstitions of Popery should receive the least encouragement or support from any truly Christian body; but we must take leave to point out that no scheme for the federation of Protestant Churches can be considered as complete which fails to take into account the Unitarians of Islam.—The New Witness.

Interview with Ali Hikmet Nahid Bey.

(FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.)

ALI HIKMET NAHID BEY, one of the Vice-Presidents of the London Islamic Society, who is the senior partner in the well-known Ottoman firm of Hussain and Co., in the city, has just returned from an extensive tour in the Balkans and Turkey. He has been travelling for the last three months, during which period he has also visited Asia Minor. Nahid Bey has recently completed his long apprenticeship with the Imperial Ottoman Bank of Throgmorton Street. He is on terms of intimate friendship with most of the leading statesmen of Turkey to-day and several of his relatives are at present holding important positions in the political, commercial and educational world at Constantinople. I called upon him at his office in the city without any previous engagement, within two hours of his return from the Continent and in spite of his fatigue after the long overland journey and notwithstanding the pressing work that lay before him as a result of his recent absence from town, he received me with very great courtesy, which I attribute entirely to my being a representative of the Comrade, of which the Bey is a regular reader and which has lately become very popular with the Young Turks. After apologising to him for taking his valuable time and assuring him of my determination to trouble him as briefly as possible, I put him the following questions, to which Nahid Bey answered in fluent English. With the well-known hospitality characteristic of his race, he offered me several "real" Turkish cigarettes, in the course of the brief interview, which certainly went a long way in making me immediately feel perfectly at home with my distinguished "host," though my guilty conscience kept on worrying me for having taken so much of his precious time during the busiest hour in the city:—

Was your recent visit to Turkey a mere holiday?—Well not exactly. I had certainly been away from home for some time but this trip was really undertaken by me on business mixed with pleasure.

Did you visit Adrianople at all?—Yes: in Thrace I saw nothing but ruined villages and demolished mosques, particularly on the Railway line between Adrianople and Constantinople. In Adrianople I met Haji Adil Bey, an ex-Minister of the Interior, and now Governor-General of Adrianople. He is an extremely capable man and has several splendid schemes in hand. We have very great hopes in him, as he is a real patriot and is gifted with great intellect and a perfect constructive mind.

Was normal life restored in Adrianople?—Practically the ordinary life was restored, but owing to the great damages done to the buildings by the Bulgarians during the siege, people have not quite settled down. There is, of course, very great military activity in the place and the town is being thoroughly re fortified.

What do you think of the present garrison in Adrianople?—The condition of the troops is splendid and every soldier is fully determined to defend the honour of Islam, should the occasion arise. The military authorities have immensely gained by their sad experiences of the past and are now preparing themselves for any emergency. No effort is being spared to render the Army well-organised and efficient. I spent three days in Adrianople.

Can you tell me anything about the situation in Constantinople?—I have had long interviews with the leading members of the Committee of Union and Progress including the General Secretary, but you will, I hope, forgive me if I would rather not disclose what has passed between us. It concerns some important points of administration, which it may not be to the Turkish interest to insert in a newspaper. (I assured the Bey that I fully appreciated the delicacy of his position). I also had the privilege of securing an interview with the grand Vizier, His Highness Prince Said Helmi Pasha. He is sparing no pains in the work that lies before him, the reorganisation of the Turkish Administration. I likewise met Mehmud Essad Effendi, an ex-professor of Theology in the Imperial University and now a prominent Member of the present Cabinet. He is keenly interested in Islamic movements and has for several years spent his holidays in various Moslem lands, apart from his wide travels in Europe. He is thinking of visiting India in the near future.

Do you think the ties of brotherhood between the Turks and Indian Moslems have become closer?—Very much indeed, the practical sympathy which the Moslems of India had so vividly shown to their co-religionists in Turkey in their hour of trial has brought our Indian brothers ever so much closer to us now. The brilliant All-India Medical Mission under Dr. Ansari, which rendered such noble and sacred service to the cause of Islam during the recent war, has fostered our relations to an unparalleled degree and the bond of unity and brotherhood now existing between our Indian co-religionists and ourselves will for ever promote that close association and increase that mutual confidence and goodwill which are vitally necessary for brotherly co-operation and fellowship.

Do you think the public at large in Turkey are alive to the doings and destiny of their fellow-Moslems in India?—Certainly; you will be surprised to hear that the leading organs of the Press in Turkey are unanimously giving every possible prominence to matters that concern our Indian brothers. For instance, almost all the speeches that have been delivered by Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali in London, during their recent visit to England, have been reported practically in toto in our Press, who have even written editorially on the mission that brought these two gentlemen to England. Mr. Mohamed Ali's speech at the Islamic Society's Banquet at the Cecil last November, in which he dealt with such force with Turkish affairs, has made a very deep impression in Constantinople, where they were much disappointed at the two delegates' inability to visit Turkey, when they were recently in Europe.

Is there any favourable sign of commercial activity amongst the Turks?—Yes, I am very pleased to tell you that, much to my delight, I have found on my last visit that there is at last a hopeful sign in this important field, which as you know has been sadly neglected by us. I was particularly struck with the new phase of commercial life at Broussa in Asia Minor. We have at last realised the dignity of labour and industry and I am to-day very hopeful of my expectations in this respect being gradually fulfilled. There is a great tendency and desire now to trade more with the East, particularly with India, which we all welcome.

Have you anything to say about the Naval and Military Missions at Constantinople?—Nothing except that they are both attending to their duties seriously and earnestly. We are confident in our British and German instructions and they will in due course of time bring the two vital arms of the Empire to perfection. We cannot afford to neglect the defences of our Empire any more, for our very existence. Enver Pasha is thoroughly overhauling the Army and is bent on placing it on an efficient and firm footing. The Navy is being likewise seen to by the British Admiral, who is instructing the Turkish naval officers in the art of Sea-Warfare. The Turkish Admiralty and War Office are giving the British and German Missions respectively every help possible. On the whole we are very hopeful of the future.

What do you think of the Armenian question?—Since I understand the Armenians have decided to take part in the Parliamentary Elections according to the regulations laid down by the authorities. I do not think it advisable to revive the question here. Personally I am of opinion that the Armenians as a body are most loyal to the Sultan and very law-abiding. They fought for Turkey in the recent campaign with exceptional bravery and heroism and if left to themselves are only too anxious to remain under the Turkish flag. The misdeeds of a few, instigated by external influences, must not prejudice one against the whole race.

Do you think Turkey will be successful in her negotiations for a loan in Europe?—From what I could gather at Constantinople, there is every hope for a successful negotiation with France. We are not, of course, prepared to borrow on impossible conditions, which would be disastrous to the country in future, but we are confident Djavid Bey's diplomacy in financial transactions will succeed in securing us the necessary loan at reasonable terms. You must remember Europe is not to-day dealing with Turkish statesmen of the old school. Besides now-a-days public opinion in Turkey is not a negligible factor either.

Before I left Nahid Bey showed me some beautiful pictures which he had brought with him as gifts to the Islamic Society. They are coloured enlargements of H. I. M. the Sultan, H. I. H. the Crown Prince, the Holy Shrine at Medina and the Sacred Stone of Mecca, etc. No doubt these gifts of the Bey will be immensely appreciated by the Islamic Society and will serve as excellent decorations for their proposed offices. Nahid Bey also informed me that the Society's telegram to the Grand Vizier last December entreating His Highness not to resign his high office had made a very favourable impression on the Ministry. It will be remembered that in those days sinister rumours were current in the European Press of the Grand Vizier's intended resignation over the Armenian question. Fortunately they proved baseless.

Lord Morley on Federalism.

LORD MORLEY took the chair at University College, Gower Street, on 28th February, at the first of a course of five Rhodes lectures by Professor J. H. Morgan on "Federal Government." Among those present were the Spanish Ambassador, Lord Dunsedin, Lord Reay, the Belgian Minister, the Bulgarian Minister, the Mexican Minister, Sir F. Pollock, Dr. Herringham, and Dr. Gregory Foster.

Lord Morley said that every political crisis turned up its own conjuring word that did duty for an idea, or for a practicable scheme. At the moment, the conjuring word was Federalism. The use of that term was causing a good deal of current political controversy to be something very like a jungle of confusion. Though well-ordered ideas ruled the world, there was nothing like one of those good ready-made terms, with all the implications, inferences, illusory analogies, and slippery parallels that men of ingenious wit were able to discover in it. Some found a defence for a given constitutional proposal, which was now before them all, that it leant to Federalism; others said that if the proposal leant to Federalism so much the worse. In what Mr. Sydney Low had styled the inflamed controversy of the hour, let them take care that Federalism was not made a handy and highly respectable screen for people who had the happy gift of what was charitably called thinking intuitively. They looked to Professor Morgan, to clear the air, and to show people who heard or talked of federalizing the United Kingdom—cantoning it, if he might use an old word—where they seriously were and whither they were going. He agreed with very competent publicists who said that definition would not carry us very far; but he was sure that Professor Morgan would try his hard at explaining what was meant by the spirit of federation and show, if he could, how it was to be adjusted to a system of which the supremacy of Parliament was the cornerstone. Professor Morgan would carry them round the awkward corner between the oracles who pronounced Federalism to be the surrender of power by independent or semi-independent States, and the other oracles who took the name as a synonym for devolution which it was not by any means—that was, the surrender by a central Government of power to subordinate Governments.

BONDS OF DISSONANCE.

There were excellent reasons why Federalism should be the catch word in the discussion of the day. There were two questions of active and urgent interest upon which the subject had a direct bearing. One was a new construction to be attached to Pitt's famous Act of Irish Union, so mortally wounded at the very hour of its birth by the disastrous prejudices of George III.—prejudices, it must not be forgotten, for even Kings must have justice done to them, which were heartily shared by the great majority of King George's subjects. The other, less cogent, more far-reaching, and happily not at all embittered, was the question whether machinery could be devised for linking together the common interests of Great Britain and British Dominions over the seas in a federal union; or whether on the contrary, inconveniences and embarrassments, unsuspected in an hour of ideal enthusiasm, would not be sure to turn formal ties of federal union into what a colonial writer 30 years ago, in words of paradoxical sound, rather boldly called bonds of dissonance. He could think of no service to be rendered by the universities to politics more fertile or more decisive than systematic treatment of political science. The time demanded it, and would demand it still more. More and more directly would opinion be a master-element in the government of the world, and it must be a fatal gap in an educational curriculum if politics should be the only field in the expanse of thought and knowledge in which intellectual conscience was neglected or left out. (Cheers.)

Professor Morgan, in the course of his lecture, offered as a working definition of Federalism that it was not a revocable treaty of alliance from which the allies might secede; but a political union involving a permanent surrender of certain powers, the erection of a new state to which the citizens of the constituent states owed allegiance as well as to their own state, and the embodiment of these conditions in a federal Constitution or fundamental law binding upon both the federal authorities created by it and the state authorities which created it. —The Times.

Mr. Kipling on Travel.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING gave a lecture before the Royal Geographical Society in the Queen's Hall last night on "Some Aspects of Travel." Lord Curzon presided. Mr. Kipling said he had noticed that what travellers told the public in print was one thing, and what they told their friends by word of mouth was another; he therefore had tried to deal with some of the more intimate and personal, though it might be trivial, aspects of travel.

Lord Curzon, in introducing the lecturer, said that great travellers had sometimes—perhaps rather more frequently than was generally supposed—been great men of letters, and the writings of some of the most famous travellers in the world, from Herodotus down to Kinglake and Doughty in our own times, had also been masterpieces of literature. That evening they were to have presented the inverse phenomenon, and a great man of letters, one of the foremost whom our race had produced (cheers), was to show that he too, had tasted the joys, understood the romance, and penetrated the secrets of travel. (Cheers.)

Mr. Kipling's Lecture.

Mr. Kipling said that the time was near when men would receive their normal impressions of a new country suddenly and in plan, not slowly and in perspective; when the most extreme distances would be brought within the compass of one week's travel; when the word "inaccessible" as applied to any given spot on the surface of the globe would cease to have any meaning. Experiences such as his own were on the eve of being superseded. Going on to discuss what might be called "the psychology of moving bodies under strain," the lecturer said that it seemed to him that a number of men who worked under strain and responsibility as leaders of expeditions, surveys, prospecting, exploration, or scientific work came to evolve a more or less definite image of their work within the limits of which, or with reference to which, they accomplished that work. These images he called pressure lines. This term he illustrated by a number of examples, among them being the case of a friend engaged on a survey in a little-known part of Asia, whose mind moved in an uneasy triangle—he traced it in the air as he spoke—between supplies, possible sickness, and mileage. It was an isosceles triangle with a narrow base, in the centre of which he felt himself to be walking, between supplies on the one hand and sickness on the other, always looking forward to the always retreating point "M." When his work was ended and the survey connected up the point "M" opened and let him through. Till then he had felt himself constricted—harnessed up—was his phrase—between these imaginary lines. The phenomenon did not show itself till he had been worked rather hard. Speaking of his own experience of a hurried march, Mr. Kipling said that his impression was that of the unrolling ribbon. His single object was to get himself and his coolies out of a certain district as soon as possible. His mind projected itself along an imaginary straight line, white against dull green. He had heard that the dog-train mail-runners of Alaska and Northern Canada sometimes saw their winter trails as short straight lines strung with beads—that was to say, as a diagram of the taut sleigh-traces with dogs attached.

After quoting other instances of pressure-lines, the lecturer said he noticed in every case that the lines did not show themselves till the man was physically tired out—and a little more. When the pressure of the work was removed and the man was fed again, the lines gradually faded and could only be recalled by an effort of will. He remembered, too, when he was a young man, listening to Stanley, who was talking, half to himself, of some work he had done in his early days. He had had to cover a certain distance in a certain time, and he ended his monologue with an abrupt fore-reaching movement of his first finger, as though he were pegging or hooking up something, and he said, "Of course, it was the mileage that worried me!" He often wondered whether that gesture of Stanley's was characteristic.

MENTAL TRAVEL PICTURES.

Mr. Kipling next dwelt upon the question of visualization. He suggested that first-class leaders of expeditions either did not visualize too much or kept their powers of visualization under control. An old prospector once warned him: "As long as you've only got yourself to think about you can think as much as you 'dam well please. When you've other folks' hides to answer for 'you must quit thinking for your own amusement.'" So, however "great the strain, responsibility did not encourage detailed imaginative excursions on the road—or on any road—while the work was in hand. Later, when a man was boiling down his log and notes into book form, he fell back on his store of mental pictures, but in the actual stress of travel the first-class man, as distinguished from the very first-class second-class man—and this was an important distinction—did not or decided not to visualize. Emphasizing the importance of being able to retain a mental impression of the geography of a district, the lecturer said that motoring had tremendously increased our powers in that respect, for a man who could read a county could learn to read a country and so on. But the time was not far off when the traveller would know and care just as little whether he was over sea or land as we to-day knew and cared whether our steamer was over 40 fathoms or the Tuscarora Deep. Then we should hear the lost ports of New York and Bombay howling like Tarshish and Tyre. Incidentally, too, we should change all our mental pictures of travel.

But this was all in the air. "Let us leave it there," said Mr. Kipling, "and consider for a while the illimitable, the fascinating subject of smells in their relation to the traveller. We shall soon have to exchange them for blasts of petrol and atomized castor-oil. Have you noticed wherever a few travellers gather together, one or the other is sure to say, 'Do you remember that smell at such and such a place?' Then he may go on to speak of camel—pure camel—one whiff of which is all Arabia; or of the smell of rotten eggs at Hitt, on the Euphrates, where Noah got the pitch for the Ark; or of the flavour of drying fish in Basra. Then the company begin to purr like cats at Valerian and, as the books say, conversation becomes general." There were only two elementary smells of universal appeal—the smell of burning fuel and the smell of melting grease—the smell of what man cooked his food over, and what he cooked his food in. Mr. Kipling dwelt at some length upon the number and variety of scenes and sensations which might be called back to the mind by a certain smell. The smoke of rank wood fuel he suggested as being the most potent

QUALITIES FOR LEADERSHIP

Mr. Kipling next referred to the choice of companions. A man had been asked why he invariably followed a well-known man into the most uncomfortable situations: he had replied:—"All the years I have known So-and-So, I've never known him to say 'whether he was cold or hot, wet or dry, sick or well, but I've never known him forget a man who was.' Self-sacrifice, loyalty, and a robust view of moral obligations went far to make a leader, the capacity to live alone and inside himself being taken for granted. But then came the accidents for which no allowance could be made. A good man, who had held a disorganized crowd together at the expense of his own vitality, might be tried, slowly or suddenly, beyond his limit, till he broke down. There was a limit for every man, an edge beyond which he must not go. But at home only the doctor, the nurses, and the clergymen saw what happened next—not the caravan, not the grinning coolies, and the whole naked landscape—and afterwards all the world.

However, these things, and worse, were part of the rule of the road. They had never hindered men from leading or following. Even in those days a man had but to announce he was going to gamble against death for a few months on totally inadequate cover, and thousands of hitherto honest Englishmen would fawn and intrigue and if necessary, lie, in order to be allotted one life share in the venture. Nearly all that could be accomplished by the old means of exploration had been won. The old mechanism was scrapped; the moods and emotions that went with it followed. Only the spirit of man carried on, unaltered and unappeasable. There would arise—they were shaping themselves even now—risks to be met as cruel as any that Hudson or Scott faced; dreams as world-wide as Columbus or Cecil Rhodes dreamed, to be made good or to die for; and decisions to be taken as splendidly terrible as that which Drake clinched by Magellan, or Oates a little further south. There was no break in the line, no loads were missing: the men of the present had begun the discovery of the new world with the same devoutly careless passion as their predecessors completed the discovery of the old.

The "Times" on Mr. Kipling's Lecture.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling's delightful address to the Royal Geographical Society last night upon "Aspects of Travel" was meant rather for the explorer and the pioneer than for the commonplace traveller; but he touched upon topics of the deepest interest to all who have ever sailed and marched and even journeyed by train across the world, and seen the Southern Cross rise above the horizon, and faced the salt winds at sunrise from a swaying deck. He spoke, for instance, of pressure-lines, those sometimes indefinable mental images which haunt the traveller who is under the strain of continuous and exhausting movement. To the leader of an expedition, or the head of a scientific survey, the lines may appear as a ribbon of road unrolling behind them, or a straight bar across the vision which constantly draws nearer. We would add to his examples the feeling which almost invariably overtakes the more conventional wanderer who evades toil, and circles the world in comfortable cabins and luxurious expresses. It is a sense of utter weariness, the gradual growth of indifference to externals, a consciousness of blurred impressions, an unwillingness to see more. There are no definite pressure-lines, perhaps, but there is the kind of mental exhaustion which would develop in a man who tried to look successively at all the pictures in the Louvre on a single day. Why untravelled doctors should so constantly recommend tired elderly gentlemen to go round the world is an abiding puzzle to those who have done the thing. Except in ardent and receptive youth, the world should be taken piecemeal, and not at one swift swoop. Mr. Kipling thinks the time is near at hand when men will literally soar and swoop around the world in one long flight. If that is so, we venture to predict that on their return they will only have very vague new conceptions of the terrestrial globe. Except for the thrilling memory of their rush through the upper air, their notions of the world will very much resemble the mind-pictures of imaginary travel, the pleasures of which Mr. Kipling rightly extolled. Like Stevenson, most men "con voyage in an atlas with the greatest enjoyment." Mr. Kipling has made the interesting experiment of asking men who had not been there what picture or diagram the words "He went down to the Cape" summoned to their minds. We are surprised that the answers did not include a vision of a flat-topped mountain crowned with a wisp of white cloud. Many who have been to the Antipodes will not endorse his mental shorthand of the run to Australia. For them it is a zig-zag of five, not three, and the lines run:—London—Gibraltar; Gibraltar—Port Said; Port Said—Aden; Aden—Colombo; Colombo—Fremantle. The call at Colombo is a vivid and welcome stage. There is one definite image which lives in the minds of some of those who have made the long stormy mid-winter passage by the northerly route across the Pacific. It is like sailing uneasily along the rim of the earth.

The subject of smells in their relation to the traveller is an old and favourite topic with Mr. Kipling. Has he not said somewhere that the smell of the Himalayas always calls a man back? And does not his time-expired soldier sing of the "spicy garlic smells" of Burma? He made the prosaic statement last night that there are "only two elementary smells of universal appeal—the smell of burning fuel and the smell of melting grease." Man cooks his food over the one and in the other. But surely there are other smells, less material in their appeal which almost come within the range of his definition. One is the first chill smell of mountains, especially when the heights are reached towards sunset or after dark. Another is the odour of a forest, of which it has been said that "of all smells 'in the world, the smell of many trees is the sweetest and the most 'fortifying.' Both awake in mankind dim unconscious memories of primeval life, when the race had not sheltered itself beneath roofs and behind shutters. But the smells of travel are indeed innumerable. The voyager gets his first real whiff of the East when he lands at Aden, and drives along a dusty road to the bazaar within the Crater. It lingers in his nostrils for evermore. On the coast of Burma, and down the Straits, the air is redolent of rotten fish and over-ripe fruit. Tropical jungles leave keen olfactory memories of decaying vegetation. The smell of Chinese villages is like nothing else in the world, but the odd thing is that to the true traveller it soon ceases to be disagreeable. There is one smell which is unique. To encounter it, one must be steaming through the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb on a hot still night in July or August, one of those nights when it is impossible to stay below, and the deck is strewn with sleeping forms. Towards dawn, as one is tossing restlessly from side to side, one is aware of a strange dank odour arising from the scummy waters. It suggests a stagnant duckpond, but in reality the ship is passing through the lees of a mighty ocean, swept into one small corner. All along the coast of Southern Arabia, where few ships go, the same smell is met in lesser degree. Wreckage is carried thither, and the trunks of trees, and immense masses of weeds; and often may be seen strange fish leaping from the oily surface, or a spouting whale or two, or a turtle floating asleep, for the deserted back-wash of the southern seas swarms with marine life.

Mr. Kipling seems to think that with the coming mastery of the air we shall reach the golden age of travel, when we shall journey with "neither sweat nor suffering," and shall be freed from the "cnecks" that have hitherto "conditioned all our travels." We are not sure that he is right. Will travel, for instance, be less of a trial or a discipline to the temper when we can all soar upwards and forsake muddy roads, and the grit and dust of railways, and the discomforts of the sea? Mountaineers know very well the splenetic irritability which often assails them when the tree-line is passed; and we seem to have heard that airmen do not always find that a flight in the empyrean produces in them a holy calm. Mr. Kipling recognizes that the earth is shrinking actually and in imagination, that we are cutting down the world conception of time and space, and that "the new machines 'are outstripping mankind'; but his robust optimism leads him to hope that when humanity can get its breath all will be well again. We trust he may be right; but new conditions are evolving new dangers, notably for a world-wide and scattered Empire. And when all his dreams are realized, it will still be true that they see the earth best and nearest who walk upon it on their own feet. Moreover, whether we walk or ride or sail or fly, the most abiding joy of travel will always lie in retrospect. Better and more precious even than books, because more truly a possession that remains to the end, are the ineffaceable memories of travel, a rich store to live with and to think upon in the eventide of life—The Times.

The Age Limit.

(By E. S. P. HAYNES.)

Mr more revolutionary friends have often aspired to exclude all citizens over forty years of age from any active part in public affairs, even as regards voting. The Millennium, they think, would be immediately realised by the suppression of the old and the despotism of the young. I use the words "old" and "young" because of their obvious convenience; but I am much too near forty myself not to be aware that everyone not only is as young as his arteries, but also, so long as health lasts, feels scarcely any change of personality right up to the end of life; in fact, I know a gentleman of ninety-three and a lady of eighty-eight whose spirits are habitually more buoyant than my own.

Probably all ardent reformers have moments of impatience with the older generation, though I am sure that such feelings exist rather in regard to persons between forty and sixty than in regard to those from sixty upwards. The mellow enlightenment of men like the late Mr. Crackanthorpe is very rare among the forty to sixty people, who are mostly occupied in trying to impose on their juniors the ideas which occupied their own minds while they were suffering from the same effacement. That is perhaps why each rising forty to sixty generation is always so much more severe on its immediate predecessors than on its remoter ancestors; the memory of suppression lingers.

It is extremely difficult to ascertain what change (if any) occurs at the age of forty; physically, I suppose, one can only note the change in the lens of the human eye; nor does even this change occur precisely at forty, but only round about forty. There does, however, seem to be a psychological change. Insensibly, men and women begin to look back rather than forward; and the more actively they are absorbed in what interests them the less open-minded they become in regard to life as a whole.

It must not be forgotten that different people are always thinking, so to speak, at different milestones, and man who has been thinking thirty years ahead of his contemporaries begins when over forty to excite the notice of the younger generation just when his hitherto more successful rivals have begun to discern premonitory symptoms of neglect. Yet this does not mean that he has escaped the psychological change. Just as the lens of his eye is becoming flatter, so he is ceasing to think so far ahead of his age. Up to forty he has perhaps thought more rapidly by reason of hereditary intelligence or better environment than his fellows, but these advantages count for less (except in respect of recognition) after forty than they did before.

Collateral circumstances nail men and women down to fixed opinions quite apart from any growing sluggishness of mind due to physical causes. For example, some of my friends consider that any efficient community should be ruled by officials chosen for eminence in the department to which they are promoted, that these officials should be responsible to a cross between a shareholders' meeting and a debating society, and that any form of government is preferable to what is called democracy. They think, and I agree with them, that so-called democracy is invariably the fraudulent parent of a concealed caucus, whereas a monarchy or an oligarchy is at least criticised, and therefore controlled, by those who are governed. To them a modern political programme resembles a rechauffe of reforms which were all very attractive thirty years ago, but which have often become unnecessary because the problems have been solved differently. For instance, a conveyancer will say that Land Registration was an excellent idea in 1880, but that most of the defect it sets out to cure were in fact cured by Lord Cairns's legislation in the early eighties. New reforms appeal to a younger generation: Socialism becomes smarter than Liberalism; Syndicalism, than Socialism; and so we get round again to private property under different terminology.

Now, five or ten years hence, a few of my friends will get a hearing, and will become known as preachers of particular ideas. Directly that happens they will be labelled. A. B. will be known in the newspaper world as the champion of some political nostrum, and he will be almost coerced into thinking of nothing else—into what Sir Henry Maine called the "doubtful virtue of consistency." C. D. will be known as a professional secularist; E. F. as the acknowledged exponent of a scheme for leasehold marriages with financial safeguards, and so forth. Let any of these gentlemen swerve a hair's breadth from what the world is in the habit of expecting from him, and he will be called a "wobbler." He will produce the same consternation as Ruskin, or, in our own day, Mr. Bellamy, has produced by writing about economics instead of about Turner or the French Revolution. All this process of environment tends to make the mind as rigid as age makes the arteries brittle.

Moreover, as the grove becomes narrower, the practical energy becomes more concentrated—often up to extreme old age. If cancer is what a doctor once called it, "Nature's protest against decay," so the phrase of "an old man in a hurry" recalls the feverish excitement that comes from a subconscious effort to feel young again. This effort explains the phenomenon of what is called "the dangerous age" in women, although there is also a dangerous age for men between forty and fifty—a craving for adventures, either amorous or financial, which has often proved disastrous.

The subconscious effort is usually associated with a feeling of boredom. A woman of (say) forty, has married well and succeeded in bringing up a family of three or four children: she sees nothing before her but a grey vista of launching the children into the world and possibly seeing grandchildren. She resents being left on the shelf and wants to start life again as a young girl. Here is a typical woman. Let us give her a typical husband.

He is a successful man aged (say) forty-five, of the type who has usually achieved either in business or in the humbler professions about as much success as he is ever likely to have. His work and his family are interests, but not absorbing interests. The monotonous security of our civilisation startingly sudden when we remember that our grandfathers could scarcely cross Putney Heath at night, almost wearies him. His life is always repeating itself. The amorous or financial adventure rejuvenates him.

Life, therefore, is not such a bed of roses as the suppressed "young" people imagine it is for those who have apparently achieved all that they want. Yet the "old" people could otherwise rejuvenate themselves if they took the trouble to keep more in touch with the "young" people, and the "young" people would feel less rebellious if they were given greater scope both for action and expression. The fact remains that in action they are often much under the thumb of their elders, while as regards expression nearly all newspapers and periodicals are written for the "old" because commercially speaking, it is safer to cater for the generation in power. One need only take up The Nineteenth Century and After, The Times, and, in fact, the whole of the daily Press, The Spectator and nearly all the weekly periodicals, to find that the only point of view expounded ad nauseam is that of the "old."

I have sometimes read what seemed to me almost a platitude in The English Review and have subsequently been astonished to observe in other periodicals an explosion of quasi-parental wrath from the "old" brigade. Oftener, of course, such juvenilities are carefully ignored, as when Mr. G. K. Chesterton recently addressed a crowded meeting during the Reading election on certain political controversies, and no mention whatever was made of it, even in the local Press.

It is less controversial, perhaps, to go back twenty or thirty years. I often get circulars from such bodies as the anti-Socialist League appealing for large sums to demolish Socialism. I should like to know what all these worthy people were doing in the 'nineties. They never took the trouble to find out about the Fabian Society or to meet the arguments that were being disseminated by some of the ablest men of the day among the youth of that period, yet one of the main attractions of those arguments to youth was that their elders ignored the whole movement and thereby made their juniors feel an enchanting sense of originality about it. Hinc illa lacerima of the Anti-Socialist League.

Generally speaking, the "old" gain nothing by yielding to the insidious influences of the forty to sixty attitude of mind and by bolting the door of reflection on nascent opinion. On the other hand, they gain a great deal by assimilating new ideas in order to teach them how to shoot, and they must not be too much astonished if the shooting is occasionally exuberant.—The New Witness.

The English Moustache.

THE writer of a review in this week's Literary Supplement observed that the photographs of old Oxford and Cambridge groups supplied an interesting history of the changes of fashion in hair-dressing. The same purpose is served almost equally well by an old family album wherein many an uncle whom we now regard as sublime appears by the addition of a mere suspicion of whisker to have been in his youth supremely ridiculous. It is evident that a slavish regard for fashion stunts the imagination, for as we gaze on those old groups of athletes we do not merely think that they look very odd and dismiss their whiskers that once curled so ambrosially as "a growth of weeds of an alarming and sanguinary nature." We find it almost impossible to imagine that they could have run as fast or jumped as high as their hairless successors; it is only by a conscious effort of faith that we can believe that they ever progressed save at a dignified and middle-aged walk. What young man of to-day, finding himself matched against an "old man with a beard," would not consider the game as good as won, and that though he has happily still before his eyes the luxuriant example of the greatest of all cricketers? It would seem, moreover, that we not only lack imagination but courage into the bargain. There was perhaps a deeper meaning in the words of the General Commanding the Prussian Guards Corps when he spoke of the "so-called English or tooth-brush moustache," which he declared not to be "consonant with the German national character." May not a hidden sarcasm lurk in the term "so-called," since the modern Briton fears his fate of possible ridicule so much that we bid fair to become a race of priests and play-actors? We clip ourselves with scissors, even before the blushing acquisition of a safety razor, and go down to our graves with our wealth of natural resources still undeveloped.

To grow even as much as a moustache is unquestionably an adventure demanding a spice of courage. In the London of to-day there may occasionally be seen some gallant spirit, his neck enveloped in a stock and a modest inch or so of whisker creeping down his cheeks. Even if we smile covertly as he passes, we ought to acknowledge his bravery and enterprise, for here at least is the "young man with brains" enough to make a fool of himself. When the Baron de Marbot first joined a Hussar regiment, the jolly roystering old sergeant with his shako over his ear, to whose care he was entrusted, took a pot of blacking, and with his thumb made two enormous hooks covering the upper lip and reaching almost to the eyes of the young recruit. That was an adventure, but its end was certain and glorious; the boy became a man and a Hussar. With most of us the end is all uncertain; we put forth on an unknown sea, where the charts of no earlier mariners can help us, and cannot tell to what outlandish port our individual barque will take us. A moustache may be trimmed and clipped; it may by brute force of scissors be kept within the bounds of the "so-called English or tooth-brush variety," but, even assuming that it does not blaze out into new and indiscreet hues, it will make a new man of its owner. If it be allowed to follow unchecked its natural bent, there is no knowing how preposterously things may fall out; seen by the light of it, there may stand out traits so odious that the smooth-cheeked Jekyll suddenly becomes the hairy Hyde, and even if it do no worse, a moustache can disclose depths of vulgarity or fatuity hitherto unsuspected. There is a type of moustache that will turn a man into a walrus; there is another which will, if we may disregard historic accuracy for the sake of antithesis, make him look like a carpenter. A beard calls for still greater fixity of purpose, even though it is no longer considered the mark of a Jew pedlar, since it is necessary that the grower should pass a time occult from observation, during which he must suffer attacks of deadly faintness and nausea whenever he looks in the glass.

The enterprise must not be thought of in a sensibly less heroic light because such commonplace remedies as soap, hot water, and a razor are always at hand. It is true that by their aid a fresh beginning in life may at any time be made, but to make it involves a humiliating admission. It is hard for a man to start out full of vague hopes on a high and fantastic enterprise and to return after a while with clipped wings; to confess that he is only an ordinary humdrum person after all and to be smiled at by those who have never dared the extraordinary. It is very easy for us who are less brave to call our lack of courage a lack of self-consciousness, and to confuse a servile regard for appearances with a splendid disregard of them; but we should at least respect those who have the full-blooded and adventurous spirit of their uncles, as revealed in those dim photographs.—The Times.

The Indian Immigration Crisis in South Africa.

(By Sant Nihal Singh)

ITS EFFECT ON INDO-BRITISH RELATIONS.

I.

THE Indian immigration crisis in South Africa has fanned into flame a problem which for long has been smouldering. The conflagration thus started, if left unchecked, threatens to cut its way to the very vitals of Indo-British relations, and may prove to be much more dangerous than any other contention that has arisen since the dread Sepoy Mutiny of 1857.

The hot wave of "unrest" that spread over Hindustan in the middle of the last decade, and generated the anarchist movement, indeed was menacing. But political discontent affected only the educated Indians, who constituted a "microscopic minority." The cult of the bomb appealed to a yet more circumscribed section of literate Indians. Grievances of a purely political nature did not and could not interest the masses, who were not enlightened enough to understand them. With a little exertion the agitator could be harried out of the barracks, and so the native army could be kept from becoming inflamed.

In the matter of emigration, however, almost the reverse is the case. The bulk of Indians who leave their country in quest of rich pastures abroad belong not to the educated classes, but to the illiterate millions. Moreover, prominent amongst the brown settlers in the Colonies are the tall, stalwart forms of soldiers, chiefly Sikhs, who wear on their bosoms decorations earned at the cost of imperilling their lives for the British Empire, in many cases in battles fought outside India. The emigrants come not from one race, creed, or caste, but are recruited from all ethnic and religious groups. Hindus, Moslems, Buddhists, Jains, Sikhs, and Indian Christians, one and all, furnish their quota. The voluntary exiles do not emigrate from one particular corner of the country, but hail from all points of the compass. Sikhs, Sindhis, and Pathans from the north-west; Gujeratis and Deccanis from the south-west; Madrasis from the south-east; Bengalis and Beharis from the north-east; and natives of the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh and Central India travel to the over-seas dominions and colonies. This means that the grievances which are so grave that they lead peace-loving, patient Indians to go on strike, to submit to being fired at by the police and flogged by their gaolers, rouse the ire, not of the minority of their countrymen who are engaged in a struggle to wrest political preferment and administrative office from the Government of India, but of practically the entire population of the Peninsula, including, to it especially noted, the native army.

The tie of relationship, it must be remembered, is much more binding in the Oriental Dependency than it is in the West. A native of Hindustan invariably refers to his cousin, or to an intimate acquaintance, as his "brother" or "sister." Children always speak of the friends of the family as their "uncles" and "aunts." In such circumstances, therefore, it is inevitable that anything which concerns the welfare of the dear ones in a far-off land must strike very deeply into the hearts of the relatives and friends left behind in India, who are so closely bound to the exiles that they never for a single day cease to think of them.

In addition to sentiment, the masses of India, on account of economic interest, are seriously affected by anything that harms their relatives who have emigrated to the outlying portions of the Empire to labour there. The absent ones, with negligibly few exceptions, remit all the money they can scrape together to their wives, children, aged parents, indigent relatives, and other dependents (whose kinship often is nominal to such a degree that no Occidental would acknowledge any obligation towards them). Anything that occurs to cut off this monetary current will violently disturb the financial economy of the residents of the remotest rural districts of the Peninsula.

This, then, is the crux of the situation. The problem of the Indian immigrant in the Colonies, if left to lacerate the feelings of the 244,267,542 brown subjects of King George, will menace Indo-British relations far more than any political agitation that may be whipped up by a few malcontents. For these reasons everyone interested in promoting the good will of Indians towards the Empire must make an effort to learn what is trying the temper of the natives of Hindustan settled in the Dominions and Colonies, of their connections in India, and of their country-people all over the world, and must seek to remove their grievances.

II.

The issues involved in the South African crisis are manifold; but, putting the case in a nutshell, the present trouble appears to be due to the fact that by little and little the door has been shut in the face of the emigrants from India; and bit by bit those already established in the Provinces of the Union have been insulted, harassed, oppressed, and deprived of their rights, to such an extent that their manhood (aye, and womanhood) refuses to be bullied and cudgelled any more. During the past few years the Colonial authorities have devised numerous measures to badger the natives of Hindustan not working there as coolies under an indenture, but engaged in independent business as merchants, hawkers, and professionals. Amongst these instruments of inquisition employed to wound the susceptibilities of Indian settlers and jeopardise their material interests, the following may be mentioned:—

- (1) The registration of the brown settlers in the spirit and manner in which the records of criminals are kept.
- (2) Compelling them to reside in reservations out of the pale of civilisation and in unhealthy and insanitary quarters, inadequately supplied with educational facilities for their children, etc.
- (3) Obliging Indians, no matter how high their rank and deep their culture, to ride in railway and tram cars meant only for "niggers" (as the Colonials contemptuously term the blacks and all natives of Hindustan, despite the enlightenment of the latter, stretching back generations before the Caucasian became civilised).
- (4) Making it difficult for them to acquire, and even to lease, property.
- (5) Harping them in their efforts to secure licences to engage in trade and vending.
- (6) Ruining the business they have established by refusing to re-admit them when they return to South Africa after a temporary absence on a trip to India, and refusing to allow them to bring in fresh employees.
- (7) Imposing a poll tax of £3 per annum on each Indian who remains in South Africa after the expiration of his indenture; and on his wife and each of his sons above sixteen and each daughter above thirteen (note the low age in the case of girls).
- (8) Harassing the settlers by preventing their wives and children (even though they may have been born in the Union) from joining them.
- (9) Openly questioning the legality of marriage contracted according to Hindu, Muslim, Sikh, and other non-Christian rites, and the legitimacy of children born in such wedlock.
- (10) Interfering in religious observances by barring out priests and preceptors; and
- (11) Unduly restricting the right of appeal to the Judiciary against the high-handedness of the immigration authorities.

Other minor grievances exist, but the chief objectionable and unjustifiable features have been noted.

Two points—the poll tax and the regulations concerning women and children—call for special notice.

The impost is levied, not for the sake of revenue, as the Union Government has admitted more than once, but for the express purpose of compelling Indians who entered South Africa under indenture either to go back to serfdom or to leave the country. Originally it was proposed to exact £25 per annum from each adult, and non-payment of the exaction was to be deemed a crime. But these demands were so drastic that the Government of India was obliged to protest against them. The Colonial authorities, however, were so bent upon driving ex-indentured Indians either back into slavery or out of the land that they refused to give up the idea, but reduced the tax to £8, and provided that if case it was not paid it should be collected by a summary civil process instead of by criminal procedure. However, the economic status of ex-indentured Indians generally is so low that even this rate proved to be quite beyond their means. In not a few cases its imposition has been instrumental in driving girls into prostitution. The measures enforced by the authorities to collect their "pound of flesh" have been so stringent that the concession made as the result of the protest of the British-Indian Government has been nullified in the spirit, if not in the letter.

Needless to say, the Indians detested this tax and opposed it with all their might. Finding that appeals and resolutions were of no avail, they set out, under the leadership of Mr. M. K. Gandhi, esteemed by his countrymen as one of the ablest and most patriotic sons of India, to carry on a campaign of passive resistance. The struggle led to a compromise whereby the Government was to pass an Act which would restrict the number of Indian immigrants, but would make life bearable for all those who were in the Union at the time, and who might be permitted to enter.

This promise, however, has not been kept. The poll tax still is in force. The laws and regulations have been made worse instead of better.

Indians of the standing of Mr. Gandhi and of the Hon. Mr. Gopal Krishna Gokhale (whose absence from a recent session of the Indian Imperial Legislative Council led Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson, who, as the senior member, was presiding over its deliberations, to describe the meeting as being like Hamlet played with the title-role left out) assert that solemn undertakings were given them by the South African Ministers that the objectionable tax would be wiped off the statute book. The Ministry, on the contrary, declare that no definite pledge was made.

It is asserted by those who contend that the Union Government has broken its word that the Botha Cabinet is being taunted by its opponents (the followers of General Hertzog) for "tonguing to the Mother Country," and that the Ministry, in turn, is taking its revenge on helpless Indians. Those who subscribe to this theory further allege that the Boers hate the Indians because their wretched condition in the Transvaal was stated by responsible British statesmen to constitute a reason for going to war with them; because the natives of Hindustan then in South Africa served in the Army Beater Corps during the campaign; and because Indians like Dr. Renaday, of Bombay, especially went to South Africa to give medical and surgical relief to sick and wounded British soldiers.

Referring to the other serious cause of friction between Indians and the South African authorities (namely, the hardships entailed on the women and children), the Union Government decided some time ago that marriages of domiciled Indians, when celebrated according to the rites of religions which permit polygamy, were illegal within the terms of South African law, and therefore the wives of Indians who had been married according to Hindu, Mohamedan, Sikh, and other ceremonies of like nature, were not lawfully wedded, but were mere concubines, whose children necessarily were illegitimate. This measure ever since has been used to bar out the wives and progeny of settlers (in some cases those who had merely gone to their Motherland for a short visit and wished to return to their husbands and homes in the Union Provinces), and has been employed to deprive the wives of Indians of their exemption from testifying against their husbands. These decisions are aimed alike against monogamous and polygamous unions, but are even more severe in the latter instance.

As was to be expected, the policy of the South African Government has wounded the susceptibilities of the women, and impelled them boldly to step forth from their secluded life into the thick of the struggle. Some of them have not hesitated to break the laws which they considered to be unjust by refusing to register themselves, and crossing the border into the Cape Colony—which, by the way, is a criminal offence—and gladly have gone to gaol for conscience' sake. Though imprisonment with hard labour has been meted out to them, these shy and gentle creatures refuse to give up the struggle, in which the question of their honour and their conjugal and maternal rights are involved.

This has had a reflex effect upon the women in India. The intelligent amongst them have been stirred to the depths of their being, and are joining the men to exert pressure on the Government of India. Some of them are displaying great activity in collecting funds for the cause. Mrs. Jammalbai Sakka, of Bombay, especially deserves to be mentioned in this connection. Absolutely without knowledge of English, but highly educated through the medium of her mother-tongue (Gujerati), she possesses extraordinary mental and physical vigour and a persuasive and ready tongue, and is working hard to coax her country-people to contribute to the South African Indian war chest.

The fact that Indian women have been thus aroused shows (perhaps more than anything else that has occurred) how intensely the immigration question affects Hindustan.

III.

Though South Africa happens to be the storm centre, it is not the only unit of the Empire in which the Indian immigrants are having trouble. Indeed, in whatever Dominion or Colony they have settled, they feel aggrieved at the treatment accorded them. The attitude of those which have rigorously excluded them (Australia, for instance) has embittered India even more than the policy of those from which they are not absolutely barred out. In other words, the problem of Indian immigration within the Empire is an Imperial question of the widest dimensions.

The matter does not end here. It forms an important part of the complex international question which the meeting of the East and the West, and of the white and coloured races, has brought into existence. Emigrants from Asia are knocking at the doors of all the countries of the American continents, just as they are seeking to enter the European colonies in Australasia and Africa. All the peoples of the world—white, yellow, brown, and black—vitaly are interested in this perplexing and insistent issue.

However, it is more imperative for the British than for any other Power to solve this problem, because no other nation is saddled as they are with the responsibility of administering the affairs of many millions of "coloured" people. The interests involved between Britain and India are so delicate that they are bound to be strained if matters are not adjusted in this respect.

IV.

The outstanding feature of the trouble is that objection is made only to the presence of free Indians and of indentured labourers who wish to remain after their term expires. Those who are slaying in the mines and on the plantations as coolies at a definite (and preposterously low) wage, under conditions which have been painted in the blackest colours before investigating committees, or who go there for such a purpose, are not objected to. Indeed, a much stronger statement than this is warranted by the facts, namely, that in more than one part of the British Empire the indentured Indian labourer is warmly welcomed because he does work which a white man would not stoop to perform, and which the black and red autochthons, through lack of experience, are incapable of undertaking.

A number of causes unite to make the Indians who enter the country under indenture wish to stay on after their contract expires. Exile lifts them out of the rut of life and labour in India. They naturally desire to continue working in the country in which they have lived for many years, and to whose conditions they have grown accustomed. Moreover, the Colonies, on account of the thinness of their population, offer better opportunities for earning a livelihood than does crowded Hindustan.

The conservatism innate in an Indian so strongly binds him to his native land, that if starvation did not stare him in the face the lures of the labour agents (which are responsible for the presence of the majority of the Indians in the Colonies) would not induce him to leave it. The man who has been abroad, however, and realised the possibility of earning a better living with comparative ease, would not be human if he placidly went back to a life of penury in his old village. Thus he selects to stay where he is.

But he has no desire to continue to be a serf in the land of his adoption. For one thing, the love of freedom, despite all the cant that prevails in the West to the contrary, is innate in the breast of every Indian. For another thing, the ex-indentured labourer knows what a hell on earth contract labour is, and once he has escaped from that inferno, the highest pressure is needed to goad him back into it. The £8 tax imposed on each adult member of his family tends to force him to re-indenture—and hence he has resisted it, first by passive and later by active measures.

V.

The ex-indentured Indians are not encouraged to stay on, and the free Indians are driven out, it is alleged, for the reason that these men, with their low standards of life and their thrifty ways, are able to beat their white competitors. Another cause of aversion to them, it is asserted, is the race prejudice entertained by the people who are dominant in the continents that erstwhile belonged to the coloured aborigines. In addition, it is said that Indians are unclean and insanitary in their habits; that they marry when they are young, before they leave their homes, and for that reason do not wed in the country in which they elect to live; that such intermarriages, in any event, would be undesirable on account of the racial differences and the dissimilar standards of civilisation; that, in short, they cannot be assimilated in the country of their adoption.

The allegations grouped towards the end of the last paragraph may be noticed before the more important one at the beginning is adverted to. The objection on the plea of uncleanness will not hold, for Indians are religiously punctilious in regard to ablutions. The dislike on the score of unassimilability cannot well be urged in the case of countries like South Africa, where, according to the census of 1911, there are only 1,276,242 Europeans and 4,019,006 black natives. The question of intermarriage, complicated as it is by racial and colour prejudices, is of too complex and controversial a nature to be discussed with any advantage in this connection; much, doubtless, can be said on either side.

Referring to the more serious contention that economic disturbance is caused by Indians in the various colonies, it at once may be conceded that the Indian standards of living are far below those of Europeans; and that this certainly does enable the former to underbid the latter.

But it may be pointed out that the Indians in such countries as South Africa rarely undersell the white British, for the simple and sufficient reason that the latter do not engage in the kinds of petty trades that the brown British follow. The Indian competition mainly is directed against Europeans who, in some cases, both politically and commercially are the rivals (and, some would say, the potential enemies) of the British, and who, be it noted, succeed in trade because their standards of life are lower than those of Britons. It is therefore manifestly unjust to drive out the dark-skinned subjects of his Majesty King George in order to protect foreigners and enemies of the Empire.

In countries like Canada, Australia, etc., where white men engage in manual labour, and where, therefore, Asiatic wage-workers come in direct competition with settlers of pure British extraction, an effective deterrent to underselling in the labour market may be provided by prohibiting anyone from working under the trade union scale of wages.

VI.

These suggestions may or may not lead to a solution of the problem; but some satisfactory settlement must be found for the vexatious situations arising from the oppression of Indians in the British Colonies. Broadly speaking, the matter can be adjusted by one of the following three measures:—

(1) Full freedom of entry for Indians on the basis of that enjoyed by the white British subjects;

(2) Total prohibition of Indian emigration to any part of the British Empire and repatriation of those already in the Colonies; or

(3) Restriction of Indian emigration with the proviso that those admitted are to be treated on terms of perfect equality with the white subjects of the British Sovereign.

The first alternative at present is out of the question on account of the prejudices entertained against Indian immigrants. It readily may be conceived that no Colony voluntarily would agree to such a measure, and the Imperial Government could not force such a course of action upon any Dominion against its will.

The second alternative would please some of the Dominions, for it would solve the difficulties emanating from the influx of Indians; but it would not be welcomed by all the units of the British Empire. More than one Colony would refuse to take a step that would result in the loss of the cheap indentured labour from India which enables its capitalists to exploit the mines and plantations at immense profit to themselves. The Indians feel so sure of this point that more than once they have urged their Government to chastise the Colonies by withdrawing all the Indian coolies.

If India were to agree to permit its immigrants to be expelled from the Colonies, it certainly would demand (and with every moral and legal right) that all those thus expatriated should be fully indemnified for the loss of the business they have built up and the goodwill thereof which they would be compelled to relinquish. Would the Colonies be willing to incur such expenditure? Besides, what feelings would the expatriated Indians nurse in their bosoms, and what would be their effect on Indo-British relations? It is not for this writer to answer the first question; but the second query may be replied to in the words of a telegram recently sent to the Premier of Canada by a party of Indians who were not wanted in British Columbia:—"We intend to return to India, but we go back with flames in our heart."

However, it is not likely that India's temper and material interests would permit it to agree to such a proposition. Intelligent Indians would think for a long time before they sacrificed the rights which, as British subjects, they possess in the Dominions overseas.

There already is a strong agitation on account of the fact that those who owe no allegiance to the British Sovereign are much better treated than the Indian subjects of his Britannic Majesty. Indians have freely shed their blood for the Empire in and out of Hindustan; Western education has bound at least the classes to the Britons with chords of intellectual affinity; and common political and trade interests unite Hindustan with its Occidental Suzerain; and thus they feel deeply hurt when they see enemies of the British Empire given preferential treatment over them. To such an extent has this discrimination against brown British subjects been carried out that some time ago a young lawyer from Goa, who had been denied entry on the ground that he was an Indian, was freely admitted into a part of British South Africa upon his declaration that he was a Portuguese.

The exclusion of Indians from the Colonies would force the Government of India to give ear to the persistent native demands to pay the Dominions back in their own coin. Hindustan would insist that no Colonials should be allowed to enter its services through any loophole whatsoever; and it might even wish to declare a complete boycott of Colonial merchants and trade.

If, for the sake of argument, it be conceded that such wild threats may be even partially put into actual operation, what effect would it have upon the solidarity of the Empire, of which the millions of India form the bulk?

As Lord Hardinge pointed out in a recent speech, in which, however, he expressed hearty sympathy with the Indians in the present crisis, his Government would find itself involved in limitless and unsolvable perplexities were it to translate such retaliative sentiments into tangible measures.

But in the event of Indians being absolutely excluded, and the Government of India refusing to retaliate to the satisfaction of its charges, the result naturally would be the initiation of a campaign of sedition which would have for its slogan the impotency of India when its national honour and material interests are trampled upon. These propagandists would not be likely to stop at anything, fair or foul, overt or covert, until they had placed their country in a position where it effectively could adopt a retaliative policy. The menace to Pax Britannica involved in such a situation is too obvious to need to be pointed out.

Therefore the third appears to be the only alternative that is thinkable in the present circumstance. It certainly would not solve the problem for ever; for it is inconceivable that Indians altogether can resist the economic and other pressure which is impelling them to emigrate. But until the time arrives when education has advanced in Hindustan and its citizens have developed that power which enables a nation to extort just treatment, the measure would do admirably well. Be this as it may, the Indians at present are in a mood to agree to the restriction of immigration on the condition that after entry they would not be discriminated against. This proviso is highly important, because the Indian pride will make any solution short of that unacceptable.

VII.

The collision between the self governing Dominions and India places the Imperial authorities in a very difficult position. On the one hand, Whitehall has to face the fact that South Africa, Canada, and Australia are autonomous in the administration of local affairs. On the other hand it cannot ignore the petitions and memorials from literate Indians that it shall use the ample power it possesses to shield their country people from Colonial oppression, nor the pitiful pleadings of the illiterate masses that their Ruler shall protect their relatives and friends in other portions of his territories.

The uneducated Indians look upon the Sovereign as their all-powerful protector. They believe in the divine right of kings. They know nothing of constitutions or of self-government. So far as they are concerned, the only personality that exists in the political world is that of their Emperor. For generations they have been given to understand that the long, strong arm of their white monarch can and will protect them and theirs from harm. If now they become disillusioned, if they find that the Imperial authorities are not able to shield their kindred and loved ones from Colonial harassment, a situation of the most alarming nature is bound to be created.

It is this essential fact that all Imperialists must face in solving the problem of the Indian immigrant in the British Colonies.—The Fortnightly Review.

Turkey and the Islands.

THE decision of the Great Powers in regard to the Ægean Islands has been made known formally to the Porte and the Greek Government. Turkey has been requested to acquiesce in the loss of all the islands now in Greek occupation except Tenedos and Imbros. This solution of one of the phases of the Near Eastern question is admittedly an arbitrary one. Turkey in her quarrel with the Balkan States elected to appeal to the sword, and the verdict was against her. But the issue was not fought to a finish. In their own interests, no less than in the interests of the Ottoman Empire, the Powers saw fit to intervene. The Bulgarians were forbidden to proceed beyond Catalj; the Turks were counselled to make their submission without further delay, and the Powers undertook to adjudicate upon the question of the Ægean Islands. In these circumstances the fate of the islands must be regarded as a matter quite distinct from the terms of settlement imposed by the verdict of the war. It is true that the Greeks are in occupation as a result of their Naval superiority; but as an offset to this aspect of the situation we have to remember that the end of hostilities in the Balkans saw the Turks once more in possession of Adrianople, while, as a result of the quarrel between the former Allies, instead of four States in alliance against Turkey we have an understanding, or the basis of an understanding, between Turkey and Bulgaria which could not fail to disturb the equanimity of the three other States if they had not been able to fall back upon the support of Roumania, acting as the "policeman of Europe." For the purpose, therefore, of a settlement of the problem presented by the Ægean Islands the slate could only be regarded as clean. The one guiding principle actuating the Powers in arriving at a decision ought to have been the desire to bring about as durable a peace as possible in the Near East, and the chief determining factor the relative capacity for unrest of the islands in Greek and Turkish hands respectively. On the Greek side the argument—and it is a strong one—is that the nationality of the islanders is Greek, and that, having been freed from Turkish rule, they will never be content to be placed under it again. The Turks urge that if they are to be confirmed in the possession of Asia Minor—and no one contemplates for a moment their exclusion from any Asiatic territory—then they ought to be given the islands that are geographically part and parcel of the mainland. A decision on one or other of these lines would have commended itself as an honest endeavour to cope with a difficult situation, while the moral support of the Powers given to the Greek or the Turkish point of view, as the case might be, would have helped the cause of peace by acting as a deterrent to the unsuccessful claimant.

Once more, however, in the history of the Near Eastern question the Powers have sought to evade the issue. The present decision in regard to the Ægean Islands is in the nature of a compromise between the Greek and the Turkish point of view, which satisfies neither party and lacks the advantage of being justified by a clearly defined principle. In part the Powers have admitted the justice of the Turkish contention that the islands immediately adjacent to the mainland belong to Asia Minor. Geographical position has been allowed to override claims of nationality in the case of Tenedos and Imbros, which are considered necessary for the defence of the Dardanelles. But the Straits are probably the most strongly fortified portion of the Turkish Empire, and are susceptible in themselves of ample defence, apart from Imbros and Tenedos, as was proved during the first Balkan war. If Greece is to be debarred from using the other islands as naval bases, the same embargo could have been placed on Tenedos and Imbros. The fact that the Powers appreciated the difficulties in the situation in regard to these two islands justifies Turkey in doubting the efficacy of the restrictions imposed on Greece in the case of the other islands. While the Dardanelles, the Turks point out, can take care of themselves, this is not the case with the Asia Minor coast line. Mytilene and Chios command the entrance to the Gulf of Smyrna, and Turkey can hardly fail to be concerned for the protection of this important commercial centre. For this reason the Porte is pressing for the possession of these two islands, and it will smart under a sense of injustice until it obtains them. If the prospects of peace, then, are to be measured by the relative capacity of Greece and Turkey for creating unrest over the possession of Mytilene and Chios, we have on the one hand Turkey standing as it were at bay over this question; on the other hand there are the Greek islanders for whom the Greek Government is naturally and rightly solicitous. Visions of a series of Cretes have been conjured up; but the islands in question are no more comparable with Crete than the Isle of Wight is with Ireland. No doubt the Greek inhabitants wish for incorporation in the Greek kingdom as fervently as their kinsmen in Cyprus desire the same fate for that island, but without support from Greece the capacity of the islanders for unrest is restricted within very small limits by their numbers.

We cannot help feeling that the decision of the Powers in regard to the Ægean Islands is unwise, inasmuch as it does not offer the best prospect of lasting peace. With the Greek point of view we have the fullest sympathy, and Greece is justified in trying to keep all she can. She has pleaded her cause more ably than Turkey, and the Powers have overrated the trouble that the islanders were likely to cause if guaranteed satisfactory government. On the other hand, trouble is bound to ensue from the smuggling between the islands and the mainland that Greece, with the utmost goodwill, can never hope to eliminate. Our chief regret is that Great Britain should seem in this matter to have gone out of her way to take sides against Turkey. The maintenance of European peace may have appeared the paramount issue; but there was no valid reason why the fate of the Ægean Islands should have been linked with any menace to this peace. Whatever the shortcomings of any particular Ministry in Constantinople, the Ottoman Empire has a claim on our friendship and on our belief in its future under good government. Here was an opportunity to give effect to that belief. The question of the Ægean Islands turns on Turkish maladministration in the past. We believe the Ottoman Empire to be capable of better things, and that it is to realise its destiny in Asia Minor. The islands adjacent to the mainland might well have played the part of an administrative barometer. If good Government were to be established in these within a reasonable period Greek fears would subside and the Porte would be entitled to moral support in the event of unreasonable agitation on the part of the Greek islanders. If, on the other hand, the latter were goaded into unrest, the experiment would have been pronounced a failure and the islands would revert to Greece. Turkey in those circumstances would have less cause than she now has to resent the decision of the Powers, and the chances of a lasting peace would have been brighter. We hope, however, that some arrangement may yet be made between Greece and Turkey to remove any sense of bitterness over the Ægean Islands.—The Near East.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1918, writes :—The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that must is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (13s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parish necessary.

Albania requests the Powers to exercise their influence with Greece to end the regrettable situation. The note adds that Albania would be reluctant to take measures which might have a deplorable effect in the Balkans.

William I. of Albania.

The Times' special correspondent from Durazzo telegraphed the following message :—

Prince William will publish to-morrow the following proclamation to the people:—

Albanians!

To-day the destiny of Albania fulfills itself. Albania, free and independent, enters a new phase of history. The fate of the country in the future is entrusted to the Sovereign, to the loyalty of the Government, to the virtues of patriots. The road we must traverse is long and full of obstacles, but no obstacle can exist for a people which has inherited so glorious a page of ancient history, which, like you, has a firm desire to labour for the future. Our duty and that of our heirs will always be to work for and to seek the happiness of the nation with all our efforts. With these sentiments we have accepted from your hands the Crown of Albania.

Albanians!

At the moment when we mount the Throne we expect that you, united round your Sovereign, will work with him to realise the national aspirations.

Epirus Revolt.

Athens, Mar. 25.

The Government has sent a circular to the Powers drawing attention to the spread of the insurrection in Epirus and the painful position of the Greek troops there. Although the Government is convinced, says the circular, that the Albanian Government's proposals to M. Zographos, the recently elected President of the autonomous Government of Epirus, correspond with the views of the Powers, the Greek Government considers it its duty to draw attention to the danger of delaying the Powers' reply to Greece concerning the guarantees.

Ægean Islands.

Constantinople, Mar. 29.

The Rumanian General Coanda, who was the chief military delegate at the Bucharest Peace Conference, has arrived here and has paid a visit to Talaat Bey, the Minister of the Interior.

The visit has aroused some comment in view of the efforts which Rumania is alleged to be making with a view to mediation between Turkey and Greece in connection with the Ægean Islands.

Albania.

London, Mar. 30.

An Albanian note to the Powers says that while Greece is withdrawing her troops, she is replacing them by bands of Komitadwhich includes among its members the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Inchcape, Lord Kinnaird, Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams, Viscountess Churchill, the Vice-Chancellors of Oxford and Cambridge, Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir James Dunlop Smith, Sir William Wedderburn, Sir Henry Craik, Sir Henry Seymour King and others. The work, which will be done mainly by sub-committees, will be intended to give young Indians an opportunity of coming into more intimate touch with the better sides of English life, and will be entirely free from any idea of officious interference, or of improving or supervising Indian students.

Credit Bank Failure.

Bombay, Mar. 26.

In the liquidation proceedings of the Credit Bank of India, Justice MacLeod issued a misfeasance summons on the application of the official liquidator against Kazi Kabiruddin, Sir Bhalechandra Krishna, Tyebhai M. M. Maskatiwalla, Hon. Sirdar Syedali El Edross, Hiralal Chhotalal Shroff, Tricunrai D. Mehta and Gulamhussein V. Patel as directors, and Jaffer Joosub, as manager to recover from them jointly and severally the sum of Rs 23,23,231, the claim against Mr. Maskatiwalla being for Rs.6,06,600, a sum advanced to unsubstantial persons during the period he was a director. A misfeasance summons to recover Rs. 17,790 has also been issued against N. R. Mistry and A. C. Rice alias A. E. Oama, auditors of the Bank. The summons against the directors have been made returnable in June, while the summons against the auditors has been stayed, pending disposal of the criminal case against Mistry.

Multan, Mar. 27.

The misfeasance proceedings under Section 214 of Companies Act, against the Directors of the Hindustan Bank have been postponed to the 1st of April, on account of the illness of Donlat Rai, late Managing Director.

Our London Letter.

London, 13th March, 1914.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION: RECEPTION OF HOME RULE OFFER.

THE political situation resulting from the Government's Home Rule offer has now definitely crystallised. It is true one could not clearly acquaint himself with the trend of opinion last Monday when Mr. Asquith disclosed his concessions to Ulster in the House of Commons. But now it is possible to realise, with a fair amount of accuracy, the view taken of the actual situation by the different parties in Parliament. Everything for the present points against compromise. The Nationalist Party and a large body of opinion in the Liberal Party would revolt if the Government went one step further down the slope of compromise, for many of the Prime Minister's supporters feel that they have certainly gone to the extreme limits of concession already. The loyalty of the Party has been indeed put to a severe test by Mr. Asquith and his colleagues and indications are not wanting to show that the Government would be ill-advised to yield any further to the demands of Sir Edward Carson and his friends, if the Liberal leader is to save his Party from ruin and disaster. On the other hand, the Unionist Party are strongly opposed to the acceptance of the Government's offer in its present form—exclusion of Ulster for six years—and any modifications they suggest informally affect questions of principle. There is no evidence of any communication having been received by the Irish Unionists from the Government in response to Sir Edward Carson's proposal made in last Monday's debate, viz., that he would go to Belfast to advise his supporters to open negotiations with the Government, provided the time limit of six years is dispensed with. The essence of the offer which the Government have now made is that it is a temporary arrangement which shall lead up automatically to Irish unity. It will be remembered that the Premier, in his now famous speech at Ladybank last autumn, had laid it down as an essential condition to settlement that nothing should be done which would erect a permanent or an inseparable bar in the way of Irish unity. The Unionist stipulation is that exclusion should, in a Parliamentary sense, be permanent; that is, that it should continue until a fresh Act of Parliament was passed providing for the inclusion of Ulster.

Mr. A. P. Nicholson, who is now the writer of "Political Notes" to the Daily News and Leader, having acted as the Parliamentary representative of the Times before his secession from the Unionist Party, goes on to say in the former journal that it cannot be argued by any that this is a distinction without a difference; it is a distinction of principle. But those who do not realise how vital the distinction is should take note of the argument, which is advanced by the Irish Nationalists who are in favour of an arrangement, if this be possible. Supposing the Government went one step further, so runs the argument, and acceded to Sir Edward Carson's request for the exclusion of Ulster till a fresh Act be passed. Under the separate arrangements that would then be made for Ulster a custom would grow up, and a habit of local government, with vested interests and tendencies similar to those displayed now in the Belfast Corporation. Sectarian influences would be in the ascendant, and before long it would be difficult for the Imperial Parliament to resist a claim from Ulster that she should be granted institutions of local government of a strange kind. This inevitable growth, it is contended, would be fatal to the cause of Irish unity. The Irish Nationalist party cannot take this step. They would not be supported by their party in Ireland if they did. The education question, among others, has been forgotten by those who fail to see the difficulty. The main current of thought in the Liberal Party is behind the Nationalists in this. If the Government, therefore, were to take one step further they would not have the moral sanction of their supporters and, so far as can be seen, their downfall would follow. If this is the true reading of the situation, as it seems clear, then the possibility of compromise depends upon the Unionist Party, or the Irish Unionists, taking a forward step and accepting temporary exclusion. We must await, for the present, future developments.

THE CHURCHILL TORCH.

Mr. Middlemore, in the House of Commons, asked the First Lord: "Is it not a fact that in the spring and summer of 1916, after providing for a 50 per cent. superiority over Germany in home waters, we shall only have two Dreadnoughts in the Mediterranean, and will not that be practically an abandonment of the Mediterranean?"

Mr. Winston Churchill: "The hon. gentleman is giving information and not asking for it."

MR. BALFOUR AT TENNIS.

The ex-Leader of the Unionist Party is having the time of his life in Nice. He has entered for the men's handicap doubles and mixed doubles in the international lawn-tennis tournament now proceeding there with Mr. A. F. Wilding, the world's champion, and Mrs. Lambert Chambers, the lady champion, as his respective partners in the two events. He and Mr. Wilding have already beaten Prince Bahram of Persia and Mr. Craig Biddle, the American player, in the first round. Mr. Balfour, who is an ardent supporter of the game, and a frequent patron of the Queen's Club and Wimbledon meetings, plays much after the style of real or court tennis, his racket being gripped well down the handle and a pronounced "cut" applied to the majority of his strokes. He shows great keenness and thoroughly enjoys his game. Being out of the present political crisis over the Home Rule Bill, the ex-Premier, no doubt, feels his freedom to the utmost degree, though one cannot help regarding it as a cruel irony of fate that a statesman of Mr. Balfour's experience in politics, who had fought with such vigour in the former Home Rule campaigns within the walls of the House of Commons, should, by force of circumstances, have been deprived of his command of the Opposition at a time when his Party is in great need of experienced leadership. From Nice and Lawn Tennis to Westminster and Home Rule is a far cry, but it was certainly more dignified for him to have honourably retired than to have continued his leadership at the dictates of his "Die Hard" followers, the unbecoming position, which Mr. Bonar Law, the present Tory "Leader," finds himself in.

THE "TIMES" AT ONE PENNY.

The expected reduction in the price of the Times, about which I had already hinted in one of my previous weekly letters, on the authority of the Daily Chronicle, is at last an accomplished fact. The authorised announcement was made in its issue of the 11th inst. in the following terms: "In view of the grave importance of the present political situation, it has been decided that on and after Monday next the Times newspaper, complete including the financial section, shall be sold at one penny per copy in Great Britain and Ireland, and at three pence per copy on the Continent."

In spite of the "grave importance of the present political situation"—which is officially given as the main reason for this step—it is generally understood that, owing to the obvious loss of popularity which this journal has been undoubtedly meeting with during the past few years, this course had become an absolute necessity if the paper was to hold its own against the keen competition that prevails now in the journalistic world of London. Formerly, when the Times was famous for its fair-mindedness, impartiality and independence, it certainly held a unique position and was indeed the national journal of England. Its exorbitant price was then no bar to its popularity, as the thinking section of the community was prepared to pay any price, provided it could secure the genuine and unbiased expression of public opinion in the country on various grave and important current affairs. Ever since the Times has changed hands, however, it has been rapidly drifting towards the detestable system of party politics, under which every other journal here is being conducted. So it has automatically dropped from the proud pedestal of a national organ to the level of a mere party newspaper. With this change, of course, it is not surprising that it has been visibly losing its influence and popularity and, at a time when there are some excellent party organs in existence at reasonable prices, it is equally evident that the reading public after a time showed its reluctance to subscribe to the Times, now a mere party paper, but, notwithstanding, still offered at a prohibitive price.

As I have mentioned already, the journal, however, has had a great past. The history of the Times begins with the history of modern Europe. The first number was produced by the first John Walter in 1785, and it was then called The Daily Universal Register. It was christened The Times in 1788, just before the outbreak of the French Revolution. Its first proprietor, it is interesting to remember, was sent to goal for severely censuring the Duke of York; but while Mr. Walter was in prison his paper went on serenely expressing a fully democratic opinion on current topics. For a hundred years a John Walter was the chief proprietor of the Times; and no reference to the really important affairs of English history, since the paper was established, would be complete unless the Times was somehow introduced into the matter. It has made some very serious blunders, but on the other hand it has often been the first to give publicity to matters of vast public importance. Among its famous editors were Thomas Barnes (1817-1841) and John Delane, who succeeded him. It was under Delane that the Times reached its apogee. Its more recent history, the acquirement of its control by Lord Northcliffe, is already well known. It is only a matter of yesterday. In February, 1911, its original price of three pence was reduced to two pence, in spite of the fact that it had added various regular supplements. As regards the Asiatic policy of the Times, your readers are well aware of its traditional antagonism and time-honoured opposition towards the oriental nations in general. Its recent bogey of the "Indian Peril" will, no doubt, be within general recollection. Comment is useless, as the paper is notorious in the East for its ever hostile attitude towards all that is progressive, self-respecting and sacred throughout that ancient yet newly-awakened continent.

THE PROPOSED CHIEFS' COLLEGE AT DELHI.

Renter's brief messages from Delhi do not enable us here to form an adequate opinion as to the scope and character of the proposed Chiefs' College in the new Capital. Neither do the brief telegraphic summaries of Lord Hardinge's and the Maharajah of Bikaner's speeches, delivered at Delhi on the occasion of the inaugural meeting, at which the Viceroy addressed the assembled Princes and Chiefs, help us to thoroughly grasp the aims and objects of the proposed institution. We must therefore await the arrival of the full proceedings in that connection by the Indian mail a fortnight hence. As far as one can at present judge, however, it is proposed to establish a college there for the education and instruction of the sons and relatives of the Ruling Chiefs in India. That, of course, would not be the first institution of its kind, as there are already some excellent Chiefs' Colleges in various parts of the country. All the same it is a very happy idea and the scheme deserves every success. As a matter of fact, under the distinguished patronage, which has been so rightly extended to it, there will be no anxiety felt as to its future. It is, however, understood that the proposed College is likewise intended for the training of the younger members of the nobility and aristocratic families of India. If that is so, the decision is certainly regrettable, as it is bound to widen the gulf between the upper classes of the population in India and the middle classes. As it is, India is keenly suffering from the effects of the existing system, which has so rigidly divorced the overwhelming bulk of the aristocracy from the national and popular sentiments of the country. They are even to-day very remote from the spirit of the people and are hopelessly out of touch with the real needs and requirements of democracy, the backbone of the Indian nation. Recently there have certainly been visible hopeful signs of a genuine awakening amongst all classes and sections in India, and the wave of democratic ascendancy that has been overrunning the vast continent of Asia with such vigour and force has not been without its effect in that country as well. The best interests of India and the Empire could only be served by mutual co-operation of the aristocratic and democratic elements. Nothing could be more suicidal and more destructive to national progress and national advancement in India than the maintenance of the "caste-system," which has been the curse of the country for generations. The aristocratic youth in India, as well as in other States, can only imbibe the true notion of good citizenship, if he is trained on democratic lines and brought up in a democratic atmosphere. Liberal education, to be effective, cannot be administered in the exclusive atmosphere of a Chiefs' College and the young scions of the nobility, to be thoroughly initiated into the fundamental principles of citizenship, which should be of substantial advantage to them in their after-life, can not be usefully brought up in the "gilded chamber" of the proposed institution. That would lead to certain failure and is sure to immensely retard the steady progress of national development. The significance of this great principle is nowhere recognised more fully than in Great Britain where, as is well-known, even His Majesty the King himself has been so closely following this undoubtedly sound doctrine. The young princes here are being brought up on the most democratic principles, and even the Prince of Wales is at this moment undergoing his course of education at Oxford as any other ordinary undergraduate. Prince Henry, who is at Eton, is, at the King's own express desire, being treated in the same way as his other college-fellows, and has even had to discharge his duties as a "fag" to a senior colleague. It is obvious that the "feather-bed" system of education is wholly unsuitable for those who are expected to take their proper share in providing for the welfare of the community in future and who are meant to subsequently serve the interests of the nation. This rule applies to India in a very real sense. The days when the country depended on the sole efforts of the landed aristocracy for lead and guidance are happily things of the past. The force of democracy and the national spirit have to-day become living factors even in India and the sooner the "upper ten" realise the change and the more closely they associate themselves with the general body of the people—the bulwark of society—in the national evolution, the more peaceful and the more honourable will be their own path of progress and improvement. Co-operation, and not seclusion, is needed for the common good of the country, and elements of fellowship and comradeship could nowhere be more fully mastered and maintained than in the class-rooms of a popular democratic educational institution. It is to such high and noble ideals that the proposed Chiefs' College at Delhi will deal a fatal blow.

INDIAN GIRL BARD.

The interesting announcement has just been made that Miss Dorothy Bonarjee, daughter of the famous lawyer of Calcutta, has been appointed bard at the Aberystwyth University College in Wales. I believe this is the first occasion on which this honour has been awarded to an Indian lady in this country—yet another happy symptom of female progress and enlightenment, which is manifesting itself so powerfully throughout the Eastern World. Miss Bonarjee is to be heartily congratulated on this recognition of her talents in such a distinguished quarter.

THE REV. C. F. ANDREWS IN LONDON.

Mr. Andrews, who went from India to South Africa to investigate the Indian question, arrived here from Cape Town on the 10th instant. He was met on arrival by a large number of Indians, who congratulated him on the result of his visit. He was also garlanded by Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, the Indian poetess. During his two months' stay in South Africa Mr. Andrews has had conferences with Lord Gladstone, General Botha and General Smuts. He is returning to India by the "Caledonia" on the 3rd of April.

In conversation with a Renter's representative Mr. Andrews said: "When I landed in South Africa two months ago things were very black indeed. But chiefly owing to Mr. Gandhi's chivalrous and patriotic action in refusing to add to the complications of the railway strike by renewing passive resistance, the atmosphere cleared, and from that time more friendly relations came about. General Smuts did all in his power to give Mr. Gandhi a full hearing, and out of this it is hoped that legislation may be carried through Parliament with regard to the £3 tax and the marriage question. These are the two main questions, and, if these are settled, the Indian trouble will be practically concluded. I cannot but confess unbounded admiration for the heroism and endurance of the Indian community in South Africa during the struggle, and especially for Mr. Gandhi, with whom I lived during the greater part of my stay. I must also express my keen sense of appreciation of the kindness and generous and fair-minded treatment I received at the hands both of my own countrymen and of the Dutch leaders in South Africa. I was given every opportunity of studying the situation carefully and openly. I trust that in future friendly relations between India and South Africa might be established on a wider and more permanent basis than in the past, and I hope on my return to India to do what I can to further such a cause. I saw General Botha before leaving, and I was impressed by his sterling character and simplicity. The Premier assured me that his sincere desire was to do whatever lay in his power to act justly by the Indian community in their present difficulties. As legislation is now pending I do not feel free to discuss details, but I am convinced that the friendly spirit evinced on both sides would result in the Indian trouble being brought to an end."

GREEKS AND TURKS: GROWING BITTERNESS.

According to the Constantinople Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, it is observed in Ottoman political circles that the Ottoman population of the provinces and the capital are greatly irritated against the Greeks, as a result of the reports which come every day from the territories annexed by the Greeks, where Mosques are being destroyed and the Mussalman inhabitants subjected to various forms of cruelty, including robbery, violation and even assassination. Moslems, it is declared, are emigrating en masse, leaving their houses and possessions, and as soon as they reach Turkey they relate to their co-religionists the evils they have endured. Lively imaginations embroider upon facts which may be isolated, but which seem to be incontestable, and which assume the appearance of a general hostile movement against the Mussalmans. Strong feelings are thus aroused, and worse catastrophes may happen in Turkey, by which the Greeks will suffer, unless Europe immediately intervenes and advises the Hellenic Government to induce the local authorities to respect the lives and property of Mussalmans in accordance with the Treaty of Athens.

The Tanin has published a strong article commenting upon a letter from its Salonica Correspondent, who describes the cruelties inflicted upon Mussalmans under the tolerant eye of the Greek Government. Having given expression to its indignation, the Tanin adds that "the Turks might make use of the same means, but, being a civilised nation, they abstain; but it must not be forgotten that patience has its limits."

THE TURKISH NAVY.

In pursuance of the policy of the Ottoman Government to strengthen her Navy, the Turkish Ambassador, Towfik Pasha, visited the Admiralty two days ago and had a long interview with Mr. Winston Churchill for the purpose of conferring with the First Lord on the question of the loan of more officers of the British Navy for service in the Turkish Navy. The necessary preliminaries between the Foreign Office and the Porte were disposed of last week. Although the names of a number of British officers, whom the Turkish Government may desire to approach, were mentioned at the interview, no definite appointments were made. Further interviews between Mr. Churchill and His Excellency will take place, it is stated, before the selections are made. Already there are nine British naval officers on duty in the Turkish Navy, the most recent appointment being that of Commander C.R. Hamilton in June last year. The senior officer in rank at Constantinople is Rear-Admiral Limpas.

Rapid progress is being made, the Daily Telegraph learns, at Armstrong and Whitworth's yards on the Tyne with the battleship, "Rio de Janeiro," which Turkey recently bought from the Brazilian Government. Commander Raouf Bey, the Turkish officer who manoeuvred the "Hamidieh" so skilfully during the early stages of the recent war, has been given, it is understood, the command of the ship. For several weeks now he has been at Elswick superintending the work of completion, and, incidentally, with about a score of other Turkish officers, receiving instruction in the use of the modern machinery with which she will be fitted.

THE INDIAN POLICE.

To-day's Daily News contains a leading article on the methods of the Indian Police, as alleged by Mr. E. Norton in his defence of the young Bengali student Roy at the trial which has just ended in Calcutta concerning the murder of Inspector Ghose. "Whatever the facts in connection with the murder of Inspector Ghose may be," the journal proceeds, "the allegations made against the police by Roy's counsel are so very serious that it is scarcely possible to believe that they will be allowed to pass unnoticed. That the most important police witnesses were ex-convicts might be an unavoidable accident: there are cases in which witnesses of repute are from the nature of the charge unobtainable. But that it should be possible to suggest that the police publicly gave rewards to witnesses of the crime for capturing the accused, and even that they put a revolver into his hands for the purpose of incriminating him, argues a state of things certainly no better than that which exists in Russia and quite conceivably worse."

TETE À TETE

We are informed by the Alliance Bank, Simla, that all the Ottoman Treasury Bonds applied for through the Bank have been duly distributed among the various subscribers. As far as the Bank is aware all the Bonds have duly reached their destinations, "except 2 Bonds, £ 0-10-0 each, which were subscribed for by one Mohamed Moosa (who gave as his address, Sub-Assistant Surgeon, Chammarayapatta, Hassan (?))." These Bonds have been returned to the Bank through the Dead Letter Office. We hope some one amongst our readers will try to find out the exact address of the subscriber referred to above, or inform us if he happens to know it already.

We had hardly finished welcoming him when we learnt that His Excellency Khalil Khalid Bey was shortly going to leave India, and in fact our welcome of him partook of the character of farewell.

It is difficult to express the feelings of thousands of people in India like ourselves, who had been able to renew their acquaintance with Khalil Khalid the author, by meeting Khalil Khalid the man, when it was learnt that his stay among us would be so short. The circumstances surrounding his visit to Northern India with the carpets from His Imperial Majesty the Sultan were such that most people could only see him, and all looked forward to less restricted intercourse in the near future. Their grief was, therefore, great when the Hamdard inadvertently published an interview in which he had said something to one of the members of its staff about his impending departure. We were inundated with letters asking us to persuade His Excellency to visit other cities also besides those where he had to take a carpet, and we are certain that a good deal of the eagerness displayed was a personal tribute to the Turkish patriot and author who had suffered so much under the régime of Sultan Abdul Hamid Khan. Unfortunately His Excellency's itinerary was a short one, but we are assured by numerous testimonies that wherever he went he charmed those with whom he came in contact, from Her Highness the Begam Saheba of Bhopal and His Highness the Nawab Sahib of Rampur to the humblest Indian Mussalman. Whatever the reasons for his early departure, we feel sure that His Excellency carries with him the best wishes of Mussalmans in this country for his future success and hopes of his early return to India as well as his affection for them and a desire to be able to visit them again. We trust the Government of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan will not refuse to pay a certain amount of consideration to the earnest desire of Indian Mussalmans that in future the Ottoman Consul-Generals would be men of the character and attainments of Khalil Khalid Bey, who so worthily represented a great and distinguished race during his all too short tenure of office, and gave us a glimpse of the great men who now preside over the destinies of the Ottoman Empire. Khalil Khalid Bey visited some of the friends he had made in the course of his short tour in Northern India before leaving for Turkey, and was once more at Rampur and Delhi. He was fascinated by the hospitality and charm of manner of His Highness and spoke in terms of great affection of his friends in Rampur and in this great city, and regretted greatly that he could not go to any of the numerous places whence he was receiving such pressing invitations after having handed over the charge of his office. At Delhi he met some Mussalmans at our office and spent the whole of a long and warm afternoon in free and friendly intercourse with them, after having shaken hands with thousands of Mussalmans in the Jami' Musjid who wished him bon voyage and parted with him with a heavy heart. We wish Khalil Khalid Bey a prosperous career full of great usefulness for Islam and the Ottoman Empire, and—really we wish him back among us.

It was not so long ago that the vague and undefined quality, which, according to some, can mean everything, and according to others, means nothing, but which is known to all by the name of "Prestige," was in danger because lessees of theatres were putting up bills and placards declaring that "Maud Allan is Coming!" The world awaited the result in great suspense, but eventually the defenders of Prestige proved to be more fortunate than they had anticipated and we announced some weeks ago the welcome news that Prestige was saved. Those who assail it, however, are a persistent lot of people and seem to be determined to shatter it to bits. We trust in this case we shall not be accused of being alarmists when we merely act on the maxim, "Prevention is better than Cure," and warn the defenders of Prestige of a possible night attack not altogether unlike Miss Maud Allan's which caused so much confusion. We hear a Mr. Walter Stephens is about to launch upon England a Cinema film production of "Paradise Lost." The Lord Chamberlain has been squared and his scruples have been overcome. "The Licence is granted," says Mr. Stephens, "on the guarantee that the costume of Adam and Eve before the Fall shall be such as no one can take exception to." We wonder whether the Bishop of Kensington has also been squared, for the Lord Chamberlain is a slippery official who is at times on the side of Mademoiselle Gaby Delys and the Proprietors of the "Palace" and at other times altogether "on the side of the angels." Be that as it may, we are told that Mr. Stephens readily gave the assurance as to the costume of Adam and Eve, and an English contemporary suggests that the "readiness" is obvious, because "no one can take objection to that which does not exist." Among the list of non-existences it naturally includes the costume of Adam and Eve before the Fall. Of that then happy couple it is written that they knew not they were naked. Clothes, it has been said, are a symbol of our lost innocence, and some pure-minded, art-loving souls would have us believe that their absence is a symbol of its restoration. Now we do not know to which side Mr. Stephens inclines, and whether he is a stickler for historical accuracy in the matter of costume, or is going to anticipate the discovery of the fig leaf. But we know this, that if Mr. Stephens' Adam and Eve before the Fall come out to India in the costume that tradition has assigned to them—as sooner or later everyone and everything from England comes out—Prestige would undoubtedly receive a severe blow. How would it look in the eyes of the "Natives"—we hope we are not encroaching on the copy-right of the expert draftsmen of the Legislative Department in using this word—yes, how would it look in the eyes of the "Natives" if the first parents of the defenders of Prestige are seen wandering in Eden attired according to the fashion-plates of the time in their native innocence? Would not that add to the "Indian Peril" of the Times creation? We trust the Police Commissioner of Bombay would expostulate with Adam and Eve about their unseemly costume, or rather absence of it, which would not only be an offence against public decency but wholly destructive of that which is higher than public decency, and even public morality, namely, Prestige. We do not ignore the fact that some people are of opinion that Adam and Eve are common to the whole human race, including coloured people. But whether the Lady Clara Vere de Vere of to-day and her suitor, presumably a Syndicalist leader, have both realized or not that it is certain that the removal of class distinctions cannot remove colour distinctions. If Adam and Eve had any "colour" and Eden was a tropical garden, then Prestige would rather discard them and go over from "the side of the angels" to the side of Darwin. "Common ancestors," indeed! This theory has been exploded long ago by the biological researchists of the Prestige School, and if Mr. Stephens, or, at least, the Police Commissioner of Bombay, doesn't look out and adapt "Paradise Lost" to Prestige, we shall have both Prestige and "Paradise Lost":

"The gardiner Adam and his wife

On the 18th of March last the Hon. the Home Member introduced a Bill further to amend the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure designed to punish certain kinds of contempt of Court, which according to him, were either not covered by the existing provisions of the Indian law or about which the existing law was doubtful. The Statement of Objects and Reasons declares that "when the Penal Code became law in 1860, conditions in India were such that its framers were in a position to disregard that class of contempt which is known to English law as scandalizing the Courts. But subsequent developments have demonstrated the necessity of affording greater protection to the Courts against attempts to lower their prestige and of checking the practice, which has manifested itself to a serious extent in recent years, of commenting on cases pending before the Courts in a manner which constitutes a "serious menace to the dispassionate administration of public justice." We shall deal with the proposed legislation in a subsequent issue, but would like to state here that the proposed Section 228B makes it punishable with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months the publication of (a) a false or misleading report of a judicial proceeding during its pendency or of any stage thereof, and (b) any comments relating to such proceeding or regarding the presiding officer, the parties, witnesses, assessors, jurors, or pleaders concerned in such proceeding, knowing or having reason to believe that the comments may cause or tend to cause prejudice in the public mind in regard to such proceeding, or prejudice or tend to prejudice the trial thereof. We do not know whether any Indian journalist would care to publish the report of such proceedings before a subordinate Magistrate—a variety not rare in Northern India—even though this section is provided with an explanation to the effect that "a true, full and fair report of a judicial proceeding or any stage thereof does not constitute an offence under this section." It is just this class of judicial officer whose conduct of a judicial proceeding needs a true, full and fair report, and yet he must be a venturesome man who would undertake to publish such a report with the prospect of six months imprisonment before him inspite of all the explanations in the world. But we wonder whether such a section, if passed into law, would be enforced against Anglo-Indian newspapers also, or would be confined in its operation to Indian newspapers only, as in the case of the Press Act, against which the Pioneer offended so flagrantly the other day but was allowed to go scotfree. An hon. member of the U. P. Council who had asked a question, drawing the attention of the Government to the matter, was given the laconic, stereotyped answer that "the answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative and the answer to the second part of the question is in the negative." We ask this question because we know that although the provocation for the proposed Bill was admittedly supplied by an Indian contemporary, it is some of our Anglo-Indian contemporaries that are the worst sinners in the matter.

In our issue of the 14th March last we had quoted at some length from the Pioneer which had commented six weeks earlier with enthusiastic admiration upon the Police Parade at Calcutta for rewarding those who, according to our sinless contemporary,

Trial by
"The Times."

"had been instrumental in the capture of the murderer of Inspector Nripendra Nath Ghose." As perhaps every body knows by now, the jury returned on the 11th March a unanimous verdict of not guilty on the two charges of murder of Inspector Nripendra Nath Ghose and Ananta Teli on which a verdict of acquittal was recorded by the High Court of Calcutta. We were waiting to see what the London prototype of our Allahabad Oracle would say on the subject, and we did not wait in vain. In its issue of 9th March it published under its favourite headline, "Political Crime in India," a column letter from its well-known Bombay correspondent, himself the editor of an Anglo Indian daily, in the course of which he wrote that, "in this case Roy was arrested with a smoking revolver in his possession and the bullets extracted from the murdered man fit the pistol. He is reported since to have made a full confession of the crime." How far this is a true, full and fair report of the facts of the case every one who has read the proceedings in the first trial before the High Court can judge for himself. But that is not all. The Times hangs on this peg a leading article on the subject of "The Anarchists of India," dealing with the political situation in the country to which we shall refer later. But writing on the subject of the capture of the accused Nirmal Kanto Roy, the Times says: "The assassin of Inspector Ghose was captured after a long chase through winding streets and lanes. Our correspondent attaches importance to the fact that the murderer was eventually seized by townspeople." Again it refers to a "gathering at which the captors of Inspector Ghose's murderer were rewarded." Now a verdict of not guilty on the charge of murdering Inspector Ghose was recorded by the High Court of Calcutta two days after this statement was published by the Times, and the Statesman wrote on the 13th that the acquittal "convicts the police of one of the most remarkable blunders to be found even in their records of failures. . . . The real assassin escaped under the eyes of the police who were rewarded for having caught him. It is deplorable that such an exhibition of police incompetence should have been rewarded as a display of valour." But the Times has already tried Nirmal Kanto Roy and pronounced on him the verdict of guilty of the murder of Inspector Ghose. We ask, can there be a grosser example of contempt of Court than this? Indian newspapers guilty of such conduct may possibly plead that no law exists in the country against the publication of such statements and it is well known that Sir Reginald Craddock is characteristically filling up one more gap between the law of England and of India. But can the Times offer the same plea of ignorance in the face of the time-honoured law of England? Well may we read to the tremendous Times the sermon which was recently preached to us from the text of a distinguished Lord Chancellor, that "nothing is more incumbent upon Courts of Justice than to preserve their proceedings from being misrepresented, nor is there anything of more pernicious consequence than to pre-judice the minds of the public against persons concerned in cases before the case is finally heard." We trust the Times would remember these wise words and—not do it again.

As we had announced in our issue of the 11th March, Mr. Justice Stephen had ordered a re-trial of Nirmal Kanto Roy, the accused in the case of Inspector Ghose's murder, on minor charges on which the jury had differed. Mr. Justice Stephen presided over the Session trial once more. The counsel for the accused pleaded autrefois acquit, but the judge had the jury empanelled and promised to pronounce judgment later. The accused then pleaded "Already acquitted, not guilty." When the jury was being empanelled, the defence challenged two Bengali and six European jurors, while the Crown challenged eight Bengali jurors. Eventually the jury that was empanelled consisted of three Europeans and six Indians. The jury in the previous trial was also similarly composed. On the last occasion the difference among jurymen on the minor charges on which a re-trial has now taken place was in the ratio of 5 : 4. It was not indicated whether 5 were for the verdict of "Guilty" or 4; but this time 7 were for "Not Guilty" and 2 for "Guilty." Evidently either 2 or 3 more jurors now believed in the innocence of the accused. Although we know the composition of the jury on both occasions, it is not possible to know how many Indians and how many Europeans were on each side; but it is clear that at least one or two Indians must have considered the accused "Guilty" in the former trial and at least one European must have considered him "Not Guilty" in the re-trial. We state these facts with a view to show that neither verdict accords with the racial proportion in the composition of the jury. Possibly the Pioneer and the Times may be impressed by the fact that at least one European is convinced of the innocence of the accused on whom they had pronounced the verdict of "Guilty." But our chief desire is to dissuade Sir J. D. Rees from condemning the jury system as he has been doing, regardless of the fact that "a man," if not also "a brother," has been fighting for life and liberty at the every moment when he has been prejudicing the case of the accused by not controlling even for a time his bureaucratic dislike of trial by jury. If the system needed any defence, Sir J. D. Rees has provided it in ample measure. If civilians, of whom we presume he is regarded, or at least regards himself, not only a champion but also the best type, cannot respect the decencies of judicial proceedings in the interests of which the Hon. the Home Member would like to send our poor journalists to prison for six months, and must needs prejudice the case of the accused by their comments, then indeed it is extremely necessary to protect the accused from judges of the same class by retaining, and even extending, the system of trial by jury. In this connection we may reproduce with advantage the opening remarks of Mr. Norton's address to the jury in the retrial and of Mr. Justice Stephen in his summing up. The Pioneer's report of Mr. Norton's remarks is as follows:—

"This man standing here to-day in the shadow of a great private misfortune, the death of his father, has been called upon twice within fourteen days to fight for his life before two separate juries. In the course of these two trials he has found himself oppressed by circumstances which do not usually attend a trial on a charge of murder. In the first place, he is being tried before the learned judge who already tried him before a separate jury and who on that occasion summed up against him. He stands before you to-day with this farther object in his pathway, that at the inception of this trial he saw a resolute attempt made to take off every Indian juror from the jury. He saw the Crown expend the whole of its eight challenges upon an attempt to deprive him of that to which I submit, in law as well as by every standard of morality, he was entitled, namely, to be tried by a large proportion of his own fellow countrymen. He further found himself oppressed by the system to which the Government at an early stage of this case had recourse. Although I do not for one moment suggest they intended it, a very serious danger was interposed between him and relief, by recourse to an event which, whether intended or not, might have had, I venture to submit you will agree with me, a very disastrous result on the opinion of those who are called upon to perform the duties of jurors. He had seen in the public Press even before he was first tried a second oppression of Government, by disseminating throughout the length and breadth of the land articles which ought never to have been written under the circumstances. He was subjected as soon as acquitted to interrogatories in the House of Commons based on an imperfect knowledge of the facts. These are some of the circumstances which he regards with dismay, which may tell against him in his last effort to relieve himself of the charges brought against him. Dismayed but not disheartened by all these circumstances, he now turns to that last and ultimate tribunal to which he can look for relief, namely, the trial by nine jurors of his fellow-citizens. I believe and trust I may not in vain stand before you, and that whatever the circumstances under which he himself stands before you, you will endeavour to shake off that attack of pure passion and pure prejudice, and endeavour to come to a conclusion in the trial by consideration of the facts, and merely facts which have been sworn to on oath in the course of the case." We now turn to the remarks of Mr. Justice Stephen at the commencement of his summing up. The Statesman's report of them is as follows:—"I have always felt it to be a humiliating position to sit here and see my countrymen challenged off a jury because they are my countrymen. I should very much dislike, and I think I should have very much the same feeling for rather different reasons, if I saw an Indian being challenged off the jury because he is an Indian. But, Gentlemen, I would gladly see all peremptory challenges abolished. If there is an objection to a juror let it be stated. Since I came into this court I have always thought that our method of peremptory challenges is an unfortunate one and I should like to see it abolished. I cannot believe that the bulk of my countrymen are not competent to try a case fairly, and I entirely refuse to believe that Indians are unwilling to convict when a conviction ought to take place. I have therefore always felt distressed on hearing challenges on behalf of a defence when those challenges seemed to be directed to keeping men of one nationality off the jury. But if these challenges are made it seems to me that challenges from the Crown have this result, namely, that one set of challenges may cancel out the other, and a jury be chosen, as, to my mind, it should be chosen, purely and entirely by lot. But, after all, Gentlemen, if there are to be challenges I think it is not unfair that challenges should come from both sides. In this case, however, if my recollection is right, the challenging of the Indians was not confined to the prosecution. However, Gentlemen, I am sure I have no desire to find any kind of fault with the result arrived at in this case." Now we do not wish to say anything about the case itself, for the judge has merely directed that the accused be taken back to jail, and it is yet possible that a third trial may take place. Nor do we wish to offer any opinion about the system of peremptory challenges. But Sir Harry Stephen's observations regarding Englishmen and Indians as jurors, which are certainly entitled to more weight than the irresponsible tattle of Sir J. D. Rees, is an excellent corrective of what Mr. Norton called "that attack of pure passion and pure prejudice." Although the new Bill about Contempt of Court is not yet law, the High Courts at least can even now haul those over the coals who are guilty of contempt. We suppose an M. P. can plead "privilege," and Sir J. D. Rees talking nonsense in London is beyond the jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court. But most people would wish that at least in this case things had been otherwise.

Our friend the Times is extremely sick that its recent series of articles upon "The Indian Peril" have been, to use its own phraseology, derided even in Anglo-Indian journals. This is indeed the unkindest cut of all, and well may the Times exclaim: "Et tu, Brute!" Its Indian prototype, the Pioneer, pooh-poohed the Peril in its most supercilious vein, and although the murder of Inspector Ghose on the 19th January provided an excellent opportunity for the Times' Bombay correspondent to justify its creation of the "Peril," that unkind gentleman ignored this obvious fact even in so belated a report, and began to squeeze some hope for the future of India out of "the pluck shown by certain townspeople and police officers in effecting the arrest of the accused at considerable personal risk," and out of what he calls the "more significant still" and "apparently well authenticated story that a body of Bengali ladies on their way to the bathing ghat solemnly cursed the assassin." And last but not least is the highly disconcerting quotation from the Statesman which the Times' Bombay correspondent approvingly incorporated in his letter. It runs thus: "In reality, however, there seems to be no connexion between the Anarchist organization and any known form of political agitation. At present the educated classes have no acute grievance. There are no signs of any bitterness of feeling against the Government."

Bengal appears to be more peaceful or apathetic at this moment than it has been for many years past. It is hard to see how by any ingenuity the latest Anarchist outrage can be treated as a symptom or outcome of political unrest, or even of seditious propaganda of the type with which we have been long familiar. The only reasonable theory by which recent political murders and dacoities can be explained is that Anarchism has now become a special branch of crime like Thuggee. In view of this incontrovertible interpretation of the present situation it is particularly unfortunate that the Times should have tried to justify its creation of the "Indian Peril" by referring to the attempt on the life of His Excellency the Viceroy fifteen months ago. The Delhi Sedition Case is at present sub judice, and no one can tell its final result. But it is clear that not one of the many accused is a person that had taken a prominent part in the public life of India or as an important newspaper or public platform critic of Government. And yet did not the Times' articles attempt to involve those who publicly criticise the actions of the officials and the measures of the Government, and in fact the educated classes generally, in their sinister and sweeping condemnation? We, however, admire the Times' tenacity when it says that it is not likely to be deterred by the derision which its "Indian Peril" has excited. Certainly Goldsmith's Schoolmaster in the Deserted Village was a worthy person, and no one need prevent the Times from imitating him.

On the 14th of March last the Senate of the Cambridge University was to have been called upon to decide what Cambridge and a Government Grant. Professor William Ridgeway, writing to the Times from Cambridge calls "a vital question of principle." It seems that the Medical Department of the University, being in need of financial support, is likely to secure the annual grant of £4,600 from the Board of Education. Dealing with the letters of Professor Ridgeway and another writer published in its columns, the Times says: "This is no doubt a sum which few who are concerned with the efficiency of the medical teaching at Cambridge would care, if it could be had for the asking, to forego. Nevertheless the proposal has aroused no small opposition among the principal residents of the University; and the Senate, which is mainly composed of non-residents, may well be asked to pause before it commits itself to a resolution, beneficial no doubt to the study of medicine, but of uncertain value, if not of positive risk, to the University itself." It seems that Sir T. C. Allbutt took the responsibility of applying to the Education Department without consulting the University, and to the objection that "the University cannot accept Government money without Government control," Sir T. C. Allbutt and his colleagues offer the reply that "the Board of Education have explicitly denied that they have, or would claim, the power to decide or discuss the character of the scientific instruction given, or interfere with any internal affair." To this Professor Ridgeway replies by reminding the readers of the Times that "the present authorities at the Board of Education cannot bind their successors, and at any time a complete change of policy with vexatious inspection and other serious encroachments on our freedom might be made by new officials." He also quotes the opinion expressed by Professor Sir J. J. Thomson that "it was most desirable that there should be some educational authority in this country free from the Board of Education, and free to work out its own schemes in its own way without interference from outside." Professor Ridgeway adds that "Government money may be purchased at too dear a price, if it changes the whole character of the University, cramps her intellectual freedom and alienates her sons." This then is the view of some responsible educationists at Cambridge about State aid and State control. But what is still more noteworthy is the support which the Times gives to this view. It says: "In our view their objections form a substantial, if not a conclusive, argument for the rejection of the proposal. . . . Without further consideration we are inclined to think that the University would be unwise to commit itself to the acceptance of State aid. Government money must in the long run mean some measure of Government control; and it is by no means certain that Government control of one or of either of our ancient Universities is as yet to be desired. Cambridge, and Oxford also, occupy a peculiar position among our Universities and in our scheme of national education. If they do not always find it easy to command at a moment's notice the money which they may happen to need, they have, what, we imagine, no other universities in the world have, to draw upon the goodwill and the voluntary liberality of a large body of influential and wealthy graduates. Both are constantly in receipt of legacies and gifts, and, if necessary, of subscription, from their old members and from the friends of their old members. . . . Debt creates obligation, and the acceptance of the State's bounty means a corresponding surrender of independence—a forfeiture which is none the less a forfeiture even if no actual State interference may in practice follow. The present proposal, if it is carried at Cambridge, will be the thin end of the wedge, and the power of the wedge, where it has once found a purchase, is, as experience proves, nearly always irresistible." We refrain from offering any comment; but we cannot help thinking that the controversy provides sufficient food for thought for educationists much nearer home than Cambridge. It will not be possible to discover in India, an exact parallel of any institution in England. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that English experience is sought only too often to assist us in the settlement of Indian questions, and there is more than one institution in India which has much to gain by the experience of the two ancient English Universities which are only too often sought to be copied slavishly in India. We deprecate slavish imitation; but we also deprecate the absence of a desire to profit by the experience of others.

Dr. A. H. FYZEE, M. R. C. S., L. R. O. P., who was the Assistant Director of the All-India Medical Mission and did such excellent work in Turkey, sends to us a letter in which he pays a well-deserved tribute to the efforts of Prince Hamidullah

The Aligarh Cricket.

Khan, Captain of the Aligarh Cricket team, to revive the Aligarh cricket. Dr. Fyzeo is himself a keen sportsman and athlete and a fine tennis player. He writes:—"As one who has followed Aligarh sports with more than ordinary interest, it has been a great joy to me to note that the Aligarh cricket is in a state of regeneration. In the old days the names of the brothers Siddique and Mahmud, of Shaukat and Amin, of Abdul Wahab, Mughni and Abul Hassan were those to conjure with. With the advent of Ahsan and Ali Hassan many of us thought that the brilliant days of Aligarh cricket were about to return. Although these hopes were realised, Aligarh cricket was at a very low ebb soon after. But now again our hopes are reviving. Prince Hamidullah Khan of Bhopal is at the helm of the affairs, and the very fact that through him the services of Mr. Fairservice of Kent have been secured shows how earnest he is that Aligarh should regain her old supremacy in India. There is no doubt Aligarh has done extremely well this year. Out of 14 matches played 12 have been won and 2 drawn—truly a magnificent record. It augurs very well for the future. In the quadrangular matches in Bombay, where undoubtedly the best cricket in India is played, Aligarh has been very poorly represented. In the first year in which the quadrangular contest was held in 1912, only 2 Aligarhians were included i.e., Said and Salimuddin. The first named was only taken after some discussion and difficulty in the final match i.e., Mohamedans v. Parsees. There is no doubt he thoroughly justified his selection, for he batted and fielded extremely well, and was a very useful man for his side. Last year no Aligarhians were included. It was the opinion of a great many that the Committee, which selected the Mohamedan team, was very partial to the Bombay cricketers. It is possible there may have been some truth in the allegation. At the same time, it must be said for the Selection Committee, that they only judge by the form shown by the Aligarhians on the Bombay wicket before the quadrangular contest. Here the Aligarhians rather disappointed the members of the Selection Committee, and this accounted for their absence in the selected team. It would not be uninteresting to review what some of the Mohamedans who played last year in the quadrangular contest in Bombay have performed lately. Playing for the Maharaja of Nattore's Team in Calcutta, Yusuf Beg of Poona, Abdul Aziz and Nazir Hussein of Delhi have done wonders with the bat and the ball. Yusuf Beg is considered by many competent authorities to be the best bat in India. Aziz is blossoming out into a first class all-rounder, and Nazir Hussein is another all-rounder very hard to beat. These three men, together with some Aligarh boys, and men from Bombay and Northern India i.e., Cashmere, Indore, and Patna etc., will make an almost invincible Mohamedan team. What I should like to impress on all well-wishers of the game is that there should be no feud in our own camp, and that all should work in harmony with one object in view i.e., the supremacy of the Mohamedan cricket. Now coming to Football and Hockey, it has been very pleasing to me to see the form shown by both the Football and Hockey teams from Aligarh which visited Bombay about 3 years back. The Hockey Team ought to have easily carried off the Aga Khan Cup, but on account of some mishaps, and misfortunes they failed to attain that object. I well remember the brilliant form shown by Asad Ali and Nuruddin. The latter's death must have been a great loss to the team." Writing about the lawn tennis Dr. Fyzeo says:—"It has always been a wonder to me why Aligarh has not produced any famous players. Of course there have been some very good players, but their fame has only existed in the Inter-collegiate world. None has gone, to the best of my knowledge, further than that. None has carried, say, the Championship of the Punjab, or the All-India Lawn Tennis Championship of Allahabad or the Championship of Bengal. What I should like to suggest is that the best and second best pairs should enter a series of first class tournaments, like the Championship of Bengal, the Punjab, Sindh and Bombay. They would only then get the experience which is so necessary to a first class player. I should also much desire to see Prince Hamidullah Khan, the popular skipper, bringing down a first rate Aligarh team during the next cricket season of Bombay, just to give us a taste of the palmy days of Aligarh cricket. In conclusion, I should like to congratulate Prince Hamidullah very heartily for the splendid result he has attained this year. I am sure, his career will be watched by all sportsmen all over India with great interest. I am certain I am echoing the sentiments of all the Mohamedans of India when I wish him every success." We heartily echo what Dr. Fyzeo says, but we hope Aligarh cricketers will not go on a strike, like the Lahore Medical College students, if we said we sometimes wish Prince Hamidullah Khan's team got a sound beating once in a way as a trial of their patience and sporting spirit, and chiefly to set a keener edge on their desire never to be overcome. Adversity is the lot of the poor and would do a Prince a lot of good! Cheer up, and never say die.

The Comrade.

Ulster and the Army.

WHEN some months ago Lord Crewe, when Sir Edward Carson called "a somewhat inaudible Minister," drew attention to the effect which the tactics of the Unionists' Party in England and the preparations made by Orangemen in Ulster were likely to have in India, his lordship was not preaching from the text that virtue is its own reward and the kindred doctrine that vice is its own retribution. Obviously the idea of consequences was then uppermost in his mind, and although such sermons are not very lofty, they are sure to appeal to minds not fully attuned to ethics but alive to the practical considerations of profit and loss. The kind of tactics which the Unionists were adopting in England were bad in themselves, and the preparations which were being made by the Orangemen in Ulster appeared to the layman at least as illegal, and were therefore deserving of Liberal condemnation. But the fear underlying the question "What would they think of it in our Indian Dependency?" was common to Unionists and Home Rulers, and therefore Lord Crewe's criticism was calculated to cause some flutter in Unionists' circles. At any rate, it was not ignored, and even the Times attempted a clumsy rejoinder by saying that if the Bengalis vowed to die rather than permit their severance from Great Britain that would be an occasion for rejoicing rather than uneasiness. That is a kind of argument one always expected from the Times when in a tight corner, and may be passed over; but the fact remains that Indians receive no great access of virtue from the tactics pursued by their "Imperial" mentors. We should be really sorry if our fellow-countrymen regarded such conduct as ideal, but we are happy to be able to testify that the only effect of a close observation of "constitutionalism" as practised by the Unionists' Party has been to amuse the Indians and make them regard their mentors as endowed with the usual amount of hypocrisy and human nature. More recently things began to take a more serious turn when the question of the Army versus Parliament became acute in the course of the Ulster controversy, but we felt sure that commonsense would come to the rescue even of the "Constitutional Party," and as things are once more settling down we have no fear of any injurious reaction in India if we elucidate the points raised last week over the attitude of the Army in Ulster.

The first disquieting news that came to India through Renter was that the tension in Ulster was growing and the authorities were taking precautions. Large bodies of armed police had left Dublin and special magistrates for Ulster had been sworn in Dublin Castle. It was reported that a detachment of the 1st Norfolks had arrived at Carrickfergus and that sentries with fixed bayonets were posted day and night at the Castle armory, while the guards at barracks at Enniskillen and Armagh had been doubled and civilians prevented from entering. Although the police were declared to have sent no orders to follow the movements of the leading Unionists, they were said to be watching the various Ulster battalions. Guards at the military barracks throughout Ulster where stores were kept were doubled. According to various reports from the crowd of correspondents at Belfast the Government had already taken measures such as the summoning of naval reservists to be in readiness and the issuing of orders with the object of the military occupation of Belfast. Troops were arriving in Ulster from the south, while two warships were stationed in Dublin Bay. Two destroyers had landed 150 troops at Carrickfergus. A gunboat had arrived at Bangor and a destroyer at Kingstown. It was also announced that the artillery had been ordered to proceed to Ulster, and that all reservists had been instructed to be in readiness instantly to join the colours. Instruction had also been given that the ordnance storemen in Ulster were to be searched as they left work. A detachment of 110 men of the Yorkshire Regiment had gone on board the warships in Dublin Bay and sailed for an unknown destination. Subsequently the destroyer had anchored in the Bay. One hundred and fifty men of the Royal Engineers from Carragh were reported to have arrived at Dublin and proceeded to Hollywood Barracks, and other drafts were expected. Three thousand regulars and two field batteries were said to have already arrived in Ulster. Rumour went even so far as the statement, made at Aldershot, that the South Western Railway had been ordered to have trains in readiness to move 10,000 troops to Glasgow and other ports whence they could be transported to Ireland. The officials of the Railway, however, said they knew nothing about such an order. Nevertheless, the papers were full of the details of the military movements towards Ulster, which, according to the Conservative papers, indicated that the Government were in panic, but which the Liberal papers declared to be the outcome of a well considered plan on the instructions of the Army Council prepared sometime ago.

The Orangemen were no less active, and forty motor-cyclist volunteers had left Belfast under secret orders. The city was intensely excited. A picked reserve force of volunteers was called out one night when rumours were renewed that 28 warrants for arrest had been issued, though Sir Edward Carson's name was not on the list. Eight hundred volunteers had mobilised in Belfast and guarded the residences of the Unionist leaders. Not to be entirely outstripped by Orangemen, the Nationalist at Derry had also called a muster on which they insisted in spite of Mr. Redmond's deportations. A prolonged Ulsterite conference was in progress at Belfast while the military authorities were conferring at Dublin. One need not be surprised after this at learning that nervousness prevailed and caused depression on the Stock Exchange.

Then came a somewhat different announcement when it was officially declared in Belfast that the special train ordered to convey the troops from Carragh to Belfast was subsequently cancelled, no reason being given. This was followed by the news that a number of officers in the south had written to friends in Belfast that they would resign if they were ordered to Ulster. A telegram from Carragh was even more explicit and reported that the removal of the mounted troops has been cancelled owing to the resignation of the officers. The War Office denied a report that it had issued an ultimatum to the officers in Ireland to serve or resign, and further stated that it had no information of wholesale resignations. But it was also reported that the Executive of the War Office had been working day and night for some time, which was in itself somewhat ominous. The whole thing became clear, however, when it was reported that General Sir Arthur Paget, in command of the troops in Ireland, had arrived at Carragh and that "negotiations" were proceeding between the officers who had resigned and the Army authorities.

After this telegram came down as thick as autumn leaves in Vallambrosa, all showing how "loyal"—at least in the sense in which we are required to be in India—was the Army to the Government in Great Britain. We had already heard that at various places in Ulster the troops were greeted with enthusiastic demonstrations on the part of the Unionists and that a detachment of Ulster volunteers stood at the salute as the Dorsets passed. Even then it was reported that many troops had returned the compliment; but the Pall Mall published a telegram from Belfast which showed that the compliment was more than returned by the troops. It stated that, when two companies of the Dorsets were paraded and notified that they were being transferred to quarters near the volunteer manœuvring ground, the men hurled their rifles on the barrack square and the sergeant saluted and exclaimed, "We will have no Home Rule here!" If this is true there is nothing surprising in the touching spectacle of detachments of the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers and the Bedfordshire Regiment and the Ulster volunteers attending church at Armagh together, many sharing prayer books and all exchanging salutes when they marched off. Bluejackets were also reported to be fraternising with Ulster volunteers, and under the circumstances it was indeed the height of discipline that, addressing the 2nd Manchester Regiment at Carragh camp, Major-General Sir C. Fergusson said that his and the men's sympathies were with Ulster, and that he hoped that they would not be compelled to take up arms against her, though if they were ordered there they would loyally obey.

We got out of the Irish bog of vague rumours and were on the firmer ground of more precise statements, if not of facts, when the Morning Post declared on Saturday the 21st March that all the officers of the 3rd Cavalry Brigade resigned and that Colonel Seely's Secretary, questioned on the subject, replied that the War Office had received similar rumours. The Daily Mail supported this statement and stated that on the receipt of the rumours Mr. Asquith, Mr. Churchill and Colonel Seely conferred with the War Office staff on the 21st, and subsequently Mr. Churchill summoned Admiral Prince Louis of Battenberg, the First Naval Lord, to the Admiralty. Later it was reported that a number of officers at Aldershot had also resigned. The Conservative papers continued to publish alarmist reports. They asserted that the Dorsets, who were reported to have mutinied, were being kept prisoners in barracks; but, Renter added, this was probably an exaggeration of the fact that all troops in Ulster were for the moment confined to barracks. The Observer was more explicit and asserted that Sir Arthur Paget had visited the Carragh on Friday, the 20th March, and had given General Gough two hours to decide whether he would take command in Ulster or resign and that General Gough resigned immediately.

Subsequently more details were received and it was learnt that on March 20th the War Office had requested all officers who were not prepared for active service in Ulster to send in their papers, and that in twelve hours seventy out of seventy-five officers, including Brigadier General Gough, had done so. As a result of a War Office conference on the night of Friday, the 20th March, General Sir Arthur Paget had conferred on the following day with the senior officers who had resigned and had intimated that the War Office was willing to accept the resignation of Brigadier-General Gough and Major Kearsely, but not of the others, who, if they disobeyed orders, would be liable to be court-martialed. It was stated that these two officers declined the special treatment offered, and said they would stand or fall with their brother officers. General Sir Arthur Paget had then intimated that the movement of troops was at present only for the protection of the Government property and for the assistance of the police in maintaining order, and it was stated that in view of this assurance the officers eventually agreed to go to Ulster, but definitely stated that they would not participate in hostilities against the so-called Loyalists who were preparing to resist Home Rule if enacted into law by the King in Parliament. This extremely "loyal" decision was telegraphed to Whitehall, after which General Gough and two other officers were reported to have been summoned to London where they visited the War Office on Sunday, the 22nd March. It was also reported that a number of officers had left the Curragh on special leave, and that their resignations had not been accepted, because, if they had been, the officers would have been free to join the Ulster volunteers. Evidently the spirit shown by the officers of the Third Cavalry Brigade was contagious, for it was reported that many resignations had also been tendered in the Infantry and the Artillery Brigades at Dublin, the Curragh, Newbridge and Kildare, though up to that time all infantry and artillery ordered north had gone without demur. General Gough's brother Brigadier-General John Gough, of the Aldershot Command, had also resigned, and it was reported that a number of other officers at Aldershot were in readiness to resign if they were ordered to Ireland.

The Observer, while publishing the news of General Gough's choice, had exhorted all officers to resign, declaring that they would be supported by the Unionists. This promise was fulfilled to this extent, at least that, Sir Marcus Samuel offered £10,000 to start a fund in aid of the families of officers who were resigning. The temper of the Party of "law and order" which has so repeatedly clamoured for "Martial Law and no Damn Nonsense" in India, can be judged from the tone of its papers, which were jubilant over what they described as the Government's abject climb-down from coercive demonstration in Ireland to humiliating explanations in the House of Commons because the instrument which they had thought to use had broken in their hands. The Conservative Press acclaimed General Gough as the man of the hour and paid tribute to the band of officers who, they said, had saved the country from disaster. The Morning Post urged the House of Lords to amend the Army Annual Act to prevent the Army from being used in Ulster. According to Belfast papers, the Danganon volunteers had wired to the 16th Lancers congratulating them on their firm stand, which, according to them, had prevented the "loyal" minority of their countrymen from being wiped out.

Let us now hear how the Liberals regarded the whole affair. The Liberal papers, while proclaiming the failure of the Tory attempt to split the Army, declared that the limit of patience had been reached. The Daily News said if the Army was to be used as a Tory institution to coerce the House of Commons, "we shall democratize it as we democratized Parliament." Military conspirators against Parliament should, in its view, be broken mercilessly and never co-admitted to the Army. The Daily Chronicle, commenting in a similar strain, said it would have been more agreeable to the Liberals if the officers had been sent about their business. The Government had delayed too long in dealing with indiscipline.

As regards General Gough's return to duty, while the Daily Chronicle averred that he had rejoined unconditionally, the Daily News appeared to be ignorant of this and said it was most important to know on what conditions General Gough had returned. The Times, however, declared, that General Gough had received a written assurance from the Government that the troops would not be used to coerce Ulster. The Daily Mail said that General Gough had telegraphed to the 16th Lancers that all the officers would be reinstated without loss of prestige, while the Morning Post said that high officers in the War Office and throughout the Army had threatened to resign if General Gough and his comrades were penalized and that Staff resignations were still probable. When General Gough and Colonel MacEwen returned to the Curragh they had an enthusiastic reception, the troops escorting them to their quarters. On that occasion General Gough announced that troops would not be asked to go to Ulster or, if they were, they would not be asked to carry arms.

We have reproduced the reports cabled to this country as faithfully as possible so that our readers may get a connected account of the preparations made by Government to meet the Ulster crisis, the activity of Ulster volunteers, the commotion in the country and the sensational outburst of the officers of the Third Cavalry Brigade following on the fraternizing of the troops with the volunteers and the reported mutiny of the Dorsets. We have also given a narrative of the Gough incident as cabled to India by instalments and the opinions of the newspapers of the two Parties and their surmises as regards the terms on which General Gough rejoined. But it did not seem clear from the newspaper reports cabled to India whether General Gough had returned to duty unconditionally or on the receipt of some assurances, nor indeed was the narrative free from a certain amount of mystery as to the origin of the Gough incident. For this we have to piece together the telegrams sent by Reuter as regards the various explanations offered by the Government, and we must say it is an extremely difficult task, though we cannot say whether the difficulty is due to the summarizing of Reuter or to the halting and disjointed character of the Government's explanations.

It appears that some months ago when the Government were considering the question of a possible disturbance of the peace in Ulster on the passage of the Home Rule Bill, Colonel Seely, the Secretary of State for War, had an interview on the 12th of December last with General Officers Commanding, in the course of which he made a statement to them with reference to the duty of soldiers in the event of disorders in Ulster. Attempts had been made to dissuade the troops from obeying lawful orders when supporting the civil power; so Colonel Seely, while explaining the law on the subject, informed the Generals that he would hold each of them responsible for seeing that there was no conduct subversive of discipline and warned that such conduct would be dealt with forthwith under the King's Regulations. Now that the Government were making preparations in Ulster for all eventualities, it seems that General Sir Arthur Paget Commanding the troops in Ireland, had occasion to make a statement with regard to them on the 20th March, and in reference to this verbal communication from the War Office through Sir Arthur Paget, General Gough asked for a clear definition of the terms "duty as ordered" and "active operations." Mr. Bonar Law in the House of Commons is said to have read a statement from General Sir Arthur Paget to officers that active operations were to commence against Ulster and that the country would be ablaze by Saturday. Mr. Asquith in replying to Mr. Bonar Law referred to Colonel Seely's interview with the Generals last December, and added that they were assured that officers domiciled in Ulster would be exempted. He said that the War Office gave General Sir Arthur Paget no instructions concerning the conquering of Ulster, and that the only instructions sent to him were those of the previous week for the movements of troops which was purely a protective one. Under the circumstances we do not know what instructions Sir Arthur Paget gave to the officers, and it is not possible to say whether Sir Arthur Paget interpreted the Government's instructions incorrectly or that, as the Conservative papers declare, he has been made a scapegoat. It, however, appears that General Gough, while asking for a clear definition of the terms "duty as ordered" and "active operations," said that if "duty" consisted of the preservation of property and the maintenance of order, all officers in the Brigade would carry out their duty, but that if it involved initiation of active military operations against Ulster, "the following officers respectfully and under protest" preferred to be dismissed. General Gough is then said to have detailed the names of sixty officers of his Brigade. It is stated that Sir Arthur Paget reported to the War Office at midnight on March 23rd that the Brigadier and 57 officers of the Cavalry preferred to accept dismissal if they were ordered north. Further it is stated that Colonel Seely replied immediately authorising General Paget to suspend any senior officer who resigned or otherwise disputed his authority, ordering General Gough and others to report themselves at the War Office forthwith and directing that they be relieved of their commands. He is also alleged to have stated that officers were being sent to replace them and that the resignations of all officers should be refused. This statement is in violent conflict with another, according to which General Gough wrote on the 23rd March asking the Adjutant-General on behalf of his officers whether in the event of Home Rule becoming law they could be called upon to enforce it upon Ulster, and that the reply was sent the same day authorising General Gough to inform the officers that the Army Council was satisfied that the incident connected with the resignations was due to a misunderstanding, Government having had no intention whatever of taking advantage of the right to use the troops to support the civil power in maintaining law and order for the object of crushing political opposition to the policy and principles of Home Rule.

We do not know how to reconcile these two statements, unless we presume that the midnight report to the War Office was sent not on March 23rd, but on March 20th, specially as General Gough and other officers are reported to have visited the War Office in response to the summons on Sunday March 22nd, and the Times of the 23rd published that the attitude of the Government towards the resignations of officers was that they were due to honest misunderstanding and that there would be no penalisation. Thus, the question about enforcing Home Rule arose on the Friday the 20th March when Brigadier General Gough and the officers of the Third Cavalry Brigade offered to resign rather initiate active military co-operations. The War Office was informed of it the same night and was reported to have been very firm in its reply which was despatched immediately. On Saturday, the 21st March, there was another interview between Sir Arthur Paget and the officers, who evidently stood their ground, and on the receipt of this information were summoned by the War Office to London. On Sunday the 22nd March, they visited the War Office, and it was after this that the Government discovered the "honest misunderstanding" to which the Times referred on Monday, the 28th March. On that a conference was held at the War Office between Col. Seely and Sir Arthur Paget, and Brigadier General Gough and the Irish officers and several Aldershot officers were also called to the War Office. A full Cabinet meeting was held after this conference and Mr. Asquith was able to confirm in the House of Commons the same evening what the Times had published about the "honest misunderstanding" in the morning. Thus the crisis of the officers' resignations with reference to the question whether the Army could be forced to coerce Ulster was averted, but it was averted only at the cost of a still greater crisis with reference to the question whether the Army could ask for and obtain assurances from Government about the manner in which it would be employed by the Civil power. With this, the more important question, we shall deal in our next issue, and bring out the facts of the case and the views of the two political Parties in England.

Hindu-Muslim Entente.

It was some time ago that we noted with extreme pleasure the announcement that the Hon. Sir James Meston was willing to co-operate heartily if the Hindus and the Mussalmans of unfortunately the most disunited Province, misnamed "the United Provinces," met together in a conference for the purpose of discussing the Hindu-Muslim problem and invited His Honour to preside. Those were the days when we expected the millennium to be effectively ushered in during His Honour's quinquennium. Since then much water has flowed by the Sangam, and the millennium appears at least as distant as ever. To none has recent experience tasted more like gall and wormwood than to ourselves, but it is not always possible to shatter the world into little bits and remould it after the heart's desire. We have, therefore, refrained from grumbling, and are quite content to pursue the same policy. But in public affairs only those can sit smiling like Patience on a monument that feel public misfortunes less poignantly than their own trivial worries. If, therefore, we turn our attention to the affairs of the United Provinces, which is perhaps dearer to us than any other part of this sub-continent, it is because it would pain us at least as much as any other person in the world to see the two great communities inhabiting the province drifting away still more from each other.

We are not so wedded to the doctrine of laissez-faire in government that the least inclination on the part of the Administration to participate in the affairs of the people would appear to us to be the indication of some deep-laid plot against them. But it does seem to us somewhat odd that when no responsible representatives of the Hindus and the Mohammedans have called together a conference such as His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor suggested, and no one to our knowledge has invited Sir James Meston to preside. His Honour should go out of his way and himself call together such a conference under his own chairmanship. Surely he cannot be unaware of the suspicions to which publicity has already been given by some vernacular papers which have since been punished for it under the Press Act. In the face of these circumstances, it is an extremely courageous act to take the initiative in such a matter. But if Sir James Meston is determined to show to the world the utter baselessness of such suspicions, by himself doing that which he had at first suggested to others, and which they have hitherto failed to do, and is confident of bringing the Hindus and the Mussalmans closer to each other than they have been in the past, then we must say he has done the right thing, and whosoever admires courage, determination and self-reliance would feel great respect and genuine admiration for the bold policy of Sir James Meston. As this is the most favourable interpretation upon His Honour's action, we readily accept it, and it would be extremely unfair to him if by any comment of ours we prejudiced the conference which Sir James has called. In fact we pine for the result and care not who achieves it and how. The enterprise is admittedly a difficult one, and if Sir James Meston carries it to a successful issue, no one will offer him a heartier tribute of praise and gratitude than ourselves.

But we hope we may be permitted to say this much, that although His Honour has included in the list of those invited to this conference practically every true representative of the Hindu community, his selection of the Mussalmans is one that does not augur well for the success of the conference. From the very first we have suggested to His Honour that he has placed wrong values on leading Mussalmans and has sought advice only from those that are prone to receive advice and accept advice without the least demur, and we are sorry to see that even after considerable experience in recent days Sir James Meston leans heavily on the old broken reed. We have learnt, though we cannot vouch for its accuracy, that the following gentlemen will represent the Mussalmans. The Hon. the Raja Saheb of Mahmudabad, the Hon. the Raja Saheb of Jehangirabad, the Hon. the Raja Saheb of Pirpur, the Hon. Shaikh Shahid Hossain, the Hon. Mr. Abdur Raof, the Hon. Khwaja Ghulam-us-Saqlain, Nawab Mehdi Hossain of Lucknow, Nawab Abdul Majid, C. I. E., Maulana Syed Karamat Hossain, Nawab Ishaq Khan, Nawab Ismail Khan and Mr. Hamid Ali Khan. These gentlemen have to confer with Mr. Bishan Narain Dar, the Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, the Hon. Pandit Sunder Lal, the Hon. Pandit Moti Lal Nehru, the Hon. Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, the Hon. Mr. Ganga Pershad Varma and some others. Without exaggerating the ability of these Hindu gentlemen, we can say that the Mohammedan gentlemen invited to confer with them are not likely to do justice to the community to which they belong in any discussion of rights and responsibilities. Most of them belong to the class beloved of the officials and known as the "natural leaders of the people." On the other hand, the Hindu gentlemen are not the "natural," but the real, leaders of their community.

Passing to the omissions, nobody can fail to miss the name of the Hon. Syed Riza Ali, the only elected Mussalman member of the Council who is not invited. Without suggesting that no other elected member truly represents his community, we may say without fear of contradiction—except from the uninformed or the perverse—that the Hon. Syed Riza Ali represents a very considerable body of Muslim opinion, and by dint of sheer ability has established for himself both in his profession and in public affairs a position second to none among the elected members of the U.P. Council. What is more, he can be trusted to be independent in the expression of his opinions, and it is difficult to assign any reason for his omission which does not support the popular belief that Sir James Meston is not an admirer of his bold advocacy of the claims of his community. No less remarkable is the omission of the name of Mr. Syed Wazir Hasan, who is the chief executive officer of the All-India Muslim League, which, according to the recent Deputation to the Viceroy, "has ever since its establishment continued to be the true representative organisation of Indian Mussalmans." Now we fail to see what the Muslim League and its Secretary have done to merit this neglect. If it is the ideal of self-government suitable for India, then why has Sir James been so remarkably affectionate towards the National Congress Committee in Allahabad where the ideal of Colonial self-government was evolved even earlier? Does His Honour think that self-government suited to India is more inconsistent with the British connection than Colonial self-government, or that Mr. Wazir Hasan is less friendly to the English, say, than Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya or Mr. Varma? Mr. Wazir Hasan has taken a prominent part in advocating a Hindu-Muslim entente, and, in fact, this is his chief crime in the eyes of a certain type of officials. To leave him out of such a conference requires an explanation other than the plea of inadvertence. Again, we miss the name of Mr. Syed Nabiullah, the President of an annual session of the All-India Muslim League. We do not find the name of Sir-izaz-Adab Ahmed Khan in the list, though we have since learnt that he is likely to be asked. Mr. Alay Nabl is the President of the Provincial Muslim League, and we do not understand on what grounds he has been excluded. Can it be that our latest and youngest King-Maker, the very masterful Secretary of the Provincial League, refrained from nominating him?

The Hon. the Raja Saheb of Mahmudabad is no doubt there, and he is the solitary member in whom the majority of the Muslim community could put implicit faith. But his inclusion has not even the doubtful virtue of consistency, and we wonder whether he would be able to accomplish anything in the company of such strange bad-fellows as Dame Fortune has provided for him. We do not know whether this goodly dozen of the "natural leaders" of the Mussalmans would be able to get any section of the Mussalmans to abide by their decision except that which, like them, has the great quality of abiding by the decisions of every officer of the Government. It was superfluous to invite them to this conference when the decision of the Government itself would have proved equally efficacious with the action of Ja-hoolians in the Muslim community.

We do not know what procedure the conference would follow, but all the Hindus and the Mussalmans alike await the result of its deliberations. What we fear is that the conference would not be able to influence the attitude of any Mussalman towards the Hindus, and if it proves abortive, it may be advertised as another indication of the hopelessness of unity between the two communities and of the absolute necessity of an impartial European arbitrator with the fullest powers to prevent breaches of peace and "to hold the balance even." But this is by no means the worst of our fears. An abortive conference may possibly strain the relations of the two communities still further and may well take rank with the Ajudhya and Agra troubles of last year. Abol. omes.

Indians and South Africa

(By ASIATICUS)

THE partial truce which has been declared between the Indians in South Africa and the Union Government affords an opportunity for examining certain aspects of the Indian immigration question which are too often disregarded. In this matter the first duty of the onlooker in Great Britain, who stands outside the range of the dispute, is not to take sides. There has been too much taking of sides. The Indian leaders in Natal are men of high principles and honest purpose, but their tactics have not always been discreet. The march of the passive resisters to the Transvaal frontier was a device which can perhaps be excused, since it was peaceably conducted, and was chiefly meant to draw swift attention to a situation which to the Indians seemed intolerable. When two thousand Indians allowed themselves to be arrested by forty policemen, clearly they were not out for mischief. But the refusal of the Indian leaders to appear and give evidence before the Commission of Enquiry was a mistake, as even Mr. Gokhale seems guardedly to have acknowledged. They, be it remembered, were the accusers; and Sir Richard Solomon pointed out at the first sitting that though the Commission had asked for specific allegations, none had been received. Mr. Gandhi and his followers took exception to two members of the Commission, on the ground that they were prejudiced. They therefore declined to attend the enquiry. There was some talk of an oath to which they had subscribed; but considering how important it is for them to make a good impression upon English public opinion, they would have been wiser had they smothered their objections and given their testimony.

Another phase of the trouble which had unfortunate results was the undoubtedly exaggerated telegrams which were sent to India about the alleged treatment of Indians in Natal. There is no question now that many of the statements made could not be substantiated. Some of them have been carefully investigated by competent tribunals, whose fairness cannot be challenged. There have been cases of ill-treatment, but the inflammatory stories which roused India to burning wrath were largely without foundation. Yet the mischief has been done. The allegations telegraphed to India have obtained wide currency, and are generally credited despite official denials. They have brought into the ranks of the agitation in India large numbers of moderate men who usually keep aloof from politics, and many violent speeches have been made which had better have been left unsaid. It is not suggested here that there was no justification for the widespread indignation manifested in India. What is urged is that it was based upon exaggerations, and that it was excessive and in some respects unreasonable in expression.

There is one other point which must be noted in order to clear the ground. An outburst of feeling which found its chief—and most moderate—interpreter in the Viceroy, who was echoed by men of all classes and creeds, must necessarily be received with respect. But the great weakness of the recent agitation in India is that it is extraordinarily belated. The grievances of Indians in South Africa are no new things. Mr. Gandhi, to his credit be it said, was expounding them twenty years ago. Sir Francis Younghusband, in a letter to the Times, has described how in 1896 he spent an evening with Mr. Gandhi and his friends at Durban, at a time when Natal volunteers were trying to prevent the landing of Indians. The men in India who are loudest to-day in denouncing the attitude of the Union Government were in public life in 1896, and knew all about the South African problem. They were repeatedly asked to take it up, but remained practically silent. The National Congress gave no earnest aid to Mr. Gandhi in those days. The only effective help he was able to obtain in India was from the Government of India and the Anglo-Indian Press. When he wanted a spokesman to plead the cause of his followers, he had to turn, not to Mr. Gokhale and Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and the rest, but to Sir Muncherjee Bhownagroe, the sworn foe of the Congress, who year in and year out laboured strenuously, but largely in vain, to awaken public opinion in England and in India to a consciousness of the disabilities of Indians in South Africa.

Why was it that Mr. Gandhi was left for so many years in the wilderness, while the Congress leaders, who are now so vehement, turned a deaf ear to his appeal? The reason was that the Congress was looking for reforms in India, which they hoped to receive from English Radicals; and the leaders had conceived a hazy and possibly quite wrong-headed idea that if they pressed the South African question too much they might embarrass their own cause. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain was worrying President Kruger a good deal about the position of Indians in the Transvaal. The Congress thought it discreet not to back up too prominently so ardent an Imperialist. I have had the curiosity to search the addresses of Presidents of the Congress from the very first meeting in 1885. Not one of them made the faintest allusion to the South African question in their Presidential addresses until 1902, when Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee referred to it. The only other occasion, until recently, when the grievances were mentioned, was in the address of Sir Henry Cotton in 1904. It is true that from 1894 onward the Congress in most years passed a perfunctory resolution on the subject. It was usually carried without discussion, and sometimes it was merely embedded in the "omnibus" resolution with which the assembly is wont to wipe out miscellaneous questions about which nobody cares.

In 1904 I ventured to make an appeal to the Congress leaders—one of many such—to take up the cause of the Indians in South Africa. Upon that occasion I wrote:

If the Congress had been really practical, if it had desired—and known how—to make its voice ring throughout the Empire, it would long ere this have held great meetings in every city in India to protest against the treatment of Indians in South Africa. Here is alive, an important, a really burning question, which affects the rights of India. What has the Congress done to make the views of the people of India heard in this connection? Practically nothing. Not a single public meeting has been specially held with regard to this controversy. And if one was called, how many would attend? The only serviceable champion the Indians in South Africa have found is Sir Muncherjee Bhownagroe.

To that and other appeals there was absolutely no response, and it was another seven or eight years before the leaders of the Congress, or any public men in India, began to take an interest in the South African issue. Yet the poll tax of £3, of which so much is now heard, dates, I believe, from the seventies; President Kruger inflicted his registration tax in 1885; and the "Natal Act" was passed in 1897. My point is this. No one questions the sincerity and force of public feeling on this matter in India to-day; but the speakers who are now loudest in their denunciations of the Union Government must not complain if onlookers say that, however sincere, they have waited overlong. They are no doubt eager now to redress the wrongs of their compatriots, but it would also seem that they are not reluctant, at a critical stage in Indian history, to deepen the prejudices against British rule. The motives of some among them, in short, are not wholly single-minded, and the thought should serve to chasten their unbridled utterances. All that is sound in what they are now saying ought to have been said by them at least ten years ago.

I turn to the larger question, to the issue which far transcends in importance the precise grievances of Indians in South Africa, to the feeling which has brought thousands of moderate and loyal Indians into line in this agitation. Behind the South African grievances lies the whole complex problem of the future status of Indians in the British Empire. It is a problem which will tax to the utmost the resources of British statesmanship; but it must be solved some day if we are to preserve our rule in India. We have talked far too long of holding India with the sword. In the last resort we must still do so; but 75,000 white troops will not for ever control 315,000,000 of people without their full and free consent. The task which still confronts English statesmen is that of persuading the people of India to be willing citizens of the British Empire. We have to convince them that they will be better and safer and happier and more prosperous if they remain within the Empire than if they turn their energies to schemes for passing outside it. Only by arousing India to a consciousness of the advantages of the British connection, and to a realisation of the dangers which will beset the country if it drifts apart, can we hope to maintain our administration in the stormy days which assuredly lie ahead. But what does British citizenship mean for Indians? The question is being asked by many thoughtful Indians to-day, and no very satisfactory answer is forthcoming. The Englishman, the white dweller in the Dominions, can pass at will throughout the Empire, certain of protection and free movement. The Indian who leaves his own country finds almost impassable barriers erected against him in the self-governing Dominions. He is a British subject, he may be sober, industrious, loyal, a clean and honest liver; but his rights of British citizenship will not carry him into South Africa, or Canada, or Australia. Not unnaturally he asks how he can be expected to cling to the British Crown, or to fight for the British Empire, when he is treated as unworthy of admittance to many of its most favoured lands.

Lord Morley said once that if we would understand the Indian peoples aright, we must try to get into their skins. Let me quote words recently uttered by Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla, an extremely able and loyal Mohomedan who has worked for many years as an unofficial member of various administrative bodies. He is a man of calm judgment and moderate views, and in the following passage he expresses the attitude of most intelligent Indians to-day.

The wider question can no longer be postponed but must now be faced, and that question is, "What is the position of the people of India in the British Empire?" Australia is practically barred against us. Canada is contemplating legislation to prohibit Asiatic immigration. The attitude of South Africa is patent to you. The time is therefore ripe to ask whether we are common subjects of his Imperial Majesty the King, occupying identically the same position as the other subjects of his Majesty, or are we so in theory only? Under the gracious Proclamation of Queen Victoria, confirmed by the Royal Proclamations of Queen Victoria's two successors, pledges have been given to us in an unequivocal manner that we are citizens of the Empire. In practice, however, we find that in South Africa, in Canada, and in Australia we are regarded in a manner which it is difficult to express in moderate terms. We have therefore every right to ask the British Cabinet, through the Secretary of State, for a declaration whether they will manage to secure to us the rights and privileges of British citizenship.

If the answer to the question is in the affirmative, England has got to exercise the power which legally vests in her to ensure to us such rights and privileges. If we are not, in spite of Royal pronouncements and Royal pledges, to receive the rights of British citizenship, if we are prohibited from settling in the British Colonies on equal terms with the white races, we are entitled to a clear and definite declaration on the point. It is necessary that we should clearly understand what our position actually is in the British Empire. If we are not entitled, in spite of the pledges already referred to, to equal rights of British citizenship, if that right on the declared authority of the British Cabinet is to be denied to us, then we shall be free to organise means and measures to protect ourselves against this indignity. Retaliation is a bad word, but it has been freely used in this connection, and I do not think any one would venture to assert that the use of the word is uncalled for....

We will have to consider and devise means which, while being perfectly constitutional, may prove really effective. The intellectual capacity of the Indians is not so meagre as to despair of finding such an effective remedy, but the time for such measures has yet to come. We have thankfully to remember that the Indian officials are supporting our cause and that many Englishmen in South Africa appear to be in our favour. A majority of the powerful English Press is sufficiently outspoken. We have therefore to wait for the final result of the present contretemps before concerting and pressing effective measures in this behalf. There is no Indian who does not regret the necessity of being obliged to start a war of retaliation against component parts of the mighty British Empire, but the fault entirely lies with the British Cabinet. If the British Cabinet is absolutely powerless to secure the rights of British citizenship to the Indian subjects of the Crown, the whole responsibility of the consequences which such a policy will lead to will be on their heads. I need hardly tell them that the result of such a course from the Imperial standpoint will be deplorable.

There is the issue from the Indian point of view packed small; and when the controversy grows more acute, as it is bound to do, it is to be hoped that responsible statesmen in the Dominions will realise that the Indian point of view cannot be ignored in England. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtula's too expansive conception of the powers and responsibilities of English Ministers need not be examined. The thing to remember is that if the problem is not some day solved, our position in India may be imperilled. It is not merely the problem of settling the exact conditions upon which Indians may obtain access to the Dominions. It is far more a problem of finding some form of settlement which will make them content with their status as British citizens. At present they are not content; the grievances of their countrymen breed hostility; and we cannot afford to permit the development of further hostility to our rule if remedies exist. The retention of India, and of a contented India, is essential to the well-being of the Empire as a whole. The sea-borne trade of India is the largest within the Empire, save only that of the United Kingdom. India sends far more food and raw material to this country than any of the Dominions. She purchases far more British produce and manufactures than any of the Dominions, and her needs make her the mainstay of the cotton mills of Lancashire. The permanent estrangement of the people of India, with its consequent results upon trade, would mean the infliction of a vital blow upon our national prosperity. Moreover, it is estimated that £350,000,000 of British capital is in various ways invested in India. The problem, looked at in this way, cuts deep. It ceases to be a matter of taxes and licences in South Africa, and becomes an issue fraught with the most momentous meaning. The Dominions should not ignore these aspects of the question, for they in their turn are deeply concerned. The welfare of the Empire means the welfare of all its component and interdependent parts.

On the other hand, Indians such as Mr. Gokhale and Sir Ibrahim Rahimtula, who really speak for their countrymen, may be counselled to remember certain considerations which are not very visible in their speeches. The fact is that, not only for Indians, but for all subjects of the Crown, there is often a very great difference between the theory of British citizenship and the practice of its rights. I have said that the Englishman can pass at will throughout the Empire, but in practice that is not really the case. Canada, for instance, occasionally rejects British immigrants on various grounds, the chief ones being poverty and physical incapacity. Australia can exercise somewhat similar powers. We need not go outside India to discover that States controlling their own affairs by no means maintain an open door. The protected States of India are under the suzerainty of the British Crown, but they possess, and frequently exercise, the right to exclude not only Englishmen, but even British Indians, from their territories. The laws which prevent Englishmen from acquiring land in various protected States of India are sometimes regarded as a considerable grievance. Most great communities in the world, both within and outside the British Empire, now claim and employ the right to scrutinise strangers and if necessary to refuse entry within their borders.

One meets with curious examples when travelling. In Canada, I think at Moose Jaw, I was once called upon to pay a poll tax of many dollars before being permitted to cross into the United States. The reason was that, although a European, I happened to have entered the American Continent from the Far East.

Indians must exercise patience in regard to the larger claims they base upon their status as British citizens. They are perfectly justified in pressing, within reasonable bounds, for some amelioration of the lot of their countrymen who have been already admitted to the self-governing Dominions. Happily in South Africa there now seems some prospect of an amicable settlement of Indian grievances, the rights and wrongs of which I shall not further discuss here. The larger plea for freedom to move and to live anywhere in the Empire is another matter. The time is not ripe for its consideration; probably it will never be ripe; and it may be added that at present there seems no sufficient reason why it should ever ripen. The disabilities of Indians in South Africa and Canada are things apart, which should be dealt with in a conciliatory way. The claim for free movement for all is not now a substantial grievance, and never has been. Enormous though the population of India is, there is room enough for all, and to spare, within the confines of the Indian Empire. India is not over-populated, but the population requires redistribution in certain areas; and it is also necessary to detach a larger proportion from the land and induce them to follow industrial pursuits. If Natal planters require Indian hands, so do employers of labour in India, who are constantly complaining of the difficulty they find in getting men. Far from desiring to emigrate, the bulk of the Indian peoples still shrink with dismay from the prospect of crossing the Black Water. India has not sent of her best to South Africa and Canada. The Sikh, in particular, seems to degenerate in the atmosphere of British Columbia. For these and other reasons, it may be held that the claim of the spokesmen of India for a more ample and practical definition of their rights of citizenship—if any—in the Dominions has no conspicuous urgency. It may well await the time when India is in a more advanced state of development, and when the Dominions have grown to greater maturity.

There remains, however, one duty which is now incumbent upon the Dominions. They should make access to their territories easier for Indians of good standing who are simply travellers, and have no desire to settle overseas. Two of the greatest of Indian princes have in turn told me that they would very much like to visit Australia, but are reluctant to do so because they fear they might experience unpleasant difficulties. One prince whose name is a household word in India actually arranged to visit Australia some years ago, but refrained because he was informed from the highest quarters in the Commonwealth that he might have a disagreeable reception. In these cases I was afterwards the means of conveying an official assurance that the apprehensions expressed were unfounded, as I fully believe they were. Mr. Gokhale has testified to the friendly welcome given him in South Africa. Yet such incidents as I have noted ought never to have occurred, and accredited Indians of position should be permitted to travel in the Dominions with as much freedom as Englishmen. The concession of better facilities to them would go a long way to ease the present strain.—National Review.

Honours.

Lord Selborne's Motion.

London, Feb. 23.

THE Earl of Selborne rose to move the following resolution:—

That a contribution to party funds should not be a consideration to a Minister when he recommends any name for an honour to his Majesty: that effectual measures should be taken in order to assure the nation that Governments, from whatever political party they are drawn, will act according to this rule; and that this House requests the concurrence of the House of Commons in the foregoing resolution.

Before I pass to the subject-matter of the motion (he said) I desire to make some preliminary observations. The Crown is the fount of all honour in this country, but the Crown bestows honours in two different ways. Sometimes the Sovereign acts on his own motion, and at other times he acts on the advice of his Ministers. Nothing I am going to say to-day refers to those honours which the Crown gives of its own grace. I refer only to those which it bestows on the advice of his Ministers. Again, I must make a distinction in that case. There is a certain class of honours, perhaps the most important class, in respect of the gift of which I have never heard a word of adverse criticism. I mean those honours which are conferred on the Civil Service and on the Navy and Army. Those are always given for meritorious public service or very brilliant public service, and nothing I am going to say to-day refers to that class of honours, though I must confess I fear that, unless the present tendency receives a salutary check, the day will come when someone will offer to buy a Victoria Cross. I shall only treat of those honours which are given to the public at large on the advice of Ministers, and I shall mainly refer to those which are known as political honours.

There is a prevalent belief—I do not think I should be guilty of exaggeration if I were to say a very widely prevalent belief—that persons are often recommended for these honours whom no one would have thought of so recommending if they had not contributed largely to party funds. (Hear, hear.) That prevalent belief takes three forms. I know, not only from the Press, but from a very voluminous correspondence on this subject, it is believed that persons who have social ambitions, or whose wives have social ambitions, who have really no claim at all to receive an honour, believe that they can purchase it if they go to the right place. Again, the belief takes this form, that there have been cases where social ambition has never entered into the soul of the individual, a rich man, but where he has been tempted and where an honour has actually been hawked to him on condition that he would make this contribution. The third case is of rather a different kind, but of a very grave kind. It is the case of men who have really done public service, whom public opinion would be very content to see honoured, and who have had pressure—I would almost say brutal pressure—put upon them to make a contribution to party funds that they did not wish, and in some cases could not afford to make. If it were necessary I could quote sheaves of cuttings from the public Press to prove the prevalence of this belief and from newspapers covering the whole field of political opinion. And, further, every playgoer knows that this matter of the sale of honours is now openly scoffed at in the theatre, and it is even flung across the floor of the House of Commons as a taunt from one member to another.

THE EVIL AND THE PRESTIGE OF THE CROWN.

I may say at once that this prevalent belief applies to both political parties. Both the great political parties have held office, the evil is a growth of our party system, and both political parties are responsible for it. I think, therefore, your lordships will see at once the point of view from which I am asking the House to consider this question. I will begin with a confession. If you ask me to prove, in a Court of law, one single case, I could not do it, though I have been the recipient of many confidences. Still, though I could not prove a single case, I am not ashamed to say that I believe that there are grounds for the prevalence of this belief. Moreover, I fear the evil is growing and that it will continue to grow unless it is checked by public opinion. I will first of all ask, "Is it an evil?" Certain of the most cynical amongst my friends shrug their shoulders and say it is not an evil and that it is prudery or pedantry to make a fuss about it. But I should not have brought the matter before the House if I did not believe it was an evil.

I think it is an evil with many sides to it, but the two on which I wish to lay stress are the injurious effect of this belief on the prestige of the Crown and on the lowering of the standard of public morality. (Cheers.) This is not the occasion to talk about loyalty, but, altogether apart from that, is it not true that thinking men of all parties are feeling more and more the great value of a Constitutional Monarchy as a public institution? (Hear, hear.) As we regard the working of other forms of government in other countries, I think we more and more congratulate ourselves that we possess a Constitutional Monarchy, and those who believe, as I do, that the Empire is a great force and an increasing power for human happiness and for the peace of the world, value the Monarchy because we know that under no other system whatever could the Empire be held together. Therefore, any influence which affects the prestige of the Monarchy, of the Crown, must be a great public evil. Is it possible that this belief that honours which proceed from the Crown can be acquired by wealth, by whomsoever sold or howsoever got, can be prevalent and the prestige of the Crown not be affected? We know that in this case, if the evil exists, as I believe it does, the fount is wholly undefiled, and that the source of pollution is elsewhere.

THE HALL-MARK OF HONOUR.

What about public morality? Surely it does matter whether the hall-mark of honour is to be genius or noble life or position or public service, or whether the hall-mark of honour is to be simply wealth by whomsoever owned and however begotten. Therefore, I say that it does affect the standard of public morality, because if the Crown selects men of genius and noble life and of great public service and honour it must be a support to the standard of public duty throughout the nation; whereas, if the opposite is the case and honours are just as easily or more easily acquired by those who fulfill none of these qualifications, but have simply bought them—then, I say, the standard of public duty and the service which flows from a sense of duty are dangerously impaired. Consider, if you believe as I do that the system of honours properly used is a good system and a valuable institution in the State, must it not be true that the value of honours will in time be fatally impaired if they can be bought? What possible object can a man of genius have in accepting an honour which a man who is not only not a man of genius, but who has no qualifications except wealth, shares equally with himself? There are those, of course, who think there should be no honours. There are countries in which in theory there are no titular distinctions, but I notice that in practice distinctions exist, and I am prepared to argue that honours properly bestowed are a real incentive to public service, social and national, and that they are in accordance with the good sense and the reason of most men. Surley it is a good thing when the King fixes on the self-sacrifice of some miner or railwayman or seaman or soldier and marks him publicly in the eyes of the whole nation, and I think any sensible man feels satisfaction and personal gratification when the King confers an honour on such a man as the noble viscount opposite (Lord Morley) or the noble earl on the cross-benches, or when he crowns the career of a man like Mr. Burt by making him a Privy Councillor. I think it is quite reasonable that honours should be conferred on men of genius or of noble life or of position, or who have performed valuable public service, or who represented families or houses that have done so, provided always that the private lives of these men have been clean and honourable. My conception of public service is, I admit at once, a very wide one, and I think it ought to be very wide. In public service I include service to the State whether Imperial, Parliamentary, or municipal, and, of course, I include party service. Some people think that party service ought not to be included. But what would be the consequence? Under our system a very large number of our most valuable public servants always have been and always will be party men. Then, of course, I include eminence in commerce and manufacture, eminence in art, including, of course, the stage, in literature, including, of course, journalism, in science, and public benevolence and munificence, I do not mean for a moment that this list is exhaustive, but it is a very wide one.

The scandal, the grievous scandal, as I submit it to be, one which public opinion ought to kill, is that a man whom no one would otherwise think of recommending for an honour is able to buy it just as he would a picture.

ANOTHER ASPECT OF THE QUESTION.

Just as there are those who say there ought not to be honours, there are those who say there ought not to be party funds. That is a very big question, and a very serious question. I notice that the Nation calls this question of party funds the Achilles heel of the Liberal Party. I think the simile rather strained. I should have thought the militarism of Achilles would make him an unsuitable prototype of the Liberal Party. The simile of the Nation brought another one to my mind. Would it not be true to say that this greed of all political parties for money with which to run the party machinery is the clay foot of Democracy? (Cheers.) Just think how this question is mixed up with all we call popular movements. They cannot be worked by either party without money, and no party can do without money and without titles.

Look at the last instance, the Lund Campaign, of which the Government have appointed Mr. George as manager. That campaign consists in speeches and organization, for both of which Mr. George is responsible. But in making his speeches a duke is just as indispensable to Mr. George as a mother-in-law is to the editor of a comic paper. (Laughter.) I hope noble dukes in this House will forgive me when I say that they and Mr. George are becoming bores. The point is, that just as fictitious proceedings attributed to dukes are the basis of Mr. George's speeches, so the actual contributions of those who want to be dukes are the basis of his organization. (Laughter.) I am very glad the noble marquess (the Marquess of Lincolnshire) has come into the House, because he is the patron saint of this organization. There was an inquiry, perfunctory and illusory, it is true, but it must have been very costly, and now this programme is being preached all over the country by means of an immense organization. Am I to be told that his organization is financed by the mites of Liberal widows, or by a kind of Peter's pence of the Liberal Party; or perhaps I should say St. Paul's pence, because a noble lord opposite told us the other day that the only person worthy of comparison with Mr. George was St. Paul? No one will believe that this very elaborate and costly organization is only financed by the mites of the Liberal widow. Why do the two parties want money? And they want more and more every year. It is because a very large proportion of the democracy take no interest in politics, know nothing about them, and would not take the trouble to vote unless a refusal to do so became more irksome than acquiescence in going to the poll. It is the necessity of endeavouring to educate this large part of the democracy, however superficially, and above all of having machinery which will bring the last man to the poll, however unwilling he may be, which has forced both parties to cry out more and more and more for money.

THE SECRET INFLUENCE OF WEALTH.

Think of the incongruity of the position. Just at the very moment when those who pay most taxes have least political power, and when there is a real danger lest certain forms of property should be the subject of unjust legislation—just at that very moment wealth, as mere wealth, and without responsibility, has the most opportunity of illicit and secret influence. (Cheers.) We are not the only country, that has had this experience. There is a noble lord, one of the most distinguished members of our House, who might be able to tell us that in other countries it has happened that those who have found the money for a party have eventually also dictated its policy. Who can say there is no danger that the same sordid fate will not befall us? Men will dispute to the crack of doom as to the respective merits of different forms of government, but I say without hesitation that the very worst fate that could befall a country is to be governed by an alliance of the caucus and the plutocrat. (Cheers.) Remember, the more the honours flowing from the Crown are depreciated the more influence you are throwing into the hand of what is known as the plutocracy. (Cheers.) There is a danger—noble lords opposite must know it as well as we do—lest the real residuary legatees of that influence of which you are trying to deprive the hereditary peerage should be not the people but the plutocracy.

THE PARTY WHIPS AND CHIEFS.

Now the whole of this controversy centres round the Whips and the Whips' Office. Whips are not more depraved than other people. (A laugh.) That would be a complete misapprehension. How is it that they have got into this position? They have a very weary and thankless life, and they are being subjected ever more and more to claims from sections of their party for money. Because the party machinery is ever becoming more and more elaborate, the Whip is ever being asked for more and more money, and he becomes obsessed with the idea that the only thing that matters in this world and probably in the next is that his party should remain in office. He begins to think that money is an essential condition to his party remaining in office, and in the end—well, the end justifies the means, and, however scrupulous he may be when he begins,—he ends by thinking that the party must have funds at all costs. He is very loyal to his chiefs. He tells them everything about the party except about the party funds. The party chiefs are very busy men and they are careful students of the Book of Genesis. And they avoid the tree of knowledge of good and evil. The position is really perfectly intolerable both for Whips and chiefs. I do not believe there are any men in England who would be more delighted if they could be freed from this curse of the party system than would the Whips and their chiefs. I very much doubt if they can free themselves. I doubt if this servitude imposed upon them by the party system is one that they can escape from by their own action and their own desire. I believe it is public opinion and public opinion alone that can rescue them.

A CAVEAT.

Now, I want to guard carefully against an interpretation of the views I put before you which might otherwise be made and which certainly does not represent my views. I wish to guard against the supposition that I think that men who are otherwise properly and reasonably qualified to receive an honour should become disqualified because they have also contributed to party funds. I think that would be most unreasonable and I give your lordships an instance. I have been very careful not to introduce any personal element into this discussion, and the name I am going to mention now I name with respect and as an illustration of my meaning. I will take the case of Sir John Brunner. There is a man who has done long and honourable service in the House of Commons and who is at the head of one of the greatest commercial enterprises in this country. It seems to me very reasonable that he should have been honoured by his Sovereign. If there is any party man in England it is Sir John Brunner, and although I have not the honour of being in his confidence I feel perfectly certain that he has contributed liberally to party funds. But how monstrous it would be if because he had so contributed he should have been disqualified for the honour he otherwise deserved. My meaning will be made so much plainer by that illustration that I think Sir John Brunner will pardon me for borrowing the use of his name. If you tell me that the line will be very hard to draw I quite agree, and not only so but I think many of us would differ in regard to individual cases that might be put before us. I submit that it is quite useless to attempt definitions in a case like this, and that any tendency to pedantry in the matter would defeat our object.

ROBBING OF PUBLIC OPINION.

Surely this is the whole truth—that if public opinion is vigilant and sound in itself, Ministers of all parties will conform to the standard demanded of them. If it is true that the evil has been growing under our party system, does no blame lie at the door of public opinion? I say public opinion has been extremely lax, and it is disquieting how little attention the Press has paid to it down till quite recent months. It is of all things in which the influence of the public, as voiced by the Press, may have a most salutary effect. We are accused sometimes by other nations of hypocrisy. We deplore the form of public corruption of which we have heard in other places. Is not the accusation a little true sometimes? Would it not have been better if we had attended to the beam in our own eye before we deplored the mote in the eye of other nations?

Let me tell you the object of my motion. I want to do what little I can to rouse public opinion to this evil of the sale of party honours which I believe to exist and to still greater evil—this greed of all parties for money, which as I have said is one of the great dangers ahead of democracy. I have proposed no remedy, and I have been very scrupulous in my determination not to propose any, because if I had offered a prescription for the disease discussion would have raged over the prescription and not over the disease. My desire has been to focus public opinion on the disease, and for another reason, because no rule, no regulation, no law will be of any effect whatever if public opinion is not sound. (Cheers.) If public opinion is sound and vigilant, then the remedy will be found quickly enough.

Before I sit down I should like to say for myself that I believe we have in our Constitution machinery which may be of great service in this matter as in so many others and that is the Privy Council. I believe the Privy Council may help us in this matter, and with that personal suggestion I ask your lordships to affirm this motion. (Cheers.)

Lord Charnwood's Amendment.

Lord Charnwood rose to move an amendment which stood in his name as follows:—To leave out all the words after "that" in the first line, and insert "in view of the persistent allegations implying that contributions to party funds have been a consideration to Ministers when recommending names to his Majesty for honours, this House would welcome an assurance from his Majesty's Government that such allegations are untrue, and that in view of the actual or possible abuses of party funds in regard to the manner in which they are employed as well as the manner in which they are said to be raised, this House urges upon His Majesty's Government the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire by what amendments of the Corrupt Practices Act such abuses may most effectively be restrained." He hoped their lordships would not think it unfitting that on this subject a very recently created peer should come forward at once to address the House. The noble earl had described the malign influence of which he spoke not as an invention of the present Government, but as something which had a long history behind, and which almost unconsciously had been suffered to regain force in recent years. He had also made it perfectly clear that he had absolutely no personal object. The noble earl might be well assured that he had the sympathy of as many men in the party opposite to him as he had on his own side. There were, he believed, perfectly honourable gentlemen to whom this system seemed something amusing, even picturesque, something which had a fine antiquarian flavour about it reminiscent of the 18th century. He thought, however, that was not at all the way in which the man in the street regarded these things.

The prevalence and growth of the system to which the noble lord had referred, should it proceed further, would one day become so serious a thing as to hold up the governing classes to the hatred and contempt of the poorer people. He wished to point out how subtle the influence was and how likely it was to survive the remedy which he prescribed. He did not suppose for a moment that Ministers put names before the Crown for false reasons, the real reason being that they knew that party funds would benefit. That was unthinkable. A cynical Minister would take care to be always ignorant whether the man whom he recommended had contributed to the party funds or not. But a Minister could not always, could not often, be aware of how it came about that that good man's many virtues had been so prominently brought before his own notice. Therefore it seemed to him that this resolution might be passed and every Minister who ever recommended a name for honour might be able with truth to declare that he acted on the principle of it; and nevertheless it might still be going on, that cash was paid with the prospect that honours would result, or what was scarcely less offensive that honours might be bestowed and thereafter blackmail extorted with the allegation that it was a sort of customary thing. Therefore the mere assertion of the principle of the resolution did not carry them very far. As to the existence of public opinion being the sufficient and real remedy for the evil, it would be impossible in many cases for public opinion to draw the line between proceedings which were absolutely clean and proceedings which were quite scandalous.

THE USE OF PARTY FUNDS.

His own relations to party funds were those of a beneficiary not of a benefactor. There was nothing necessarily dishonourable in the existence of large party funds, nor in the fact that rich men on both sides gave large gifts; nor if, for other reasons, those very men had honours conferred on them. And yet so long as that was admitted there would be considerable danger that secret influence would be exercised. They could not get rid of the evil in so simple a way as the resolution suggested. They would do a little good, but no great permanent good, by announcing in this resolution what after all was a moral platitude. They must be prepared for drastic measures in regard to these party funds, and cut short that lavish expenditure upon elections which was the root of the evil and which put upon party managers a really terrible strain and temptation. It might be a wise policy or it might not that the present Government had bettered the example of their predecessors in conferring recognition on many varied kinds of merit and of public service which might not have been properly recognized formerly, but it was obviously not in itself a discreditable thing.

There was one general reason why he thought they might take it as certain that the practice of which the noble Earl complained was growing and likely to grow; and it was the enormous growth of election expenditure, which went far beyond the requirements of reasonable and honest propaganda. In the South Bucks election the other day he was told that a part was taken by the Tariff Reform League, the Free Trade Union, the Ulster Unionists, the Home Rule Council, the Land Union and the Land and Housing Council. Six organizations, three on each side. The salaries and expenses paid to the agents of these organizations were, he believed, required by law to be returned as part of the election expenses of the candidates, and the treasurers of these associations were liable to criminal prosecutions if these expenses were not so returned. Would those expenses be so returned? If not, would there be any criminal prosecutions? (Hear, hear.) Why had not any criminal prosecutions taken place in the past? He could only conclude that some understanding existed between the gentlemen on either side who worked these organizations. A large and flourishing political industry was in existence, and it would be endangered if these practices were curtailed. But he put it very seriously to the Government and the leaders on either side, could they not agree to some method by which the present system could to a certain extent be broken down? Was the education of the electorate really effectively promoted by gentlemen who preached political views for hire? (Hear, hear.) While he had a high regard for some of these gentlemen, yet their ranks included some who would as readily preach on the other side as on the one. (Laughter.) This lavish expenditure on elections tended to an absolutely depraved state of things, and to put our representative government permanently in the grip of the machine. So long as election expenses went on at this lavish scale so long would party managers be under dire pressure to replenish their party war-chests per fas et nefas. (Hear, hear.) He thought there should be an inquiry and the names of subscribers to these various political organizations, with the amount of their subscriptions or donations, should be made available for inspection. If their lordships would allow him, he would move his amendment to Lord Selborne's motion in the following form, to add at the end:—"That in view of the actual or possible abuses of party funds in regard to the manner in which they are employed as well as the manner in which they are said to be raised, this House urges upon his Majesty's Government the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire by what amendments of the law and administration of the law such abuses may most effectively be restrained."

Lord Milner's Speech.

SUGGESTED REMEDIES FOR A GROWING EVIL.

Viscount Milner.—I hope Lord Ribblesdale will forgive me if I treat the subject with a slight approach to seriousness which he may condemn as solemnity. I am very sorry to appear priggish, and I really think I enjoy the noble lord's witticisms on suitable occasions as much as anybody in this House; but I cannot resist the feeling that a rather unfortunate impression would be given to the world outside if what is, after all, a grave matter should be chaffed out of Court. (Hear, hear.) I am afraid I shall be unable to add to the gaiety of nations in the few remarks I have to make, but perhaps I may contribute to some extent to reviving the impression under which a great many of us were earlier in the evening—that we are discussing a public matter of real gravity and that we have strong opinions about it. The noble lord expressed the view that he differs both from the motion and the amendment. I am rather inclined to agree with both. I agree with almost everything which fell from Lord Selborne except his concluding passage, in which he seemed to me to be prepared to rely exclusively upon public opinion to produce a remedy for what, personally, I cannot describe as otherwise than a very great and growing evil.

The Earl of Selborne.—I meant that public opinion must be awakened before any effectual steps can be taken.

Viscount Milner.—I quite agree, and perhaps the greatest advantage to be derived from a discussion of this kind in this House, if it can be kept on right lines, is that it will stimulate public opinion on the matter. There is a great and growing and serious feeling in the country as to the enormity of the sale of honours, which it is just as well that Parliament should take some pains to attract into wise channels. But though I attribute importance to the effect of discussion of this kind upon public opinion, I do not myself think that we can stop there, and I believe if we are serious in this matter in this House or in the other there will be a very strong feeling on both sides in support of my noble friend. If we are really serious in both Houses something material might be achieved. I was looking forward with some curiosity to the line which noble lords representing the Government might take especially in view of Lord Charnwood's original amendment which called upon them to give us an assurance that the allegation that a Minister might recommend a name for an honour to his Majesty on the ground of contributions to party funds was untrue. The significant change which the noble lord subsequently made in his amendment has, I fancy, relieved his leaders from a very great difficulty. They could hardly have taken no notice of his demand for such an assurance, and I think we should have listened with some surprise if that assurance had been given. The great difficulty, of course, is that it is impossible to produce absolute proof of what is described as the sale of honours. In the literal sense of the word, of course, honours are not sold, like butter or cheese. It may even be said that there is no honour, however flagrantly bestowed, which cannot often, or in fact always, be accounted for by some plausible reason besides the true one, and care is always taken to avoid suspicious juxtaposition of cause and effect. Who is to say that a gentleman of good position and standing, who happens to have contributed liberally to the party funds, and who becomes the recipient of an honour—who is to say that the Minister who recommended him was influenced wholly or mainly by gratitude for his generosity and not by other considerations?

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PREROGATIVE BESTOWED.

The only thing we know is that the tendency to bestow titles of honour on persons with no very obvious qualifications is a rapidly and alarmingly growing tendency (cheers), and that the bestowal of them has a habit of synchronizing with periods when the Government of the day is in special need of funds. As regards the number of honours, taking only the creation of peerages, we find that the present Government, in their eight years of office, have created no fewer than 63 barons, not to mention Lords of Appeal, whose case, of course, has no relevance to the matter under discussion—63 barons, or about one-sixth of the total number of barons in this House, although it has existed for more than 600 years. In the eight years preceding there were 41 creations of the same rank, which one might have thought was already a sufficiently liberal figure. It may be said that the only reason why the present Government has created the largest number of peerages and other titles of honour on record is because it is the latest comer, and that its successor may outdo it in that respect, although I sincerely hope that, owing to the efforts now being made, that will not be the case. There is another interesting point besides the number of these creations, and that is what I may call their periodicity, the cyclical movements that seem to affect them. They are rather like shooting stars. I mean to say there is a certain period in the year when we always look out for them, but a really imposing shower only occurs every two or three or four years, and only occurs in connexion with critical moments in the life of a Government. The occurrence of these great showers of honours is almost always in the year before, or the year of, or the year after a General Election; and one is almost forced to the conclusion that there is some kind of mysterious relation between the two phenomena.

THE TRAFFIC IN HONOURS.

I could not add anything to what has been said by the noble earl about the bad effect which the traffic in honours must have upon the esteem in which honours are held, and the consequent effect in destroying a powerful and respectable incentive—though I do not say it is the highest form of incentive—to good public service, and munificence for public objects. But there is an even worse consequence of this traffic, and that is that by offering to party managers the opportunity of collecting enormous secret funds it helps to rivet the yoke of party upon our public men (cheers), to undermine independence alike in candidates and in members of Parliament, and to submit Parliament and the nation to the uncontrolled and growing despotism of party machinery. It is part and parcel of the same system which has destroyed the authority of this House and is even reducing the proceedings of the other House of Parliament to a farce. The noble lord who has just spoken said truly that party funds were an inevitable concomitant of the party system. I differ from him in that I am not an admirer of the party system. But, accepting the party system as a necessary evil, I am anxious to limit some of its very worst and most discreditable features. There is nothing which is more calculated to lead to the widespread corruption of public life than the irresponsible control of large secret funds by party managers. Is there not a certain extraordinary inconsistency in the line which we at present take about bribery and corruption? You have laws against them under which a trifling transgression—a transgression which may be committed in all innocence by a man or his agent—may invalidate his election; and yet can it be said that the power of money, which all these statutes are intended to curb, that the power of money, either in an individual or a party to influence the judgment of constituencies has in any way been diminished? We all know that it has not been: on the contrary, it has been increased. The forms of bribery may be altered, but the essentials of it are there, and they are as strong and formidable as ever they were. Whether it is worse to buy a few votes at an election by giving illegitimate employment or to try to debauch a whole constituency by promising a vast expenditure of public money within its borders (Opposition cheers), or by flaunting before it some wealthy candidate who is expected to be a rich fount of future favours, I must leave to moralists to determine; the point is that the vast expenditure of money upon constituencies during election times and during the interval between elections, but especially during election times, is giving, and continues to give, an undue and unhealthy influence to mere wealth and to the possessors of it in the destinies of the nation, and that corrupting influence of party funds, in itself a thing that is undesirable and evil, is only rendered possible by this traffic in honours, which is likewise discreditable to public life.

SOME SUGGESTIONS.

I do not know that it is for me to venture to suggest any remedies for this evil. I think it really rests with members on both front benches, for both parties have something to atone for in their past conduct in this matter, to suggest remedies. But I cannot agree that nothing can be done beyond appealing—though I am all for appealing—to public opinion and trying to arouse public opinion. I agree with the noble lord who moved the amendment that it is possible, and indeed I think it is imperative, if there is any sincerity in our professions of dislike for corruption, to try and restrict expenditure at elections, and expenditure so restricted might, I think, fairly be thrown on the public funds. But that is not alone sufficient, because the wholesale bribery of constituencies is not confined to election times, but goes on between elections. It seems to me it would be idle merely to restrict expenditure at election times unless it could also be made illegal for members to spend large sums of money between elections upon various public purposes in their constituencies. Unless that is going to be done I think the unfortunate and evil need of large party funds—which has to be satisfied by these undesirable means we are discussing—will continue to exist.

STATEMENT OF REASONS.

In conclusion may I make one other suggestion? Would it be unreasonable that when honours are announced some brief statement of the reasons for which the honours are conferred should be given? (Cheers.) The thing is done, for instance, whenever money is granted to deserving individuals from the fund at the disposal of the Prime Minister—the civil List. I have constantly seen—and it appeared reasonable and satisfactory when such and such sums of public money were given to both men and women—a brief statement, perfectly honourable to them and satisfactory to the public, of the reasons why the grants were given. Why is there any objection to doing the same in the case of the bestowal of any honour whatsoever? I do not say it would altogether remedy the evil of which we are complaining—there is no single remedy, it has to be attacked in a number of ways—but it seems to me this would be a very considerable check on the abuse of the bestowal of honours, for no Ministry would wish to make themselves ridiculous by giving explanations of the honours they had asked the Sovereign to confer which were obviously ill-founded and calculated to excite general derision. (Cheers.) I do not say these are very valuable suggestions or that they are the best that might be made. I repeat that I think it rests more on the leaders of parties than upon independent members of this House to suggest a remedy. What I do hope is that the decision of the House to-night, the reception which the House gives to the motion, and, may I venture to add, the speeches to which I hope we may yet look forward from the leaders of both parties, will leave no false impression on the mind of the nation, as I think a false impression may have been left by some of the preceding speeches, but that it will go forth to the country that in this House at least the degradation of titles of honour is regarded with abhorrence and is looked upon not only—which is a very minor consideration—as an injury and insult to the order to which we have the honour to belong, but also as a fatal injury to the nation. (Cheers.)

Lord Crewe's Reply.

THE EVIL EXAGGERATED.

The Marquess of Crewe.—I agree with the noble earl who moved the motion that no question of party advantage or party feeling ought to be involved in this matter, and I think the fact has been recognized by those who have taken part in the debate. It is also true that none of us wish to adopt a priggish or Pharisaic attitude; at the same time we are certainly not disposed to minimize its gravity. Speaking for myself and my noble friends behind me, we take precisely the same view of the importance of the subject as was taken by the noble earl. I think, however, there has been a tendency to exaggerate the position as it now exists, and, as it were, to attempt to indicate that public life is becoming less pure and honourable than it was, and that, as the poet said, "We are worse than our grandfathers, and our children are likely to be worse than ourselves." As a matter of fact, any one who looks back at political history will recognize that the facts are otherwise. There is no need to go back very far. You can go back if you like only to years within the memory of those who are now alive. The whole position in relation to party expenditure and the dependence of party expenditure upon honours and distinctions and gains of all kinds was, as everybody with the most trifling knowledge of history recognizes, infinitely worse during the whole period before the Reform Bill of 1832 than it has been since. All through the 18th century the position of pocket boroughs and borough-mongering generally brought about abuses which were infinitely more flagrant in every respect than anything nowadays. It was not until 1782 that the Whig Government of that day brought in a series of Bills, some of which became Acts of Parliament, dealing with some of the grosser forms of corruption which then existed. Everybody knows that the owners of boroughs, representing something like two-thirds of the whole House of Commons, commanded votes, and those votes meant money and also meant honours. All the patronage, English, Irish, Indian, and Colonial, was practically in the hands of the people who owned the boroughs and commanded the votes. Government loans were issued in their interest at a price which meant an enormous loss to the country, and in one famous case the country was supposed to have lost a million sterling owing to the price of issue in favour of certain privileged persons. Boroughs were bought outright. There is the famous case of Lord North, who bought boroughs for a particular election, the price offered being £2,500 per seat. There were dozens and hundreds of scandals of that kind. Then Lord Milner told us about the number of peerages created of late years, implying that some of those peerages had been connected with party funds. Between 1784 and 1801 Mr. Pitt made 140 creations or promotions in the peerage, mainly English. The noble viscount would not say that a great many of those titles now honourably borne by their descendants were given on account of anything which in a strict sense could be called service to the State. There is no object in raking up stories which tell hardly upon our forbears, but it is necessary to mention these facts in order to show that when an almost portentous tone is adopted in relation to what is considered to be the corruption of to-day we ought to remember that as a matter of fact we are living in an infinitely clearer atmosphere in this respect than ever existed before the Reform Bill. I do not believe that, except possibly for the period between 1845 and 1860, when parties were all in confusion and the party system was not working as it has worked since, there has been any material change for the worse in respect of these matters which are now complained of.

AN ASSURANCE FROM THE PREMIER.

The noble earl says that "a contribution to party funds should not be a consideration to a Minister when he recommends any name for an honour to his Majesty." Lord Charnwood, in the original form of his amendment, stated "that in view of the persistent allegations implying that contributions to party funds have been a consideration to Ministers when recommending names to his Majesty for honours, this House would welcome an assurance from his Majesty's Government that such allegations are untrue." Lord Milner seemed to think that it was out of some consideration for the feelings of the party leaders that Lord Charnwood has altered his amendment. It was in no way known to me that he had done so, and the fact does not prevent me from giving so far as I am able to give a categorical assurance on behalf of the Prime Minister that a contribution to party funds has not been a consideration to him when recommending names to his Majesty for honours. I should not have the slightest hesitation, although I have had no communication with either, in giving precisely the same assurance on behalf of Lord Rosebery and Mr. Balfour (if he would allow me to do it), those being the only two gentlemen alive who have been placed in the same position. The noble lord has pointed out, what is quite true, that although we should all be desirous that contributions to party funds should not be made a consideration, yet it is altogether impossible to lay down a rule that a contribution to party funds should be a bar to the reception of any honour whatever. Instances could be multiplied on both sides of men who had received some distinction and who had undoubtedly contributed—being men of wealth—to the support of the party to which they belonged. Consequently it is only possible to suggest to those who have the power of recommendation that their minds should work in a particular way and that certain considerations should not be present.

That, of course, points to the difficulty of establishing a distinct canon or rule in a matter of this kind, and I find myself in general agreement with the noble earl when he says that the real safeguard to which we can look—in my opinion it is the only practical safeguard—is the force of public opinion being brought to bear on these things. (Cheers.) It is only, as the noble lord said, supposing a person receives a distinction for which he is obviously unfit that the question is asked. "Why has this particular gentleman been singled out for this distinction?" If the recipient is considered generally worthy no question is asked whether he has or has not contributed to the support of his party. The same thing may, I think, be said to apply to other forms of what is called the purchase of distinctions. It has always been rumoured that high distinctions of various kinds have been purchased, not by contributions to either political party, but by what may be called general munificence, gifts to hospitals, colleges, and public objects of various kinds, which according to popular talk and rumour have been made by very wealthy persons with apparently the main object of achieving some form of distinction. There again these things are impossible to prove, although I suppose in an abstract way we should all desire, that in such a case distinction should be withheld. These cases are cases of extreme difficulty, and could not be covered by any general remedy such as some noble lords have suggested.

The Earl of Selborne.—There is a distinction. In that case the nation gets the benefit, not the party.

The Marquess of Crewe.—I suppose it might be argued by party men that there is some national advantage in the party in which they believe being in power, but I am not going to agree that Lord Milner suggested that the practice which obtains in relation to the Royal bounty, by which, when donation or annuities are given to deserving people, a reason is given, might be followed. I do not know that any great service would be done by insisting on a similar rule in the conferment of honours unless you are prepared to go so far as to say that no honour should be given except for public service, independent of party, and that, I think, has not been suggested. If, on the other hand, the reason given is that the recipient has done good service to the Conservative or the Liberal Party, I do not know that public opinion would be very much more satisfied than it is at the present moment.

REASONS AGAINST A ROYAL COMMISSION.

Then I come to the suggestion made by Lord Charnwood for the appointment of a Royal Commission. His ingenious plan is to get round the difficulty not so much by inquiring into what is called the sale of honours as by having a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the Corrupt Practices Act and into the possibility of their extension in order to bring about his object in a circuitous way; that is to say, supposing you can avoid all expenditure on elections you will not then want party funds. If you do not want party funds you will not desire people to subscribe to party funds, and therefore the power of acquiring distinctions as some form of reward will fall to the ground. The doubt in my mind is this. Although there is much to be said for some possible extension of the Corrupt Practices Act, particularly in regard to those irregular bodies or societies who seem to have taken the place to some extent of the regular party organisations in conducting the business of elections and spend a great deal of money. I should have thought it possible to achieve that object directly by legislation rather than by going through all the heavy machinery of a Royal Commission. I do not know whether there should be at the same time inquiry into the operations of these various leagues and unions, because, so far as I know, there is no suggestion or implication that subscriptions or assistance to these more or less irregular bodies have been used as a lever for the purpose of acquiring distinction of any kind. Therefore, while I have no desire to offer any opposition to the noble earl's motion, I am afraid that we could not give our concurrence to the idea of the appointment of a Royal Commission. At the same time, I am far from implying that I do not think some extension of the Corrupt Practices Act might not very properly be set on foot. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Lansdowne's Views.

The Marquess of Lansdowne said:—Before this discussion ends I desire to say in two or three sentences why I am ready to support the motion of my noble friend beside me, and why I shall not be able to recommend the amendment of the noble lord opposite. I must congratulate my noble friend Lord Selborne upon the extremely sympathetic reception his proposal has met from all parts of the House. (Cheers.) As to the actual wording of the motion, I think something might be said, but, like the noble marquess opposite, I pay a lot more attention to the substance of my noble friend's speech than to the precise words in which he has framed his motion. My noble friend was perfectly frank with the House. He told us he was not prepared to produce instances of the kind of abuse to which he desired to put an end; that he rested himself almost entirely upon the suspicions—the widely prevalent suspicions—which exist in the public mind that abuses of this kind do take place, and take place not infrequently. With my noble friend I believe the suspicion does exist and is widely prevalent, but I think with the noble marquess opposite that the suspicion probably is exaggerated, and I noted with satisfaction that my noble friend pointed out in his view, so far as a very large part of the honours which are now conferred by the Sovereign are concerned, there was no reason for any misgivings. (Hear, hear.) In regard to the honours conferred upon Civil servants, the Navy, and the Army, and upon the Sovereign's Indian subjects, I do not think there is a word to be said. (Cheers.) Anyone who looks through the lists of names of those who have received honours of any kind in the last few years will readily see that a great number of those names are the names of persons who are in every way well fitted to be rewarded in this manner.

THE PUBLIC MIND REQUIRES REASSURANCE.

But, undoubtedly, the public mind does require to be reassured upon this subject, and I think the resolution of my noble friend Lord Selborne, received as it has been here to-night, and perhaps confirmed by a similar resolution in the other House, will have the kind of reassuring effect which we desire. There is a universal feeling of reprobation of the idea that honours of any kind conferred by the Sovereign can form the subject of a bargain between the persons who receive them and the person who is instrumental in procuring those honours. (Hear, hear.) I agree in believing that the need of precautions in this respect tends to become greater as time goes on. I am afraid that suspicions of this kind are inevitable so long as we have what is commonly called the party system in this country. The party system in a democracy like ours means a great many things. It means that you must have party organization, party machinery, party literature, and that you may have the support of party candidates. All these things inevitably mean the expenditure of large sums of party money, and that money inevitably tends to be taken out of the pockets of the wealthier members of the party. That may not be a very pleasant thing to contemplate. My noble friend used a happy phrase where he said it "revealed the clay foot of democracy." (Cheers.) I doubt very much whether any precautions you can take will altogether obviate the dangers which we all desire to guard against. The matter is complicated by the fact that these contributions to the party funds are in themselves perfectly harmless transactions. What I think my noble friend desires to insist upon is not that a man who has made a contribution of this kind to the party funds should have a black mark put against his name and be regarded as disqualified for the receipt of an honour, but that the liberality of the contribution should not be the only justification for the honour of which he may eventually be the recipient. (Hear, hear.) I cannot say it too strongly, that, while in my view contribution to the party funds is in the first place an allowable transaction, a contribution of that kind ought in no circumstances to lead a Minister to consider for an honour an individual who, but for that contribution, he would not have considered. (Hear, hear.) But then, of course, you will inevitably find yourselves face to face with very complex cases. There is the case of a man of wealth who has spent his wealth wisely and generously, who has acquired a dignified position in the world, who has attended to local business in his neighbourhood, and who also may have been a liberal contributor to the party funds of his party. How is the Minister, or the person who advises the Minister, to decide how much weight is to be given to the generous contribution to the party war-chest, and how much to the meritorious record in every other respect of that individual? I noted, as did the noble marquess, the expression in my noble friend's motion that he calls upon the Government to devise effectual means of guarding against these abuses. He did not specify the means that he had in his mind except at the close of his speech, when he suggested that questions of this kind might be dealt with on the advice of the Privy Council. That is a suggestion worth considering, but I should be sorry to commit myself to it this evening. Lord Milner thought that with each case there might be published with the announcement of the honour an intimation of the services in respect of which the honour was conferred. That seems to be not an unreasonable suggestion (hear, hear), but I am bound to say that I would much prefer to leave the consideration of the effectual means which my noble friend desires to see adopted to the Sovereign and those who advise him in these matters. I feel sure that the action of your lordships' House this evening will have a salutary effect in calling attention to the question.

THE SUGGESTED ROYAL COMMISSION.

With the proposal to refer the whole matter to a Royal Commission I cannot say that I am much enamoured. The noble lord who makes the proposal no doubt has in his mind not that the past history of these transactions should be raked up but the question of strengthening the law with regard to them should be considered. I am afraid that his Royal Commission would find it very difficult not to consider what the alleged abuses were, and that opens up rather a long field. I doubt very much whether the noble lord would gain anything by examining Mr. Balfour or Mr. Asquith as to the circumstances under which the 200 odd peers who have been made since 1885 received their honours, or the 300 baronetcies, and the wholly innumerable knightships. That would open up a still more distracting field of investigation. May I interpose an observation based on Lord Milner's comment on the fact that present Government have made 63 baronies? The other evening, when a most important division was taken on my noble friend's amendment to the Address, in spite of the 68 baronies noble lords opposite only marshalled 55 peers of all sorts and descriptions against the motion. (Laughter.) Further difficulty would be encountered when, as a result of this or any inquiry, you set to work to frame rules for the purpose of guarding against the apprehended abuses. My noble friend said very truly that it was almost impossible to define the circumstances in which an honour might or might not properly be given, and I am very much afraid that, whatever rules you were to adopt, it would be found that a twentieth century party manager would be able to drive a coach-and-six through them. (Laughter.) For that reason, I very much prefer, at any rate in the first instance, to trust to the effect produced on the public mind by this discussion and the motion of my noble friend, and I do sincerely believe that if the two Houses of Parliament joined in expressing a decided opinion upon this important question the result would be to reassure the public mind and greatly to strengthen the hands of the Minister and, above all, perhaps, to enable him to resist the temptation which was always present in the case of an overworked man to rely upon the advice of somebody else rather than on his own instincts and judgment.

Lord Amptill suggested that the motion should read "that it is desirable that effectual measures should be taken."

The Marquess of Crewe.—I consider that amendment a distinct improvement.

Lord Charnwood withdrew his amendment.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

The House rose shortly after half-past 7 o'clock.

The Times,

Persian Pensioners.

A Case for Reform.

A correspondent who was many years resident in Persia writes to us on a subject which is of considerable interest at the present time. He says:—

"There is one phase of the Persian question which I do not remember to have seen mentioned in any of the many articles that have been written on the subject of Persia and her ills, and that is, the extent to which the Persian Exchequer is drained, fairly or unfairly, each year by the numerous foreign employees, past and present, of the Persian Government.

"The Persian Treasury (often empty) is not only responsible for a host of handsome salaries, but also for the payment of many handsome pensions, some of them well-merited by long and faithful services, others paid as the 'pound of flesh,' squeezed out of the Treasury through diplomatic channels after very inadequate periods of service. The recipients belong to many nationalities—English, French, Italian, Austrian and others, to say nothing of the Persians themselves. I presume there is a list of them somewhere, and it would be interesting if we could learn their numbers and the amounts paid out to them: I think, too, that it would cause some astonishment.

"We may safely assume that the primary object of the Persian Government in employing foreigners is to secure for herself the benefit of Western advanced methods of administration—and the services of honest men to administer her affairs. This supposition is deducible from what we know of the corruption so prevalent among the Persian governing class, concerning which so much has been said and written. In fact, this aspect of the question has been so widely ventilated and the custom so highly reprobated, that special care ought to be taken to see that those who are selected to impart to the Persians pure methods of administration are above reproach.

"We know that the Persian employee, if paid at all, is in receipt of a mere nominal salary and has, besides, to pay heavily for his post, and it is therefore, perhaps, excusable for him to appropriate whatever may come his way in the form of pickings, seeing that he is expected to do so. But in the case of the enlightened foreigner it is very different. He is on a pedestal and, as a rule, in receipt of at least adequate remuneration, a remuneration which ought to place him beyond temptation and enable him to fulfil his mission as instructor in probity and pure administration. Does it?

"I have been told by a foreigner that 'the foreigner at the employ of the Persian Government who does not make the most of this opportunities for peculation as they arise is a fool, because if he does not do so someone else will.' A contemptible proposition, but, I fear, a widely accepted one!

"The importation of arms into Persia is strictly prohibited, yet I have known of officials who, although specially appointed to watch the trade in arms, have, by acting in collusion in evading the Custom dues, reaped huge profits from this illicit traffic. I have in my mind's eye the case of an official who after less than ten years' service, on a salary approaching £1,000 a year, and who lived up to his salary, left the country with a solid banking account of over £10,000, in addition to a large quantity of plunder 'in kind.' Another man, after a few months' service, claimed, and is at present, I believe, in receipt of, a pension of over £300 per annum; although he returned to his own country to a more lucrative post and will eventually succeed to a substantial pension there. These are typical of many similar cases, and in face of such palpable robbery of the Persian Treasury I would ask, how is it possible for that country to make progress, or for her own nationals to learn methods of probity and clean-handed administration?

"By all means let the officials be adequately paid and also qualify for a pension. But with the Exchequer at so low an ebb, and the country in such urgent need of honest help, let us in return, for very shame's sake, act up to our boasted rectitude and give her honest service." To Near East.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor
of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes :
"The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (10s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

The Week.

British Subjects.

London, April 1.

After a debate on the South African deportations the House of Commons adopted a Resolution accepted by Mr. Harcourt, that the rights of British citizens, contained in the Magna Charta, the Petition of Rights, and the Habeas Corpus Act as presenting freedom of the subject, are those which the House desires to see applied to British subjects throughout the Empire.

Home Expenditure for India.

London, April 1.

Replying to Mr. Rupert Gwynne in the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Roberts said that £1,415,700, which he mentioned last week as representing Home expenditure for India in 1913 and 1914 for capital account was made up as follows:—Discharge of guaranteed debentures of the Nagpur Railway £280,000; additional expenditure on Railways, £1,090,700; additional expenditure on Delhi, £50,000. Deduct Shortage of expenditure on Irrigation, £18,800. A sum of £150,00 had been remitted from India in 1913-14 in respect of profit from coinage on rupees and had been added to the gold standard reserve in sovereigns. The sale of Council Drafts 1914-15 would be conducted in accordance with the policy, recommended by the Royal Commission, which made it impossible to say what the total would be.

Frontier Expeditions And Indian Army.

London, April 1.

In reply to a question from Mr. Morrell as to whether officers and men of the Indian Army had not been informed on the occasion of frontier operations that they might disappear if they had conscientious objections to engaging in Military operations against men of their own race and religion Mr. Roberts said that in case of the Tirah Expedition the Afridis had been excused.

Persia.

Teheran, April 2.

A force of about 1,200 gendarmes was recently sent to Burujiro to protect the region from Luri raiders. It has advanced southward, and after twelve hours' engagement, secured the passes and drove the raiders back to snow-clad hills.

Turkey.

Constantinople, April 3.

Combined forces of Kurdish Sheikhs, Molla Selim and Molla-Shah-Ben-Din are attacking Bitlis, which is being defended by troops and the gendarmerie. Reinforcements are hastening thither. It is alleged that the Kurdish movement is due to hostility to projected reforms.

Albania.

London, April 5.

The Neue Freie Presse learns that the Powers do not contemplate intervention in Albania.

While reports from Vienna intimate that the attack on Korytza has failed, from Athens and Salonika comes intelligence of the capture of the town by the Epirotes with heavy losses on both sides, and of further successes by the Epirotes, including the capture of a number of gendarmes at Hoti Kista. It is significant that the Durazzo despatch, received from Rome, says that Prince William, in consequence of grave news from Korytza, summoned his Ministers and proposed to march out at head of his troops. After long discussion, the Ministers decided on a general mobilisation.

The Albanische Korrespondenz, too, admits that the news from Epirus has caused great excitement in Durazzo.

Durazzo, April 6.

In consequence of the anarchical situation in South Albania Government has ordered a list to be made out of the forces available and the eventual formation of a Militia. Proclamations have been posted throughout the county ordering the muster of all ex-Redifs between the ages of 29 and 39. Rumours of mobilisation are premature at present.

Bombay Corporation.

Bombay, April 6.

The Hon'ble Sir Fazalbhoy Carrimbhoy has been elected President of the Corporation for the ensuing year this afternoon. Highly complimentary speeches in reference to him and to Mr. M. Tod, the retiring President were made and the election was unanimous.

Home Rule.

London, April 6.

The House of Commons this evening passed the Home Rule Bill on the second reading by 356 votes to 276. The O'Brienites abstained from voting. Thirty-six Labour members voted with Government. Two Liberals, Mr. Agar Roberts and Sir Clifford Cory voted with the Opposition. Hundreds of Irishmen, cheering and waving green flags, saluted the announcement of the figures in the Palace yard at the entrance to the House of Commons, and gave Mr. Redmond and other supporters of Home Rule a great ovation as they came out.

Indians in South Africa.

London, April 7.

Sir Benjamin Robertson arrived this morning from South Africa by the British Indian steamer "Palomotta." On landing at the Apollo Bunder, Sir Benjamin was received by his Private Secretary, and the Inspector General of Police in the Central Provinces. A large number of Indian merchants were also present at the Bunder who profusely garlanded Sir Benjamin; who after talking to them for some time drove to the Taj Mahal where he is staying at present. Sir Benjamin will leave this evening for Delhi to meet the Viceroy. Sir Benjamin is unwilling to express any opinion regarding the South African situation and hopes for a settlement satisfactory to all.

The Persian Gulf.

London, April 1.

Replying to Sir George Roberts, Mr. Churchill said that no reduction of Naval strength in the Persian Gulf was at present contemplated as the result of an agreement with France concerning gun traffic; but the position was being closely watched with a view to such modification as the altered conditions might require or justify.

Our London Letter.

London, Mar. 20.

THE HOME RULE DEADLOCK.

SINCE my letter of last week, the political situation has undergone no material change. Mr. Asquith's offer to temporarily exclude Ulster was not enthusiastically received by the advanced wing of his own party and they would have certainly revolted if the Prime Minister had shown the least sign of surrender last Monday, when he made a brief statement in the House of Commons in reply to the numerous questions on the Home Rule Bill that had been put down on the paper. The first Lord's speech at Bradford on Saturday night—a masterpiece of statesmanship, reasonableness, courage and eloquence—in which, while making it quite clear that the government was ready to consider any honest attempt on the part of the Opposition towards the peaceful solution of the Irish problem, he none the less emphatically declared the Ministry's decision to proceed with their Bill if the Unionists reject the offers of Mr. Asquith, irrespective of consequences, has encouraged the Coalition very much. The ovation which Mr. Churchill met with on his entry in the House on Monday last bore ample testimony to the universal approval of his speech, two days previously at Bradford, on the part of the entire Coalition. The Prime Minister's firmness in the House on Monday and his nod of approval of Mr. Churchill's speech, when challenged by the Unionist Leader, has further rendered the whole question more clear, at least as far as the Government's position is concerned. It now rests with the Irish Unionists to definitely reject or accept the new terms and though Mr. Bonar Law's and Sir Edward Carson's speeches last night in the House of Commons, on the vote of censure against the Government, did certainly contain traces of anxiety for some form of settlement by which civil war may be averted, still no definite change in the situation has so far become noticeable. Mr. Bonar Law has suggested a Referendum and when the Prime Minister deliberately asked him whether, granting that the majority of the electorates in this country thus showed their approval of the Government's Irish policy, as embodied in their Home Rule Bill, the Unionist Party would then consent to the coercion of Ulster, the Conservative Leader nodded his head in assent. That is the true obstacle to the whole question. The Unionist Party in England may decide to abide by the results of a General Election or of a Referendum, but they cannot speak for the Irish Unionists in this affair. That is why it is perfectly obvious that there is a greater chance of arriving at a peaceful solution through Sir Edward Carson than through Mr. Bonar Law and his Colleagues on the Front Bench. Sir Edward has impressed his hearers in the country as well as in the House of Commons with the absolute honesty of his purpose, and whenever he speaks in Parliament his remarkable personality seems to dominate over the whole assembly. Not even Mr. Redmond has ever accused him of hypocrisy or dishonesty and it is to him only that the nation looks up to-day for the maintenance of peace and order in Ireland. The Home Rule question is of vital importance to Sir Edward Carson and his opposition to that measure is perfectly genuine and sincere; whereas Mr. Bonar Law's hatred for Home Rule is based not so much on the merits or demerits of the Bill itself as out of considerations for the prosperity of his own party. He insists on demanding a General Election immediately not so much out of regard for the opinion of the country but merely to wreck the Parliament Act in order to restore the lost veto of the House of Lords. That is the whole case in a nutshell and the Liberal Party is fully alive to the motives of the Opposition. Mr. Asquith is not likely to surrender, when he is almost on the point of victory. He is determined to proceed with the Home Rule Bill under the Parliament Act by peaceful means if possible; if not, the responsibility for Civil War in Ireland will be on the shoulders of the Opposition, who have so far not even attempted to consider the concessions that have been offered to them by Mr. Asquith with a view to prevent bloodshed in Ulster. If Ulster wants peace, she can certainly have it, if the Opposition wants a settlement the road is clear. But if the determination is to prevent a settlement and to exploit an Ulster mob in order to destroy the Parliamentary institutions and to restore the House of Lords to supreme power in the State, then there must be an end to a situation which would be grotesque if it were not so mischievous. As the Daily News says, the impunity which this treasonable conspiracy has enjoyed has already done incalculable harm. The drillings in Ulster, the open repudiation of law and order by men like Lord Londonderry, Lord Roberts, Lord Milner and the rest, the raising of the flag of rebellion in the House of Commons, not by a solitary Anarchist, but by the leader of what still calls itself the constitutional Party—all this has sown seeds of which there will be abundant fruit in the future. The doctrine of violent resistance, to which Mr. Bonar Law has committed himself, cannot be limited to the Conservative Party. It is a doctrine which will serve the purpose of the Syndicalists very well. Not long ago Mr. Tom Mann was sent to prison for advising the common soldier to refuse to shoot down the working man on strike. At the same time Sir Edward Carson was reviewing a rebel army in Ulster organised to overthrow Parliament, and at this moment a Field-Marshal, who is still receiving a handsome pension from the State, is engineering a scheme to prevent the Government from employing the Army in any way they may deem necessary in the interests of law and order. The meaning of all this is penetrating deep into the mind of the country. Nor will the effect be limited to these spheres. In the very issues in which the Unionist Press is justifying Civil War in Ulster, it is carrying on a mischievous campaign for more stringent measures in India. Against what? Not against open rebellion, not against civil war; but against the small element of popular liberty at present enjoyed. Scores of newspapers have been confiscated in India for the most ordinary criticism of the Government, while the very newspapers here which are supporting these attacks on the liberty of the Press are preaching civil war in order to destroy the Government. Do these people suppose that they can advocate violence here without the Indians knowing anything about it? And who is to explain to the Indians that resistance which is a holy and loyal thing in Ulster, where they have votes, is an unholy and disloyal thing in India, where they have no votes? It is these larger considerations, as well as those immediately involved, which make it incumbent upon the Government to have no more trifling with treason. They have made their offer. Liberals dislike it and Nationalists dislike it, because it gravely imperils the unity of Ireland. But it has been made in the interest of peace. If, as seems likely, it is rejected on the second reading the duty of the Government is clear. It is to revert to the Bill as it stands, to press it through with all the resources at their disposal, and at the same time to deal with the rebel Privy Counsellors and Knights of the Garter as they would, in similar circumstances, deal with working men who conspired against the State. It is gratifying to have Mr. Churchill's assurance that "the Government have had just about enough of this sort of thing." The country has had far more than enough. It looks to the Government to protect its Parliamentary liberties against any further outrage and it will welcome the Chief Whip's renewed declaration that there will be no General Election until the Home Rule Bill is passed into law as final and irrevocable.

THE STUDY OF THE EXPENSE.

The announcement that the Senate of the London University have appointed a Committee to advise them on the best method of providing in this great metropolis for the study of matters of Imperial interest will be heartily welcomed. The regrettable ignorance of the average Englishman of almost all matters touching the laws, history, geography, and temper of the overseas Dominions, not to mention India, is a matter of common knowledge and lamentation. It is also a fruitful and most dangerous source of strife and misunderstanding.

standing. The scheme deserves the best wishes of all those who have the true interest of the Empire at heart and the London University Senate are to be congratulated on the wise step they have taken, which will no doubt be in time productive of excellent results.

THE CALCUTTA MOSQUE INCIDENT.

The Times of the 17th inst. contains a brief message from Calcutta saying that trouble has arisen there between the Port Commissioners and local Moslems in connection with the demolition of part of a mosque and the alleged desecration of grave-yards in order to make room for an extension of the Kidderpur docks. We are also told that feeling has been running so high that an order for the cessation of the demolition work has been issued by the district magistrate. It is earnestly hoped by all Indian Moslems in London that there will be no repetition of the Cawnpore tragedy. We trust Lord Carmichael will not permit this undoubtedly grave question to develop any further and show the same degree of statesmanship on this occasion which was so strongly exhibited by the Viceroy at Cawnpore in an almost identical situation. Nothing succeeds so well as nipping an evil move in the bud and it will admittedly be to the advantage of both the authorities and the Moslem community if His Excellency the Governor would forthwith adopt suitable measures for the prevention of the subsequent disaster rather than to have eventually to proceed with remedial processes, however benign and reasonable they may be. The awful recollections of Cawnpore are much too recent to enable one to afford ignoring this fresh mosque incident, even at this great distance, and we are praying to be spared the repetition of that dreadful history.

INDIAN GOLFER AT OXFORD.

The final of the inter-college golf competition at Oxford University was decided this week over the course at Radley, when Trinity beat Balliol by 17 holes to 2. In the top match H. S. Malik, an Indian undergraduate, defeated W. F. C. McClure, the Oxford Captain, by 2 holes. Malik who played splendid golf, finished the round in 73. He has taken to the game fairly recently and is already an accomplished player. Before playing golf, he had made a reputation as a cricketer. His friends both at the 'Varsity and in London will follow his future career with very keen interest.

THE INDIAN UNION SOCIETY.

This Society, which had lately suspended its activities, has become fully alive again and every fortnight draws numerous gatherings to its meetings at the Emerson Club in Charing Cross. In the past it has had the distinction of entertaining some illustrious Indian personages like His Highness the Gakwar, the Hon. Mr. G. K. Gokhale, Sir Pheroz-shah Mehta, the late Mr. R. C. Dutt, etc., while eminent people like Sir Valentine Chirol, Mr. Edwyn Bevan, and the Berlin Correspondent of the Times, amongst others, have delivered addresses before its members from time to time, Mr. Bevan having also held the office of Hon. Treasurer to the Society. It owes its origin to the efforts of Mrs. P. L. Roy, whose personality is always a guarantee for the successful career of any undertaking with which she may associate herself. I believe she was its first president and her daughters have likewise held that office in the by-gone days. It is worked on thoroughly democratic and non-sectarian principles and extends its hospitality to distinguished Indians visiting this country, irrespective of creed or politics. The members of the Society had the unique honour of being invited by the Gakwar to a princely reception at the Piccadilly Hotel in the Coronation year, when, apart from His Highness himself, the Maharano and their daughter, the Maharajahs of Bikaner and Gwalior and Mr. Justice Nair of Madras were amongst those present. Mr. K. C. Tayabjee, who is now a solicitor in Bombay, was one of the most popular presidents the Society has had. As I have already mentioned, the Indian Union Society has had some lady presidents as well and so it can claim to have not only extended universal suffrage to all its members for voting purposes but to have also raised women to "Cabinet" rank and in fact to the high dignity of the "Woolsack." Surely this "equal" treatment of women by an Indian Society in the heart of London—in spite of the volumes written in English as to the treatment, that of a mere slave, meted out to Indian women by their wicked menfolk—cannot but claim the envy of poor Mrs. Pankhurst and her friends. Mrs. Roy and her daughters have secured the vote for the Indian women here and that too without smashing our windows or else adopting the hunger strike!

The Indian Union Society is certainly doing very useful work in London, but I am sure the Indian cause could be served more faithfully if the pioneers of the numerous Indian associations in London could manage to concentrate their energy, their interest and their attention upon one single institution, instead of dividing their labour, as they do now, in so many directions. Those responsible for the management of the various existing Bodies would be well advised to amalgamate the different Societies with the sole object of establishing a common and central organisation, which should receive the co-operation and support of every Indian in this metropolis. Apart from the division of labour—which is unavoidable under the existing conditions—the present system is not fair either to the average Indian student, who, though perfectly willing to support any movement that concerns his country, is very often prevented, from the financial point of view, from associating himself with all the institutions that are being run to-day, and their number is very large indeed. The natural consequence is that on the whole the excellent cause underlying all these movements is bound to suffer. If, however, the numerous existing associations could be submerged into a single powerful organisation, the Indian interest and co-operation—at present widely scattered—could and would concentrate towards the proper establishment of such an institution on a solid foundation and its popularity and influence would be thus assured. The Indian Union Society, the London Indian Association and the Indian Social Club (to say nothing of the smaller sectarian or rather regional organisations, such as the Punjabee Society, the Beharee Association, the Burmese Society etc.) are at present, for instance, the leading Indian institutions in London, which have practically the same aims and objects in view, viz., the promotion of harmony and social intercourse between the Indians. It is obvious that those objects could be more easily attained if we had instead one common central body, which every Indian in London could join and which could really give him the opportunity for Social intercourse with his fellow-countrymen. Gradually such an institution would develop into a powerful organisation. It could serve as the nucleus of a great scheme, by means of which, when fully matured, every Indian here would become strongly saturated and infused with that unifying spirit—whether he be a Hindu or a Moslem; a Bengali or a Maratha; a Sikh or a Rajput; a Punjabee or a Madrassee—which is so essential for the social, moral and political advancement of our great and ancient country. Here is a splendid opportunity for Indian "statesmanship" in London. The matter undoubtedly deserves their most careful consideration.

SIR EDWARD GREY ON THE TURKISH PROBLEM.

Mr. Aubrey Herbert in moving his resolution in the House of Commons last Wednesday, concerning the British position in the Mediterranean, succeeded in introducing the Turkish question in the debate. In the course of an admirable speech, on which he was justly complimented by the Foreign Secretary, Mr. Herbert said that there had been a great deal of resentment among the Moslem subjects of the Crown in India because of injudicious utterances in this country, and because of the humiliation to which Indian Moslems had been treated in South Africa, and that feeling would be confirmed because England was associated in their minds with Europe's treatment of the Turkish islands in the Mediterranean. The islands that dominated the Dardanelles, through which a great portion of their food supply come, were to be left to Turkey and not given to Greece the obvious inference being that Europe had assumed that position because she did not want to run any risk in regard to her food supply. On the other hand, the islands that dominated Smyrna and Asia Minor, were to be taken from Turkey and given to Greece, the inference being that the risk which they repudiated for themselves they were ready to inflict upon Turkey. It could not be maintained that geographically these were Greek islands any more than it could be said that the Isle of Wight was a French island. In all this Balkan settlement Europe had taken practically our basis, and it had not been ethnological, but strategical and based on propinquity.

Sir Mark Sykes, who seconded the resolution, said there were two factors of intense importance as bearing upon the position in the Mediterranean. The first was the Entente with France and the second was the precarious position of the Ottoman Empire at the present time. The disappearance of Turkey must entail the disappearance even of the shadow of the Persian Empire. European frontier might then be established, in the face of which he could not see how this Empire would continue the Entente which was real and deep, but if it could be endangered, it was by the policy of the French financier in the Near East. That policy was to produce eventually the collapse of the Ottoman Empire which would be a frightful disaster to themselves. He entreated the Foreign Secretary to consider the financial position which was developing in the Ottoman Empire, and to strive to secure that the Triple Entente, sinking all territorial ambitions and all ideas of exploitation should adopt a policy of co-operation for the regeneration of that Empire.

Sir Edward Grey, after dealing with the question of the British position in the Mediterranean, said—"Now, to go into the questions of foreign policy, which were raised, there are one or two of them I must put aside, because I cannot very well bring them within the terms of the motion. It is a little difficult to get Persia into the four corners of the motion. (A laugh.)

China is still more remote, and I do not think I could establish the connexion of Sweden with the Mediterranean. I must, then, put them on one side, and concentrate on the one point, our policy in regard to the Mediterranean. Our policy with regard to Turkey now that the war is over is to use our diplomatic influence to see the integrity of the Turkish dominions preserved. There is no financial boycott at present, and, of course, there has never been a financial boycott as far as we are concerned. The Government cannot financially boycott another country, for we do not control finances as they are controlled in some other countries. But the seconder of the resolution spoke of a very large loan to Turkey and undesirable conditions attached to it, and that is another matter. As far as we are concerned we cannot press financiers to lend money to Turkey. We never press them to lend money, because they would decide for themselves whether it was a good financial operation, and because we should incur responsibility if we did press them. If Turkey wants to borrow money among British financiers they must decide for themselves whether it is a financial operation in its commercial aspects in which they desire to engage.

TURKISH ASSURANCES.

But this I will say. We have had the most explicit assurances from the Turkish Government that they desire to put their own house in order, that they have no aggressive designs in the sense of ripping up the peace and engaging in a war of revanche in Europe. We believe that these assurances represent the real meaning and intention of the present Turkish Government, and therefore I will say at once that so far as we are concerned we see no political objection why people who wish to lend money to the Turkish Government at the present moment for commercial reasons should not do so. That, I think, disposes of the idea of a financial boycott.

Mr. Aubrey Herbert.—I never intended to suggest that England had boycotted Turkish finance.

Sir E. Grey.—I understood that, but the hon. member who seconded the motion referred to a very big loan which was not a British loan and that really did apply to the same quarter which the hon. member was speaking of when he used the words "financial boycott"

A REFORM SCHEME.

The Turkish Government are aware that reforms are necessary to preserve the integrity of Asiatic finance. I cannot go into details in regard to Armenia, but a reform scheme for Armenia has advanced to a stage at which I believe it has the consent of the European Powers, which is essential, as well as that of the Turkish Government. I trust that very soon it would take concrete shape, and when it takes concrete shape and I state to the House exactly what the reforms consist of, and which are the result of agreement between Turkey and the other Powers, I hope it will be borne in mind that it is much more important to have a scheme of reforms under which, say, the Turkish Government takes two European inspectors and employs them in the Armenian vilayets, and which has the goodwill of the Turkish Government, than it is to have a reform scheme which on paper looks much better, but has not got the goodwill of the Turkish Government.

A reform scheme which has not the goodwill of the Turkish Government is one which is only going to be operative in proportion to the force which is behind it, and the continuous pressure which is behind it not on the part of one or two Powers, but of all the Powers of Europe. The reform scheme which has been arranged between the Powers of Europe and the Turkish Government is a scheme which is really going to operate, and in this case I believe the scheme when it is produced will be found to be not only more satisfactory on paper than was expected, but that it will be one which has the goodwill of the Turkish Government. It is in that sense their scheme as well as the scheme of the European Powers, and it will be found that the present Turkish Government have realized how much they have lost in Europe by bad Government in Macedonia and in the territory which they have lost, and how essential it is that they should apply to their future government the lessons which have resulted from the adversity which has overtaken them. Therefore the scheme of reform will start with Turkish goodwill in the sense that it has not had before. I am glad to have an opportunity of explaining what has taken place in regard to the Aegean. There is nothing which Mohamedan feeling ought to take offence at in regard to the part we have played in the settlement which has taken place. The hon. member who moved the motion called attention very truly, and I am glad he did, to one or two things we have done to show that we are sensitive to Mohamedan feeling and have the natural sympathy which every one ought to have in this House with the legitimate sentiments and feelings of the vast number of Mohamedans who are the subjects of the Crown. The hon. member who moved the motion said that we alone protested, and made representations in regard to the treatment of the Mohamedan minorities. We certainly have done so, but I am not sure whether we are the only country which has done so on more than one occasion while the war was in progress. He also referred to the fact that we alone had made a grant of money to Albania for the relief of distress there. In that case I believe it is true that we alone have done so. (Hear, hear.)

THE QUESTION OF THE AEGEAN ISLANDS.

Then we come to the question of the Islands. I think the hon. member who moved the motion overlooked one point which we have had to bear in mind—the strategical effect which changes with regard to the Aegean Islands might have on the Mediterranean. It is very germane to the terms of his motion to consider the strategical effect which changes in the Aegean Islands might have on the Mediterranean. We have borne that strategical effect in mind because all our influence has been used—and other Powers have agreed, and I think willingly—to get an agreement amongst the Powers that, whatever else may happen with regard to the Aegean Islands, none of those islands should be permanently occupied and maintained by the Powers. We did that precisely because we were alive to the strategical position in the Mediterranean and did not wish to see changes take place to affect that position adversely. But when we come to consider the settlement of the Islands, I think the settlement ought to be considered as a whole. The hon. member spoke as though the only thing involved was the giving of the island of Mitylene to Greece. That is not the only thing involved, nor is that the right way of stating what has taken place. It was not a question of handing these islands to Greece. It was a question of whether they should be taken away from Greece after she had taken the islands, of which the population was largely Christian. Certain districts of Epirus have been taken away from Greece and are in course of being given to Albania, which to a very large extent will be a Mohamedan State. I think Mohamedan feeling ought to be consulted, and what we have done has not shown any anti-Mohamedan bias. I am speaking, of course, of the settlement for which all the Powers are jointly responsible, and for which we have no more responsibility than any other Powers. In the case of the islands now in Italian occupation, which will be restored to Turkey under the conditions of the treaty between Italy and Turkey, the decision of the Powers was that they were to decide what the destination of those islands was to be, and they decided that they were to go to Turkey. That was not an anti-Mohamedan decision, but an essential part of the settlement. It has been decided that the Island of Tenedos, because of its strategical importance to Turkey, is not to remain with Greece, but to revert to Turkey again. That shows consideration for Turkish feeling. If, after all that, it has been decided that the islands of Mitylene and Chios are not to be taken from Greece, it is not fair to quote that as an instance of an anti-Mohamedan decision by the Powers without remembering that it is merely part of a decision which I have divided into four parts, of which two are positively favourable to Turkey and the third is in favour of Albania, where Mohamedan interests have notably to be considered. That ought to be taken into account.

MITYLENE AND CHIOS.

It is a great mistake to look at the question of these islands as though they were the only thing in the settlement and not to bear in mind that they are part of the settlement and should be considered in relation to other parts. The settlement as a whole does not show an anti-Mohamedan or anti-Turkish bias. The hon. member who moved the motion admitted that the islands of Mitylene and Chios are in the main Greek with regard to their inhabitants. That is a strong prima facie case for their being under Greek rule. But why did he urge that they should not be? He said they were strategically important to Turkey. They are strategically important to Turkey, and the Powers have laid down that the islands are to be neutralized and not fortified, that Greece is not to make use of them in a sense hostile to Turkey and is to take precautions to see that a nuisance is not caused to Turkey by smuggling. We have taken as much interest as anybody in seeing that these conditions should be imposed. It has been suggested that all sorts of trouble would ensue from the possession of these islands by Greece, and that they would involve a real menace and risk to Turkey. Positive stipulations were introduced which Greece has willingly accepted which ought to safeguard Turkey against any such use being made of these particular islands. If in future it turns out that the unfavourable prophecies which have been made with regard to the possession of these islands are likely to be realized, that they are being used as a centre of smuggling and political agitation, that they are being fortified and are likely to become a base hostile to Turkey, that they are being administered in a sense offensive to Turkish interests—not only is that foreign to our intention in being a party to this settlement, but stipulations have been introduced into the settlement to guard against it. I believe not only with regard to this Government but any future British Government, if these fears turn out to be true, our sympathy will be all on the side of whatever measures may be suggested to secure that the possession of these islands by Greece shall be one which not only ensures the welfare of the population, but which also ensures that they are not used in a sense offensive to Turkey. I trust that the parties to this settlement will see that the ill effects to Turkey which are prophesied are not realized, but that Turkey shall be protected against the consequences which the Powers did not intend to flow from the settlement at which they have arrived and against which they have taken precautions by stipulation. (Cheers.)

Mr. Herbert, in view of the statement of the Foreign Secretary, asked leave to withdraw his motion.

TETE À TETE

A few weeks ago we drew the attention of the Bengal Government to the growing anxiety amongst the Calcutta Mussalmans owing to the acquisition by the Calcutta Port authorities, with a view to extend the Kidderpore Docks, of a considerable plot of land on which 15 mosques and 12 grave-yards are situated. These mosques and grave-yards are in an imminent danger of being wiped out, unless the Government intervenes. We have refrained from publishing the numerous communications that we have been receiving on the subject, for we have naturally no desire to embarrass the authorities in a matter so intimately affecting the religious feelings of the Moslem community. We still hope that the Bengal Government would remove all causes of anxiety by settling the question without further delay. It should not, we think, be necessary to repeat too often that the preservation of mosques is to Mussalmans a supreme religious obligation. Wherever this question comes to be raised, be it at Cawnpore or elsewhere, Moslem feelings are bound to be deeply stirred. It is natural—no vicissitude of temper or outer circumstance can affect this one way or the other. It is time the force of this sentiment were fully recognised. We understand the Calcutta Mussalmans intend to wait on Lord Carmichael in deputation to lay the matter before him. We trust His Excellency will sympathetically consider the representation of the Mussalmans. We are surprised, by the way, at the silence of the Bengal Presidency Moslem League which appears to have done nothing in so important a matter, in spite of the loud patriotic pretensions of some of its members.

We publish elsewhere a letter sent to us from America, which invites prompt attention to the underlying policy of the Asiatic Exclusion Bill that was introduced in the United States Legislature sometime ago. Of all the Asiatics resident in the States, the Indians would assuredly be most adversely affected by this policy. They are weak in numbers; they lack active and powerful support of the British Government; and the humiliation to which they are subjected in the Colonies of their own Empire is bound to be taken up as the most crushing weapon against them. Indeed, the letter we publish to-day amply shows how the position assigned to Indians in Australia, Canada and South Africa is resulting on the position of Indians in the United States. The British Ambassador declined to help them unless he received instructions from the Foreign Office. We do not see what hope the Indian residents can have of protecting their rights and the honour of their country in such a situation. Has the British Imperialism no sense of duty in this respect? Is not the Empire powerful enough to protect its own citizens from insults and humiliation in foreign countries? It is a very anxious situation, yet British statesmanship seems hardly awake to the consequences of dallying with it.

If the organisers of the important Moslem Deputation that recently waited on Lord Hardinge had desired, among other things, to shut the mouths of their slanderers in a section of the Anglo-Indian Press, they have been remarkably successful. Their old and never-failing "friends," whose "advice" was lavished on them on the slightest provocation, seem to have received their plain and unvarnished talk in a chastened spirit, and, whether these "friends" have liked it or not, they have preferred to chew the end of remorse in silence. The Moslem Deputation has been studiously ignored by the Anglo-Indian papers, with one striking exception. Perhaps the event has given thoughts that are too deep and searching for complacent editorial paragraphs. Or it may be, that the pens that were only yesterday dripping gall could not forthwith begin to overflow with milk and honey. But whether it is a shock of surprise, or the pang of remorse, or only a mild chagrin at the passing of a coveted opportunity to play the old game that is responsible for the conspiracy of silence, we would rather not inquire. The psychology of the Anglo-Indian Press is not easy to analyse—it is as shifty as the political weather of which it is so fine a barometer. But as we have already said, there is one great "friend" of the Mussalmans to whom the straight challenge of the representatives of the community has gone fearfully home. We have been rather amused to see the Times of India, which is so fond of lecturing the Mussalmans on sanity, trying madly to fit the cap on its head. It bitterly represents that the Mussalmans should have gone to the Viceroy to vindicate their loyalty, and in their reply to their calumniators it sees an "impassioned protestation" which was slightly suggestive of the refrain "we are all honourable men." It ascribes certain wild sayings to some Moslem journal and says that "other Mohamedan journals have also acquired a reputation for ill-balanced opinions" and screaming denunciations which cannot easily be lived down, or "ignored on account of any number of protesting deputations." Our contemporary is evidently too vain to forget itself and too haughtily sensitive to "ignore" things that it does not like, but it forgets that the huge bundle of memories that it may be carrying to nurse its hate or revenge is already upsetting its mental balance. The Mussalmans know well enough what their needs are and they are quite competent to provide for those needs, if only their "friends" would leave them in peace. They have only one feeling for the presumption of those who discover postulates for their conduct or solemnly hold forth on the virtue of sanity. It is really a curious logic that the Times of India and others of the same kidney have evolved in their campaign of malice and vilification against the Mussalmans. If the feelings of the Mussalmans of India are stirred by overwhelming misfortunes to Islam abroad or by some deep shock to their religious sentiments at home, they are dubbed sedition-mongers. If they desire to clear their character of the aspersions cast by their calumniators, they are said to be protesting their loyalty too much. Perhaps the Times of India and others of the tribe desire the Mussalmans to remain only as a perpetual text from which they might preach high political sermons according to the needs of the hour. All we wish to say is that the Mussalmans will hold on to the course that lies before them, undeterred by the threats and uninfluenced by the cajoleries of interested on-lookers, and we trust even the Times of India will live to learn it.

We have received a copy of the sad petition which was submitted some days ago to the district magistrate of Basti by 341 Mussalman residents of Mehnadpur, Bargadwa, Sawaiwar and some other villages situated within the jurisdiction of the police station Uska in the district. The petitioners state that since October, 1913, they have been molested and maltreated by a number of their Hindu fellow-subjects in every conceivable way "simply because we did not consent to give up the qurbani of cows "wholly and definitely on the occasion of the last Baqr'-Eed." They further state that their individual cries have not been successful in attracting the attention of the minor local authorities; and they have been driven in consequence to "approach you in a body with "the hope that you will be pleased to make a thorough and searching "inquiry, if need be, into our real and legitimate grievances with the "result that our future interests will be safeguarded and we will be "safe and free to return to our homes without any further danger to "our lives and property." The facts stated in the petition are as follows. Some days before the last Baqr'-Eed some of the Hindu residents of the villages named above sent for some of the petitioners and ordered them to abstain from sacrificing cows and buffalos and to substitute goats and sheep in their place. As the petitioners were unable to give any pledge to that effect, they were threatened with hints of damage to their lives and property. This aggressive attitude on the part of the Hindus is stated to have been the result of the preachings of some bairagis from Ajndhya. It was proclaimed by the Hindus by beat of drum that no one shall sacrifice cows and buffalos. "Subscription lists were opened to carry on "the propaganda of open hostility to the established laws and custom "of the country. Upon the heels of this war-cry followed some stray "acts of incendiarism the same evening, crops were destroyed in "some of the fields the morning following and the reign of terrorism "began in right earnest." The petitioners made a number of reports at the police station, but no serious notice was taken of them, "because no "lives had been lost and no very great damage to the crops could be "pointed out at one single spot." "We admit," say the petitioners, "that every effort would have been made to bring the culprit to "justice had we but lost a single life. But we proved cowards and "at this stage we prefer remaining so." The Hindus were in the meantime carrying on "an organised warfare" and were too astute to commit acts that might lead to bloodshed or a serious breach of the peace. The petitioners filed a number of complaints in the court of the sub-divisional officer of Bansi, but they failed to get any effectual remedy. They state that one of the officers, who inspected the locality, "after gauging the feelings of the opposite faction, only thought of pacifying them by trying to prevail upon one of us to definitely give up the gurbani of cows and in lieu to accept Rs. 50 from the Hindu zamindars, which offer was very respectfully rejected." The petitioners then respectfully call the attention of the district magistrate to their helpless condition, the fear of organised persecution and violence that drove them out of their homes and has been keeping them in a frightful state of misery and suspense for many months past. Failing to get a redress of their grievances elsewhere they now turn to the district magistrate to help them and afford them safety and protection from the aggressive hostility of their determined and powerful neighbours. They state that the serious impasse seems to have been reached "through the attitude of some of the petty officials responsible for order and good government." The petitioners assure the district magistrate that they have done all they could to settle the matter amicably and return quietly to their homes, but their efforts have sadly failed. They would not be allowed, it would seem, to settle down to their work in peace, unless they give up their rights and pledge themselves to abstain from performing a religious duty. The custom of sacrificing cows and buffaloes has obtained in these villages for some generations. The petitioners are poor and cannot afford to sacrifice goats or sheep. Being staunch Mussalmans they naturally consider gurbani as a sacred rite which they are bound to observe. They cannot renounce this right the free exercise of which has been guaranteed to them by the British rule. Should they, therefore, be allowed to suffer so long at the hands of fanatical oligues, when they have done nothing and mean to do nothing to offend the susceptibilities of the Hindus? They crave "the benevolent help and sympathy" of the district magistrate. "Our condition" they say, "speaks loudly of our necessity. We have left our homes with our women and children and are camping out in the open, out of the Uska police jurisdiction. This speaks for itself and we need not be more plain in language." They pray that (a) a committee consisting of an equal number of Hindus and Mussalmans and one European member be appointed to consider their grievances and make a report thereon and that (b) a thorough departmental inquiry be made into the affairs of the Uska police station and, if any officer is found undesirable, he should be transferred. We prefer to say nothing at this stage in regard to the sad and amazing story that this petition discloses. We wonder nothing should have been done to look into the condition of things even after hundreds of Mussalmans with their wives and children had left their homes long ago and have since been living out in the open. They are evidently afraid of coming to live within the Uska police jurisdiction? Do they fear being harassed by some police official or underlings? All these matters require a thorough, prompt and impartial inquiry. We have just received a communication from a correspondent who says that the district magistrate has rejected the petition. It is almost incredible to us to believe that the district magistrate would thus spurn away hundreds of poor, persecuted, hapless persons, whose distress is so great and who went to knock at his door for justice. We would await further details and information before we make our comments at length. But if it is true that the district magistrate has refused to ensure for the petitioners some tolerable conditions for their safety, we trust the local Government will promptly look into the matter and see that the poor Mussalmans of the villages, now wandering about in utter helplessness, get the official protection they seek and return to their homes without any risk to their lives and property.

Hindu-Moslem Entente. The Hindu-Moslem conference which Sir James Meston had called with a view to consider the best means of promoting harmony and goodwill between the two communities, met at Lucknow last week. Our special correspondent sends us the following telegraphic summary of its proceedings:—"Twelve Mussalmans and eleven Hindus attended. His Honour and the Chief Secretary were present. Pundit Bishan Narain Dar was absent. The following subjects were discussed: (1) Processions in religious festivals; (2) appointments in the public service; (3) the language question; (4) separate representation on local bodies; (5) cow-killing. There was a good deal of plain speaking on both sides. The meeting lasted from 11 a. m. to 7-30 p. m. It was suggested that joint-boards be appointed under collectors and commissioners. Objection was taken to boards being formed under official control. The non-official members present at the conference formed into a committee, with the Raja of Mahmudabad as chairman, to promote friendly relations between the two communities. The committee has power to add to its members. It is premature to judge of the results at this stage. All depends on the spirit and the manner in which the committee works. It is encouraging that the committee will not be under official control." It is satisfactory to note that the conference did not rush to hasty resolutions which would have been repudiated afterwards by the general Hindu or the Mussalman public. The appointment of an independent non-official committee is a wise step, and if it sets to work earnestly and in the right spirit no one need despair of good results. The questions discussed at the conference form the crux of the matter, and they can only be settled amicably if the point of view of either side is examined impartially and receives its due weight. We trust both the Hindu and the Mussalman gentlemen on the committee realise that their business is not to wring concessions from each other, but to find a settlement that would be fair to both. Opinions should be freely invited and the work of the committee should proceed in a manner that would inspire general confidence. If the will is not wanting it should not be difficult to find the way. If the committee succeeds in its delicate and difficult task Sir James Meston would deserve the gratitude of both the communities in the Province for his initiative.

THE news of the unanimous election of the Hon. Sir Fazulbhoy Currimbhoy as President of the Bombay Corporation for the current year would be received with genuine pleasure by the large circle of his friends and admirers outside Bombay. Sir Pherozeshah Mehta, in proposing Sir Fazulbhoy for the highest civic honour that it is in the gift of the most efficient, progressive and independent municipal corporation in India to bestow on any one of its members, paid a warm tribute to the ability and services of Sir Fazulbhoy and pointed out that "there was our gratifying feature, which he had just discovered about this office and it was that Sir Fazulbhoy became President 'at the same age at which he (Sir Pherozeshah) was first appointed 'to that post.' We earnestly hope that Sir Fazulbhoy's future career will realise the splendid promise of his early manhood. In reply to a recent address presented to him by the Mussalmans of Bombay in appreciation of his manifold services to the cause of communal education, Sir Fazulbhoy said: "You have overlooked my faults" and exaggerated the importance of what I have been able to achieve. "I am sure much yet remains to be done, and, with your kindness and co-operation, I hope to dedicate my services to the welfare and advancement of my community for the rest of my life." This is a noble resolve, and for a man of Sir Fazulbhoy's talents, leisure and position it is not difficult to realise. His community expects great things from him, and he would surely fulfil the promise of his manhood as well as the hopes of his friends, if his resolution is fixed and unshakable and his purpose is not suffered, through inevitable obstacles, difficulties and disappointments, to grow dim.

LORD HALDANE, in recently delivering the annual Orieighton lecture at University College, London, took as his theme "The Meaning of Truth in History." Sir Edward Grey, who presided, introduced the subject in a speech of great suggestiveness and lucidity. He himself fills an active and important role to-day in the sphere of international politics. Much of the raw material of a very engrossing department of contemporary history has in recent years borne more or less the impress, among others, of Sir Edward's personality. It had been suggested to him that he might explain how diplomatists by their inveterate habit of telling the truth in their own day, were doing all they could do to make the work of the future historian easier. In his opinion, however, the difficulty, so far as the diplomatist was concerned, "was not to tell the truth, but to get it believed when one had told it." It is an edifying commentary on the reputation of Diplomacy for a plain, straightforward habit of disburdening itself to the uninitiated. Any diplomatist worthy of his craft would, in fact, despise all free indulgence in this habit as professional incompetence. When a veil is partially withdrawn on rare occasions, it is often intended as a "blind" to send the pack of curiosity-hunters off their track. Whether the historian would find it easy to disentangle "truth" from the calculated "indiscretions" of Diplomacy as well as from its discreet reticences it is hard to tell. There can be no doubt, however, that the diplomatist is in a very special sense making history. The historian, that comes later to piece together the bewildering multitude of accomplished "facts" into some sort of organic relation, reads into them ideas, tendencies, and broad significance and makes the dry bones live again after his own inner image of the period and the epoch. The inner atmosphere in which the diplomatist plies his craft rarely reveals itself to the historian. He frequently misses the tone and the gesture of the age; no inward illumination can successfully light his path to the hidden springs of motives and character of the diplomatist; no effort can bring him into close and intimate touch with the real sources of the diplomatist's power and the tools with which he worked. The most successful historian—successful in the popular sense—is in reality an artist, i.e., he pursues his way through the recorded deeds and thoughts and hopes of men and selects his materials to give it a complete expression. The figures that crowd his canvas are his own creation. It is wholly beside the point to inquire if they reflect the past faithfully as in a mirror. The essential point is that both the mirror and the faculty of vision are the artist's own.

But even if the entire historical literature of the world were a merely richly-embroidered vesture, fashioned out of the records of the past, through which individuals gifted with strong literary instincts have tried to find self-expression, it would be difficult to dismiss it as a mass of unreality. For one thing, it has moulded our conception of the past and has thus become a living force in our estimate of the tendencies of the present and in our forecasts of the future. And the picture that it gives of the past is not wholly valueless. Even in a caricature one can visualise the real features by some effort of the imagination. And historical literature is not all a caricature. At its worst it is unmitigated falsehood, but in the hands of the best masters it has given several valuable glimpses of "the truth." The defect of the bias of personality, which even the best specimen of historical literature bears, is a human limitation that it is impossible to remove. History has its message, and it is not all profitless. According to Sir Edward Grey, two things should be sought in the study of history. One is some help in understanding the time in which we live ourselves. In our own age it is very difficult to see the wood from the trees. The historian can show us a past age stripped of all that was trivial, irrelevant or transitory in it and can bring out what the life of the period really was, what people thought really mattered, their point of view, their lasting and permanent work, the tendency of their age. This could help to save us from confusion and muddle and to make our own efforts some permanent contribution to the pattern and work which our own generation is doing and which would be recognised by future historians as distinctive. The other thing we get from history is the lesson to be learnt from the conduct of prominent and great individuals, the limitation in public work of character which was not supported by sufficient intellect, the failure even of the greatest intellect when it was not accompanied by sufficient qualities of character. Lord Haldane mainly discoursed on the standard of truth for the historian. He advanced the analogy of the artist who painted a portrait. Art in the highest sense has to disentangle the significance of the whole from its details and to reproduce it. The truth of the art is a truth that must be borne again of the artist's mind. No mere narration of details would give the whole that at once dominated those details, and yet did not exist apart from them. The work of the historian and the artist seems to be so far analogous; both are directed to finding the true expression of their subjects and neither is concerned with accidents of details that are fortuitous. But the former does not possess the freedom of the latter. If he uses as complete liberty as the artist claims, he is reckoned as belonging to quite a different profession—that of a writer of historical romance. The true historian must be exact and yet a lord over his details. He must not let his views on the whole be distorted by a priori conceptions that are abstract and inadequate to the riches of the facts of life. Lord Haldane thinks that the historian must be a man of art as well as of science. It may be possible to a certain degree to combine art and science in writing history, but a perfect combination is out of the question. Science cries for exactitude and generalisation at every step, and it would be the height of absurdity to imagine that any theory or principle can for a moment be framed to comprehend such an incommensurable thing as life. Social sciences are not simply imperfect, they can never be sure of their ground. As Lord Haldane himself observes, it is a mistake to suppose that statesmen are always conscious of the ends which they are accomplishing. It is not by the piecing together of mechanical fragments but by a process more akin to the development of life that societies grow and are changed. There is thus an inevitable element of what seems at first sight to be unreality in even the best work of historians.

LORD MORLEY'S range and power of thought in a bold, philosophical survey of history have been some of the most illuminating sources of wisdom to his generation. In his recent short volume, entitled Notes on Politics and History, he inquires in his own inimitable way if history can afford any valuable guidance in the conduct of politics. As an able reviewer says, he has in these Notes delivered himself of a searching criticism of contemporary civilisation. He is suggestive as well as elusive in propounding a number of questions with which he confronts the reader. The aspect of contemporary civilisation that has most strongly impressed itself on Lord Morley is its turbulent change. The student of public affairs cannot fail to remark to-day an enormous impetus to legislative innovation coupled with an impatience of legal restraint. "The whole trend of modern legislation," says Professor G. H. Morgan, "marks a progress from contract to status—the legal relations of parent and child, of husband and wife, of employer and workman, of doctor and patient, of landlord and tenant, are all undergoing a change in the direction of legislative regulation. Whether these changes keep pace with or outpace the development of individual character is an anxious and urgent question. In spite of this tendency to increase the functions of the State—perhaps because of it—there is everywhere what Lord Morley aptly calls a 'latter-authority—civil commotion in Ulster, 'sympathetic' strikes in one or more of our great industrial towns, hints at revolution by our Conservative Party, and threats, and more than threats, of 'sex war' by the champions of Women's suffrage. Men are at once and the same time eager for legislation and impatient of law." Where, it may well be asked, are people to look for persuasion, if not for authority, in all this ferment of change? Lord Morley has faith and hope in the influence of educated opinion. The habit of loose-thinking and slipshod-reasoning has grown amid the conditions of life that have contributed to the general instability of mind, but he thinks the chief corrective for this is a re-examination by the universities of the foundations of political belief. And this leads us to the central question: What guidance can history give to the student of contemporary affairs and more particularly to the politician and the statesman? Nothing was more characteristic of the period about the middle of the nineteenth century than the zeal with which men set themselves to make history the handmaid of politics. As Professor Morgan says, "different historians at different times discovered an inexorable movement from status to contract, communism to individualism, aristocracy to democracy, authority to liberty, custom to law, myth to religion, religion to morality. Others again have seen in history the divine hegemony of a race or the apotheosis of a creed...It is of this appropriation of history to politics that Stubbs must surely have been thinking when he satirised the attempt of men to prove that 'all things would have been exactly as they are if everything had been diametrically opposite to what it was.' "What then do we mean by truth in history? If it means veracity, it is surely the primary business of the historian. But veracity is not the same thing as value which the philosopher has to find out and estimate. As a law of life history has its limits. The rules of conduct must be sought and found in the investigation of the content of one's own experience. "These are things," says Professor Morgan, "which each generation of men must work out for themselves; it may be with fear and trembling. History cannot perform for us the office of philosophy. It is not a criticism of life, though it may occasionally supply the materials for one. Even when we have advanced from the conception of the historian's object as 'What happened' to 'How or why it actually happened,' from the descriptive to the causal, we are still a long way from the imperious contemporary problem 'What ought to happen?'" Generalisations of history are not commands. If they are accepted as the "laws" of life social will and purpose will be paralysed and the human spirit would lose all energy and enterprise.

Politics and History.

Man is his own star, and the soul that can Render an honest and a perfect man
Commands all time, all influence, all fate;
Nothing to him comes early or too late.

But if history is not a very reliable guide in the solution of contemporary problems, its value as an instrument of intellectual training and culture can not be ignored. It may not yield laws of life, but if wisely studied it can impart breadth of outlook, tolerance, sense of proportion to the mind of the student and may endow him with that steadiness of nerve which is so necessary in dealing with men and affairs. Lord Morley thinks that history "is very convenient to the politician—a plausible parallel makes him feel surer of his ground." And this is its greatest snare—it can not contradict us when we read our opinions into it. Stubbs was doubtful if history would make men wise, but he was sure it would make them sad. Some of its most profound students think that it can throw little light on the doubts and controversies of the hour and that man can never hope to divine the future by reading the past. It would perhaps be nearer the truth to say that man can never read the past fully and therefore correctly. And this is the real limitation that besets history as, indeed, all human knowledge. The horizons shut mercilessly behind us and before us, and the mind's eye can only range over a brief space through the intermittent light of fragmentary human experience, and cannot penetrate the immense darkness around. The light itself changes colours, and the eye is but a creature of the age. It is the sense of these stupendous fixities which brings Lord Morley to a pause and forces on him the question: Is there Progress? As Professor Morgan says, we all believe in Progress to-day, but do we achieve it? Have we any clear conception of what it means? "We are, as Anatole France reminds us, working upon the roaring loom of time even as the weavers who produce the Gobelin tapestry—we work without seeing the 'pictures which we weave.' There is much that can be said to show that the present age is an age of progress in the real sense of the word. There is a quickened social consciousness and a deeper appreciation of our mutual obligations. Education is growing liberal, speculation is becoming freer every day. Lord Morley, though expressing no definite opinion, seems to think that the achievements and efforts of contemporary civilisation are not all a delusion and a mistake. He sees around him "equity, candour, diligence, application, charity, disinterestedness for public ends, courage without presumption." He recites the tribute of Sophocles to the unconquerable mind of man. His message is one of hope

The Comrade.

Ulster and the Army.

II.

We concluded our first article on the subject published in the last issue by stating that the crisis of the officers' resignations with reference to the question, whether the Army could be forced to coerce Ulster, was averted, but it was averted only at the cost of a still greater crisis with reference to the question, whether the Army could ask for and obtain assurances from Government about the manner in which it would be employed by the Civil power. This question is indeed of the utmost importance, and the historian of the British Constitution would have to include this second Ulster crisis in his account of the position of the Army towards Parliamentary Government. It has involved the resignation of the Secretary of State for War and of two military officers holding important posts, such as Field-Marshal Sir John French, the Chief of the General Staff, and Lieutenant General Sir John Ewart. It all but involved the resignation of a statesman like Lord Morley and of General Sir Arthur Paget commanding the troops in Ireland. Even more significant is the direct assumption of the charge of the Army as the Secretary of State for War by the Prime Minister himself. In fact it is only by taking these grave and unusual steps that the Government has escaped a general resignation of the Cabinet following on the revolt of the Liberal back benches.

Before we can enter upon a discussion of essential the points in the controversy, it is necessary to ascertain what it was that the Government instructed Sir Arthur Paget to do and what he did, what it was that General Gough demanded and what he secured, how far the entire Cabinet was responsible for the action of Colonel Seely and Generals French and Ewart, and how much further these responsible authorities of the Army had gone. It is noteworthy that Sir Arthur Paget's instructions to officers were not included in the White Paper issued by the Government on the 25th of March, and Mr. Bonar Law in the Commons' debate insisted that everything turned on what General Paget said to the officers, and yet this Colonel Seely had refused to tell the house. However, now that Sir Arthur Paget has called at Downing Street and Mr. McKenna has communicated to the House of Commons the statement of Sir Arthur Paget to the Ministry, it is possible to see, even though it be dimly, what instructions Sir Arthur Paget had received from the Government and what communication he in his turn had made to the Irish officers. Mr. Winston Churchill told the House that regarding the new reinforcements sent to guard the depots, General Paget was consulted and was of opinion that it would cause intense excitement and a crisis. The Government did not view the matter so seriously, but consulted Mr. Birrell and acted on his advice. These movements and none other were approved by the Cabinet in principle, and the details were approved at a conference of Mr. Asquith, members of the Government, heads of the Army Council and Sir Arthur Paget. None of the Ministers believed that would lead to bloodshed, but General Paget took a most serious view. He was told that, if necessary, reinforcements should be sent from England. Regarding the possibility of disaffection among officers, General Paget was given two rules: firstly, officers ordered to support the civil power were not to be allowed to resign, but if they did not obey they were to be dismissed; secondly, indulgence might be shown to officers domiciled in Ulster. Mr. Churchill added that it was never intended that these rules, given to General Paget for guidance in case of emergency, should be put to the officers in the form of questions and that there was a misunderstanding on that point. According to Mr. McKenna's statement, Sir Arthur Paget had informed Mr. Asquith that the only question put to the Generals was, whether they were prepared to do their duty before any other consideration. It was not his intention that the Generals should put questions to the subordinates. He had also informed the Generals that officers whose homes were in Ulster might temporarily withdraw if operations became necessary. He requested the Generals to ascertain the number of officers thus withdrawing. Sir Arthur Paget was asked whether other officers would be allowed to resign. He replied that refusals of duty would result in dismissing.

There was evidently a bungling of the thing and, howsoever the misunderstanding arose, neither the Government nor Sir Arthur Paget can be congratulated on their management of the situation. But even if Sir Arthur Paget was responsible for this misunderstanding, the Government and the Army Council alone were responsible for the still more serious bungling when General Gough was called to the War Office and returned with written assurances in his pocket. In this connection too it is with the utmost difficulty that one is able to piece together the story of the transaction. We have already indicated in the article in our last issue that even the Liberal papers were far from certain that General Gough had rejoined unconditionally, and that the Times had clearly asserted that General Gough had received a written assurance from the Government that the troops would not be used to coerce Ulster. It is true that when on the 23rd of March Mr. Asquith's statement was interrupted by a Unionist who asked: "Is General Gough reinstated?" Mr. Asquith had replied: "there is no question of reinstatement. He was never dismissed" and that when Mr. Bonar Law interposed: "his successor was actually mentioned," Mr. Asquith had replied "that was pending General Gough's explanation. He 'and all the officers concerned have now returned to their Brigade,'" and finally when the Unionists asked: "Unconditionally?" Mr. Asquith has replied: "Certainly." Nevertheless when Mr. Morrell had pointed out that the question whether or not General Gough had returned to Ireland on terms had not been answered and he asked Colonel Seely for an answer, Colonel Seely did not reply. Again, on the following day Mr. Amery, a Unionist, moved the reduction of the Army Estimates and declared that General Gough had refused to accept Colonel Seely's verbal assurances that neither he nor his troops would be used to coerce Ulster, and had got written assurance. In spite of this Colonel Seely deferred his statement until the following day much to the dissatisfaction of the Liberals, who expected an immediate explanation of the nature of the assurances given to Brigadier-General Gough and his comrades. The opinion in the Lobby was reported to be that the Government was threatened with a widespread revolt and that the Liberals were very angry at the Government's supposed yielding to the officers. On the 25th of March a White Paper was issued containing correspondence in relation to the events, but the summary cabled to this country did not explain the pointed issue whether General Gough had rejoined unconditionally or otherwise. On the same day Renter's telegram informed us on the authority of reports in the papers that the officers' interview at the War Office, evidently on the 22nd of March, was most stormy. Sir John French had criticised their action as meriting the severest punishment, but it is not without interest to know that it was a former Commander-in-Chief of the Army, in India, Lord Roberts, whose intervention is reported to have restored a better feeling. Finally, a voluminous document, replete with legal technicalities was presented to them setting forth the conditions under which they would undertake to serve in Ulster. General Gough's reply, however inconsistent it may have been with his conduct at the Carragh camp, was very ingenious and showed him to be resourceful at least in diplomacy. He said we are plain soldiers and do not understand legal terms. So to the gentleman fully familiar with military discipline, but not worst in legal technicalities, a document of a less complicated nature was supplied which he signed. This is the first mention of something in writing, but as this document was signed by the officers and purported to set forth the conditions under which the officers would undertake to serve in Ulster, it could not have been the Cabinet document with the War Office additions which has formed the subject of so much controversy. To this Colonel Seely referred when announcing his resignation and said that it was signed by himself, Field-Marshal French and Lieutenant General Sir John Ewart and that it was a Cabinet document, but the signatories had inadvertently added the concluding paragraphs which gave the appearance that the officers had secured terms. The papers had subsequently published that Field-Marshal French and Lieutenant-General Sir John Ewart had reluctantly signed the paragraphs which were subsequently repudiated by the Government. Now we have the following Ministerial statement before us about this controversial document. We have already quoted what Colonel Seely had said about it. Mr. Asquith explained on the same date that the Cabinet had considered the letter to General Gough as contained in the White Paper with the exception of last two paragraphs. These, he said, were inadvertently added by Colonel Seely without the knowledge of the Cabinet. The Government, he declared, would never assent to the claims of officers to demand assurances from the Government. Sir Edward Grey said that when the Cabinet authorized the communication to General Gough the General's letter of the 23rd March was not before them. The paragraphs Colonel Seely had added were harmless enough in themselves, but the Cabinet was unable to endorse them because they appeared as an answer to General Gough, making conditions. The Government, said Sir Edward Grey, still maintained that General Gough had returned unconditionally. They stood by the first portion of their communication and were responsible for nothing else. Mr. Austin Chamberlain characterized Colonel Seely's resignation as a put-up job, and said that Colonel Seely had prepared the paragraphs, which the Government now repudiated, in consultation with Lord Morley and added that, if these Ministers remained, then the paper they had approved was binding on their colleagues. Mr. Churchill repudiated the statement and said that Lord Morley has never revised or examined the two paragraphs. Five days later Mr. Churchill asserted that when Colonel Seely's assurances were given the Cabinet knew nothing of General Gough's demand. The document drafted by Lieutenant-General Ewart came to the Cabinet too late to be read, but Mr. Asquith keeping the mind of the Cabinet "cut it down accordingly, handed it to Colonel Seely and left the Cabinet." On the next day, however, Mr. Churchill stated that he had been betrayed into a mis-statement on the previous day and that the memorandum containing Brigadier-General Gough's demand was read to the Cabinet which declined to agree to them. From this it would appear that even Sir Edward Grey "was betrayed into a mis-statement" on the 25th of March, when he said that when the Cabinet authorized the communication to General Gough, the General's letter of 23rd was not before them. This is indeed an extraordinary betrayal, and one would very much like to know how it came about. As regards Lord Morley's snare in the transaction, his lordship himself stated that Colonel Seely had shown him the famous two paragraphs which did not appear to him to differ in substance from the views expressed by the Cabinet, and in answer to Lord Curzon's characteristic interjection, asking why, as Colonel Seely has resigned, Lord Morley was still Minister, he explained on the following day that he had not resigned, but that if Colonel Seely's first resignation had been accepted his would have followed. He has further explained that Colonel Seely's second resignation was on the entirely different point, that it might not appear that the Minister had made a bargain. Lord Morley himself never saw General Gough's letter. We confess these timid and hauling explanations, which require the repeated publication of errata, are more confusing than explanatory. The Pioneer's special correspondent has informed us that General Gough, after seeing Colonel Seely's added paragraphs and remarking that soldiers did not understand legal subtleties, asked in writing whether the document meant that he could tell the officers that they would not be used to force Home Rule on Ulster. Sir John French, he adds, attended and signed some form of assent. Versions vary from "this is so" to "I should read it so," the latter being the version Colonel Seely gave to the House of Commons. General Gough alone has the authentic copy. This is the record of a remarkably confused and complicated transaction that we have been able to piece together, and we cannot see how the conclusion can be avoided that the Cabinet and the War Office between them bungled the situation just as the Cabinet and the War Office and Sir Arthur Paget had bungled another situation a few days before.

The net result of this medley of instructions, resignations, misunderstandings, explanations, and corrections, is that the Liberal Government has shown firmness in the end and has laid it down by means of a new Army Order issued by the Army Council, including Sir John French and Sir John Ewart, that in the first place no officer should in future be questioned regarding his attitude in hypothetical contingencies; secondly, asking for assurances about orders which he might be required to obey was forbidden; and thirdly, he must obey lawful commands to safeguard public property, or support the civil power in the ordinary execution of its duty or in case of disturbances. But while we have given all the details of this bungling and the final result of the controversy, we have written to no purpose if we fail to impress our readers that, in the words of Mr. Lloyd George, the gravest issue had arisen since the days of Stuarts. Representative Government was indeed at stake, and if Liberalism had flinched it would have declared that it was no longer fit to control a great Empire. Democracy is on its trial and on the courage and resolution of the friends of liberty depends the question whether the country shall remain free or be enslaved by military despotism. Mr. Asquith speaking at Newcastle Station used similar language when he said that they were living in searching times when fundamental principles were called in question and fortunes and great causes were at stake.

Let us examine a little how the "Party of Law and Order," the Party of the Constitution looks upon the matter. We have already quoted in our article in the last issue the opinions of some of the Tory papers and the tone and temper of them all. But if anything, the Tory statesmen are worse than the Tory Press. Mr. Bonar Law exulted over the discomfiture of the Government, because through the effort of his party "the Army was being destroyed before their eyes." He said nothing would save the Army now except a clear declaration that officers of the Navy and the Army would not be compelled to engage in civil war against their wish. Mr. Balfour, freed from the responsibility of the Leadership of the Opposition and enjoying the consolations of philosophy, golf and tennis, was even more irresponsible than Mr. Bonar Law. He was evidently pleased that General Gough had been dismissed because he did not want to fight against Ulster, and had been reinstated after still saying that he would not fight against Ulster. Speaking on another occasion he preached the doctrine of the optional obedience of the soldier. Some Tories even went so far as to suggest that the Army Annual Bill should be rejected by the House of Lords or so amended that the House of Commons could not possibly pass it as amended. If this were to come about, the entire Army would be disestablished, enlistment would cease, the Mutiny Act would be suspended and the payment of officers and soldiers would become ill-legal. The purpose of the Army Annual Act was, as every student of English History knows, to prevent the King from keeping a standing Army without the sanction of the Commons. It carries on to this day the inherited instinct that a standing Army unsanctioned by Parliament is a menace to the liberties of the nation. The Editor of the Westminster Gazette has therefore appositely said that it would be the last stroke of irony that this provision should be twisted by the Lords into a means of restraining the Commons from using the forces of the Crown against a particular group of people who threatened a rebellion against Parliament. It appears that some members of the Constitutional Party, more hopeful than others, were somewhat puzzled by the possibility of a Nationalist's riot in Belfast if a General Election should come off in May and the Unionists should come back into power. So it was suggested that the Army Annual Bill be so amended that only one party, namely, the Party of Law and Order, should be able to play at the game of rebellion with impunity and not both the Liberals and the Unionists. Other still more fantastic suggestions were made and Mr. J. A. Spender is not very wide of the mark in saying that such a project could only be hatched in Bedlam at full noon. The fact is, the Tories occupied in their contest against the Liberals the vantage ground of the House of Lords, so that when they were in power all the Tory Bills moved on oiled casters, but when the Liberals were in power the Tory House of Lords could be effectively used for the purpose of Slaughter of Innocents in the case of Liberal Bills. The Tories far out-numbering Liberals in the Army and the Navy and the Civil Service, formed the party of lavish expenditure on the Services, while the Liberals had to push forward a programme of retrenchment when they came back into power. Mr. Lloyd George, however, hoisted them with their own petard by taxing the very classes that were perpetually clamouring for more money. But the Constitutional Party attempted to drive a coach-and-six through the Constitution by encroaching on the sole right of the Commons to make provisions for the British Exchequer. That attempt, however, failed, and the passage of the Parliament Bill into law pulled out the teeth and paired the claws of the Lords. Several appeals were made to the nation, but every General Election left power in the hands of a coalition of Liberals, Labourites and Nationalists. Beaten at the polls, the Party of Law and Order now seeks salvation in an open, unshamed rebellion, and after drilling volunteers for nearly a year it has now tried to seduce the Army from its loyalty to the Crown and to His Majesty's Government. It wants the Army to take up the battle which it has lost in Parliament and, although the Government pretends to believe that no officers had disobeyed orders and the solidarity of the Army had not been impaired, it is clear that the Tories had not counted in vain on the Tory tendencies of the officers belonging to what are now being called "the governing classes." The result is that the class war, which we fear cannot be averted for very long in Europe including England, appears less distant in that country now than it ever did before. Mr. John Ward, a Labour member, was lustily cheered by the Liberal back benches when he seconded a Unionist motion for the reduction of the Army Estimates, and particularly when he remarked that the question at issue was whether the people were to make laws absolutely without interference from either the King or the Army. Mr. Thomas, another Labour member, pointed out that if the new Unionist doctrine with reference to the Army were to stand, it would be the duty of the Railwaymen's Union to use £5,000 of their funds for the purchase of arms and ammunitions. "If you want to force my class to fight you 'to-morrow, we, Trade Unionists, will now consider establishing 'military organisations.'" The above passage, addressed to the Opposition, occurred in Mr. John Wards' speech in the House of Commons on the 21th March and was given prominence the next day by the Liberal papers, which described the speeches of Mr. Ward and Mr. Thomas as a turning-point in social history. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has not always been able recently to please his Party, but he was evidently in full accord with them on this occasion. He said that officers have prepared to shoot Trade Unionists, but they would not shoot in Ulster because of class bias. He advocated the granting of higher pay to officers which would allow democrats to take Commissions. The doctrine appears to Lord Haldane to be impracticable, and he said on the 30th of March that an attempt to democratise the Army would be attended with enormous difficulties. It would take probably fifteen years and entail enormous expenditure. But, added the Lord Chancellor, it would not even then equal the present splendid Service. These are remarks quite in keeping with the place in which they were uttered, namely, the House of Lords, and with the time when they were uttered, namely, when the Army needed a lot of patting on the back to keep it within the terms of fealty it had sworn. But a philosopher and military expert like Viscount Haldane could not have ignored the remarkable and rapid success achieved by the allied Island of Japan in democratising her army, and after all the fixing of a period of 15 years for the growth and development of a rival army is none too complimentary to "the present splendid Service." Be that as it may, it is noteworthy that, addressing a meeting of colliers in Cumberland, a miner's agent said the time was ripe for the formation of a Trade Union Defence League ready to take up arms and fight to resist oppression from any source. At any rate, it is certain that in the face of what has happened it will be difficult for a Tory magistrate to imprison with any show of conscience another Tom Maun for asking the soldiers not to shoot workmen. We already hear that a syndicalist's "Don't shoot" demonstration was held in Trafalgar square to exhort soldiers not to fire on workers. We are told that there was no disturbance anywhere and we may safely presume that there were also no arrests.

Mr. Asquith in his great speech at Ladybank vindicated Parliamentary Government with firmness and dignity. He said that the Army had no place and no voice in framing their policy or moulding their own laws, and in his new post of the Secretary of State for War the Army would not hear of politics from him, and he expected in return to hear nothing of politics from the Army. Contrast this with Mr. Bonar Law's observation that "the least we in the 20th Century had right to ask was that when we were threatened with civil commotion, officers conscientiously objecting to that service should 'be permitted to resign retaining their pensions.'" Is not Mr. Asquith right in saying that these doctrines furnish a complete grammar of anarchy? He repeated that these new dogmas counter-signed by Tory leaders would be invoked whenever the spirit of lawlessness claimed to block the ordered machinery of self-governing society. We do not know whether this would be the case in self-governing societies alone, and we do not think Mr. Asquith would like thus to limit his remarks. For he said in the course of the same speech that the Tory doctrines set a precedent which was of an infinite number of applications, each more disastrous in its consequences than the one which went before it. It is true that Lord Hardinge has declared the rumours, alleged by the Daily Telegraph to be current in the Lobby of the House of Commons, to have no truth whatever in them, and we may take this negative evidence to indicate that at least His Excellency the Viceroy has not found it necessary to warn the Prime Minister that many officers of the Indian Army would resign, unless the Government made peace with the Army. But a Simla telegram says that it was well known last year that General Richardson, while he was organising the Ulster Volunteers, had assurances of sympathy and support from a number of officers in this county. It is indeed an excellent comment upon Tory tactics and Tory loyalty that, at the very moment when Indian Mussalmans should be indignantly repudiating the monstrous invention that attempts were made by them to tamper with the loyalty of Muslim troops, the Viceroy should have to issue such a press Communique and its force should be minimised by the publication of such a Simla telegram. However, there is no ill wind that blows nobody any good, and Indians must console themselves in these critical times with the admission of the British War Minister contained in a State document published in a White Paper that "the law clearly laid down that a soldier was entitled to obey an order to 'shoot only if it was reasonable under the circumstances,'" and that "if officers and men believed that they were called upon to take some 'outrageous action' . . . they would, in fact and in law, be 'justified in contemplating refusing to obey, had as might be the 'effect upon the discipline of the Army.'" We do not think we have many readers among the military, and for obvious reasons we give the Army in India a very wide berth. But we hope our contemporary, the Fauj Akhbar, is keeping its clientele well posted up in these matters.

The Honours.

We have reproduced in our last issue and in this the proceedings of the debate that took place some weeks ago in the House of Lords on the motion of the Earl of Selborne on the subject of honours, not because it is any concern of ours whether knightships, baronetries, baronies and other varieties of the British peerage are conferred on deserving persons or otherwise, but because many remarks of the speakers in the Lord's debate have a no inconsiderable application to Indian conditions, and we trust that those of our readers, who have come to regard us as the enemy of titles and title holders, would now understand that our banter is after all not so original as they thought and that our ideas on the subject of honours are shared by a good many titled persons in Great Britain as well.

In the well-known phrase of Macaulay, every schoolboy knows that unlike Great Britain there is no chance here of turning out the Government in power. Although from the very nature of the case Indian politicians may very often criticise the measures of the Government, they cannot hope to replace the Government and drive it out of power, leaving it to plough the sands of Opposition. In other words, there is no party system in India like that in Great Britain. That been so, there are no party funds in the British sense of the term, though the critics of Government here also need money for the purpose of public agitation and have to raise subscriptions. The Government, relying upon a permanent settlement of power upon itself and being composed of paid officials with the entire resources of the State at its disposal, has no need of public agitation, but there are many indirect ways in which officials of Government use certain sections of the people as their instruments in pushing on a counter-agitation. Under these circumstances honours are not divided between the Indian Government and—if the term can be strained so far—the Indian Opposition. The Government is a fountain of all honour and, although there are no party funds in India, Government officials see to it that by hook or by crook those who act as their auxiliaries in countering popular agitation have honours easy.

Dealing with the traffic in honours, Lord Selborne said that it was a grievous scandal that a man whom no one would otherwise think of recommending for an honour is able to buy it just as he would a picture, and he feared that, unless the present tendency received a salutary check, the day would come when some one would offer to buy a Victoria Cross. He pointed out that every playgoer knows that this matter of the sale of honours is now openly scoffed at in the theatre and it is even flung across the floor of the House of Commons as a taunt from one member to another. Lord Milner, however, pointed out that in the literal sense of the word, of course, honours are not sold like butter or cheese. It may even be said that there is no honour, however flagrantly bestowed, which cannot often, or in fact always, be accounted for by some plausible reason besides the true one, and care is always taken to avoid suspicious juxtaposition of cause and effect. Nevertheless, as Lord Selborne said, it is believed that persons who have social ambitions, or whose wives have social ambitions, who have really no claim at all to receive an honour, believe that they can purchase if they go to the right place. In some cases it is believed that even where social ambition has never entered into the soul of the individual, temptation is thrown in his way and an honour is hawked to him. Lord Milner further pointed out that the bestowal of honours has a habit of synchronizing with periods when the Government of the day is in special need of funds. He invited attention to what he called there periodicity, the cyclical movements that seemed to affect them. There was a really imposing shower only when there were critical moments in the life of the Government. "The occurrence of these great 'showers of honours,'" said Lord Milner, "is almost always in the 'year before, or year of, or year after a General Election; and one is almost forced to the conclusion that there is some kind of mysterious relation between the two phenomena.'"

To do Lord Selborne justice, he did not exculpate his own party from the charge of bargaining in honours. He said, "both the 'great political parties have held office, the evil is a growth of our 'Party system, and both political parties are responsible for it.'" Lord Milner also frankly acknowledged it and said: "Both parties 'have something to atone for in their past conduct.'" Lord Crowe agreed with Lord Selborne that no question of party advantage, or party feeling ought to be involved in the matter. While denying that any of them wished to adopt a priggish or Pharisaic attitude, he assured the House on behalf of his party that none of them was disposed to minimise the gravity of the subject. Lord Selborne seemed to be deeply conscious of some of his most cynical friends who shrugged their shoulders and who said that it was prudery or pedantry to make a fuss over a matter which they did not regard as a serious evil. He himself considered it a scandal and an evil which among other things injuriously affected the prestige of the Crown and lowered the standard of public morality. He himself was fully convinced of the great value of a Constitutional Monarchy as a public institution. Any influence, therefore, which adversely affected the prestige of the Monarchy, the Crown, must be a great public evil. "Is it possible," Lord Selborne asked, "that this 'belief that honours which proceed from the Crown can be acquired 'by wealth, by whomsoever sold or howsoever got, can be prevalent 'and the prestige of the Crown not be affected?" As regards public morality, he was sure it did matter whether the hall-mark of honour was to be genius or noble life or position or public service, or whether it was to be simply wealth by whomsoever owned and however begotten. Lord Milner added that there was an even worse consequence of this "traffic in honours." By offering to party managers the opportunity of collecting enormous secret funds it helped to rivet the yoke of party upon the public men, to undermine independence alike in candidates and in members of Parliament and to submit Parliament and the nation to the uncontrolled and growing despotism of party machinery.

It is interesting incidentally to take note of the immense secret influence that wealth is acquiring in the conduct of public affairs. Lord Selborne, referring to the condition of some other countries, pointed out that those who have found the money for a party have eventually dictated its policy. "Men will dispute," said Lord Selborne, "to the crack of doom as to the respective merits of different 'forms of Governments, but I say without hesitation that the very 'worst fate that could befall a country is to be governed by an 'alliance of the caucuses and the plutocrat." There is danger, he reminded the Liberal peers, lest the real residuary legatees of that influence of which they were trying to deprive the hereditary peerage should be not the people, but the plutocracy.

CORRESPONDENCE

Indian Exclusion and America.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE COMRADE.

SIR,—The Asiatic Exclusion Bill is pending before the U. S. Congress at the present time. It aims at the permanent exclusion of all Asiatic labourers from the United States. As soon as our countrymen were apprised of the imminent danger, the California Chapter of the Hindustan Association of America appointed a committee to agitate the question. On February 1st, the Committee convened a meeting of the Hindus resident in and near San Francisco, at which it was decided that a delegation should proceed to Washington to make representations to the U. S. Government and Legislature. Saint Tara Singh, Honorary Secretary of the Pacific Coast Khalsa Diwan Society, Stockton (California), intimated that the Khalsa Diwan Society would be willing to defray the expenses. The Khalsa Diwan Society at a meeting held on February 3rd, appointed the following gentlemen as its delegates with full powers to act in the best interests of the country: Professor Sudhindra Bose, M.A., Ph. D., Lecturer on Political Science in the State University of Iowa, Dr. Bishen Singh, and Mr. Har Dayal.

The delegates arrived in Washington on Monday, February 9th. In the meantime, the passing of the Asiatic Exclusion Bill had been delayed chiefly on account of diplomatic negotiations with the Government of Japan.

The delegates were favourably received by the Press representatives of Washington. The leading morning and evening papers, the Post, the Herald, the Star, and the Times, published adequate and appreciative notices of the delegation and its mission. Professor Bose and Dr. Bishen Singh interviewed Hon. W. J. Bryan, Secretary of State, and Hon. W. B. Wilson, Secretary of Labour. They also called on the British Ambassador, Sir Arthur Cecil Spring-Rice, and asked him if he had taken any action with regard to this question, which affected the welfare of a large number of British subjects. Sir Arthur Cecil Spring-Rice replied that he had not done anything, as he had no instructions from the British Government. The delegates asked him to present their case to the U. S. Government. He promised to communicate with the authorities in London, but declared himself unable to enter into further discussion of the matter with the delegates. Next morning his public reply to the delegation appeared in the Washington Post to the effect that the issues involved in the immigration of Hindus to other countries were too grave to admit of an attempt being made to settle them through the British Embassy in Washington. This evasive answer defined the attitude of the British Embassy at the outset. Through the courtesy of Representative Towne of Iowa, the delegates were introduced to Hon. J. L. Burnett, Chairman of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, who allowed them a hearing before the Committee at its open meeting on Friday, February 13th. Professor Bose and Dr. Bishen Singh appeared before the Committee and formally presented a memorial on behalf of the Hindus resident in the United States. The sitting was opened by Professor Bose with an address, which lasted for one hour. He was subjected to a heavy fire of questions and objections, chiefly by the Congressman hailing from California, but he answered them all with persuasive skill and well-informed judgment, as he had mastered the facts and figures relative to the problem with much care and assiduity. An American lady also appeared before the Committee to testify in favour of the Hindus. The hearing was continued for nearly four hours on account of the numerous questions asked and answered. Such an unusually long session indicated the importance that public opinion attached to the mission of the delegation, as even important bodies seldom get a hearing of more than one hour. The proceedings of the Committee will be published in the Congressional Record and thus made accessible to all the publicists and legislators of the United States. Even our opponents expressed their admiration for the skill with which the delegates presented and defended arguments against the alert critics and experts who support the Exclusion Bill. The Evening Star published the following summary of the proceedings:—

Arguments against immigration legislation to exclude Hindus from the United States were made before the House Immigration Committee to-day by Dr. Sudhindra Bose, a Hindu professor in the State University of Iowa. Dr. Bose urged that if the Hindu was to be excluded, a "gentlemen's agreement" be entered into between the United States and the British Indian Government to restrict the immigration. "There is no special legislation against Japanese immigration," said Dr. Bose. "Following the Chinese exclusion law, the Japanese Government was allowed to save its face by making a gentlemen's agreement to restrict immigration. A special law excluding Hindus would humiliate us in the eyes of the world. It is not necessary." Questioned by members of the committee, Dr. Bose said that several British colonies were making efforts to exclude the Hindu and declared that this question was one of the most important confronting the British Government. He said that Canada, Australia, New Zealand and other colonies were endeavouring to exclude Hindus. We are a great class of British subjects," said Dr. Bose, "and are entitled to the rights of such a class. International complications may follow an attempt to exclude us."

"But the other colonies of Great Britain are already excluding the Hindus," said Chairman Burnett. "Yes, they are trying to," said Dr. Bose, "but the central government in England has not endorsed such action. If it does it will precipitate the fiercest revolution the world has ever known. The people of India are awakening, and if they are to remain a part of the British empire something must be done, some solution of this problem arrived at, which is more reasonable than any yet suggested." Dr. Bose contended that the Hindus are an Aryan people, entitled to naturalization in this country. In an interview with Hon. A. Caminetti, Commissioner General of Immigration, it was represented that the wording of the Bill should at least be altered in order to avoid the juxtaposition of the "Hindu labourers" with "idiots, imbeciles," etc. As it stands, the Bill enumerates the classes of excluded persons in this fashion: "All Hindu labourers, idiots, imbeciles, paupers etc."

The delegates, Professor Bose and Mr. Bishen Singh, had the honor of an appointment for an interview with President Woodrow Wilson at 10-35 on Monday, February 16th, but the President's illness prevented him from receiving any visitors that morning. This unforeseen circumstance caused much disappointment to the delegates. The appointment was an honor for the entire Hindu nation.

The champions of Hindu exclusion point to the policy of British colonies as an unanswerable argument in their favour. On account of negotiations with the Japanese Government the general Asiatic Exclusion Bill will probably not be brought in again at this session of Congress. But some representatives from the Pacific Coast are so impatient that it is proposed to pass a Hindu Exclusion Bill without delay, while the question of Asiatic immigration in general is being discussed with the government of Japan. The delegates are fully conscious of their helplessness under the circumstances, as they cannot rely on the support of a powerful Government. Whatever the issue may be, the delegates have done their duty in making a formal and public protest against the Exclusion Bill on behalf of India even without the co-operation of the British Embassy and directly approaching the Government and Legislature of the United States as representatives of the Indian nation.

This brief report is issued for publication in the Home Press.

SUDHINDRA BOSE

BISHEN SINGH.

Honours.

We give below some other speeches made in the House of Lords on Lord Selborne's motion:—

Lord Willoughby de Broke's Speech.

DABBING IN THE SALE OF HONOURS.

Lord Willoughby de Broke did not know that a Royal Commission on this subject could result in much good because the only people who could be examined would be the party Whips on both sides and he imagined they would have at their disposal information which even a Royal Commission would have a difficulty in extracting. But let nobody think Lord Selborne had brought forward charges which were vague and could not be substantiated. Nobody knew that better than he did, for he had dabbled in the sale of honours himself. (Laughter.) He did not mean that he bought his own title. (Laughter.) That was conferred on his ancestor for the part he took in placing the Tudor dynasty on the Throne—a dynasty which furnished a line of monarchs who would have treated noble lords opposite in a very different way from that in which they were being treated by his present Majesty. (Laughter.) He would tell the circumstances of his attempt, and was not going to implicate anybody on his own side, although, even if he did, they had been out of office for so long that the Statute of Limitations ought to apply. (Laughter.) He wanted a large sum of money for an enterprise that could not entirely be dissociated from politics, but which he assured noble lords was entirely patriotic in its design. (Laughter.) He called on a gentleman and suggested that if he would give him the money he would use his influence with his party to secure for him not a peerage, but a baronetcy only. (Laughter.) He was not quite sure what the price of a baronetcy was—perhaps some noble lords opposite could inform him—but the price he asked was not excessive. (Laughter.) The very natural question was: "That is all very well, Lord Willoughby, but when are you going to deliver the goods?" (Laughter.) He certainly could not tell when the Unionist Party would get back to office, and said that he did not know, and he was not surprised when he was very politely shown to the door. (Laughter.)

THE OBJECT OF HONOURS.

With regard to the grounds on which a title or an honour should be given he had never been quite sure whether they ought to look on it as a reward for service done either to country or to party. Would it not be better to agree with Francis Bacon that it should be regarded as a vantage ground for rendering further service, and that particularly applied to the granting of a seat in that House. An honour was given to a man in order that he might have that distinction and authority among his fellow-men that enabled him better to perform his duties in the future. For that reason Mr. Curzon went to India and was made Lord Curzon, and Mr. Gladstone went to South Africa and was made Lord Gladstone. It was not the slightest use giving an honour to anybody unless it brought with it the enjoyment of power, the exercise of responsibility, and the discharge of duty, and that particularly applied to the hereditary peerage. They might think that they had brought it to the ground, but he did not believe that they would ever hear the last of it in this country. He was prepared for the present to go very far in the direction of getting a Second Chamber of some kind based on sufficient authority to correct and, if necessary, disagree effectively with the House of Commons. Whatever shape the reform might take, it would never have the same authority that was enjoyed till recently by the hereditary peerage, which would one day be recovered. Oliver Cromwell got rid of the hereditary peerage for a few short years, and reformers on both sides might try as much as they liked, but they would not be able to beat Oliver Cromwell at that game. (Laughter.) Any Constitution that they might agree to in the future was bound to be in the nature of an interim Constitution. How long was the Parliament Act going to last? Had it not very nearly tumbled to the ground already? Did it not stink?

CONSIDERATIONS OF EUGENICS.

If he were a Radical organizer he would try to select his peers from among those who, like Jorrocks, had no legitimate offspring (laughter), because not only did conversation frequently come to them after a few years or months, and sometimes in their minds even hours, but the son was almost a certainty, while the Radical grandson of a Radical peer was a phenomenon that they could not conceive. (Laughter.) To use the hereditary peerage, not from the point of view of the caucus, but of the nation, it should be selected on what were called eugenic principles. (Laughter.) He had seriously hoped that their lordships would not have laughed at that. A peer should be chosen on account of coming from a sound stock and being himself sound. He did not care whether he was rich or poor, but he should come of a family that was patriotic and likely to continue in their posterity the same qualities that distinguished their ancestors. He would be a bold man who denied that the present grounds for granting a title were dictated more by the necessities of the caucus than the need of the nation. He was glad to hear the noble earl condemning so eloquently the terrible alliance between the caucus and plutocracy. The thing called democracy, of which they had had such an orgy in England for some years past, had one never-failing vice. It threw up a race of exploiters who were well described by Mr. Price Collier in his penetrating book, "England and the English," as politicians who lived by the people on the people for themselves. (Cheers.) That was the government from which they were suffering to-day, and would suffer from in a greater or less degree whichever party was in office.

LORD READING'S APPOINTMENT.

It was just as corrupt to extract a consideration out of a man by means of a direct vote as by means of the direct payment of a sum of money. If a great many of them had tried to get money in the same way that they tried to get votes they would have been sent to prison long ago. (Laughter.) He had meant to say this whether Lord Reading was in his place or not. He did not know him personally, but would Lord Crewe or anybody who was going to speak deny that when Lord Reading was placed at the head of the judicial system in the country and his Majesty was advised to make him a peer the recommendations were principally based on what they thought the convenience and credit of the party rather than what they thought was best for the credit of the nation? The one power which stood between the working classes and the plutocrat employers with whom they were engaged in what in many cases was a righteous warfare was the hereditary peerage as represented in that House. His advice to those engaged in this industrial struggle was that the best chance they had of defeating the plutocrats was to uphold the hereditary peerage and to see that it was recruited from those who had got some instinct, some tradition and who had been brought up in those honourable relations between employers and employed which had always prevailed in this country in the past.

Lord Ribblesdale's Speech.

Lord Ribblesdale said he did not mean to go into the question of party funds. He had had very little to do with them and had always expressed a profound reluctance to subscribe largely to them. (Laughter.) But, like the noble lord opposite, although he had not exactly dabbled in getting honours for people, he had been, he believed "approached" was the right word (laughter) from time to time when he was a Whip in that House. Only the other day he was called upon by a very honest foxhunter, who sent up a message to him with so much mystery that he thought he wanted to sell him a horse. (Laughter.) His visitor was not a man who kept in touch with current politics and he seemed to be under the impression that he was still Whip. He went down to see him, and it turned out that he had come on behalf of a friend of his.

The gentleman looked pregnant with thought, and, when he pressed him, he put the matter in a very blunt way—his friend would like to have a certain sort of honour. "What," he asked, "is the inducement?" "Oh," his visitor replied, "I think he would give a good deal of money." He asked, "What sort of figure?" (Laughter.) He indicated a figure, and he replied, "I don't know about that." After walking about the room a good deal he came back, tapped him on the shoulder, and said, "I think he will go a bit better." (Laughter.) He then said to him, "That might be all right, but what about his political views?" He did not seem to have thought about that. "I don't know much about that," he said, "but I think it would be all right." With that he went away. (Laughter.)

A PERSONAL OPINION.

He was not in agreement with either the resolution or the amendment. Both Lord Selborne and Lord Charwood touched what the papers called a "high" note (laughter) in the argument which they put before the House, and at the end their accents reached a solemnity which reminded him of the lines, Religion, blushing, veils her sacred fires,

And, unawares, Morality expires.

(Laughter.) He was afraid he belonged to the class of people which Lord Charwood very pleasantly alluded to as people who seemed to think that the thing complained of must be, that it did not very much matter, that it had always gone on, and was very likely to go on, and that if it did not go on in one form it would go on in another. That was precisely his opinion. (Laughter.) He did not care very much about the resolution in the form Lord Selborne moved it, because, as far as he could make out, the effect of it would be absolutely nil. Even if they moved to resolve what Lord Selborne asked them to resolve, and even if they asked the House of Commons to move to resolve the same thing, he thought the effect of the transactions of both Houses would only be the expression of a pious and almost—he did not wish to say anything offensive—a slightly Pharisaical opinion.

Lord Charnwood was very enamoured of that well-known engine, a Royal Commission. His objection to a Royal Commission was that they either reported so much that it was impossible for a Government to do anything, or so little that it was not worth doing anything. (Laughter.) He had no doubt that a reference drawn on certain lines would be an extremely popular thing with the public, but he was reminded of what Mr. Justice Darling said the other day in another connexion when he told a jury that they ought to remember that public interest was not the same as public curiosity. There was very little doubt that if they had a Royal Commission, and if they had the Whips up, if any thing could be extracted from them it would very likely be of a kind which would be stimulating to their reading of the newspapers on that particular day. But he dared say that even under the guise of a Royal Commission very little would be extracted, and he thought there was very little to be gained by having a Royal Commission.

AN INTERESTING SYLLOGISM.

Was the giving of honours in this way such a terrible evil as all that? He would put it in this way. He had never been able to construct a syllogism, but he believed a syllogism could easily be constructed out of the following:—That, for good or evil, we in this country have for a long time lived under party government; that party government, of whichever side, requires large sums of money; that the more money there is the better the party government will be—that is, the machinery of party government will be more perfect. To that extent, therefore, he thought it was a good thing, as they must have party government, that it should be well endowed with funds.

The noble lord opposite was very angry with the caucus, but he was still more angry with plutocrats. Why was he so angry with plutocrats? He was not one of them himself, but he believed they were a very nice body of men. (Laughter.) At all events, he was reminded of Dr. Johnson's line:—

“Slow rises worth by poverty depressed.”

After all, if a man wanted to get on in this world, he was none the worse for having a little money, and, perhaps, able to persuade the party Whips that that money might be useful to the party chests. So, their lordships would see, he took the view that they were to some extent tilting at a windmill on which they would not make very much impression, and that there was a very great danger in any inquiry of this sort that their minds might be a little deflected by feelings which verged on those they associated with Mr. Pecksniff. They had heard that everything depended on enormous party funds, and that the great difficulty of the day was that every body wanted money. That, after all, had been the difficulty of every day. (Laughter.) And, as to things having become more expensive, everything had become more expensive, from their washing bill to a seat in Parliament. (Laughter.) He concluded with repeating that he did not care for either the resolution or the amendment, and that personally he thought the thing better left very much as it was.

THE TREND OF THE DEBATE.

Earl Beauchamp said that, while the Government offered no opposition to the motion, it seemed at present almost to call on the House of Commons to take effectual measures, whereas Lord Lansdowne thought that at present it would be sufficient if measures were taken by his Majesty's Government. He suggested the omission of the words “effectual measures should be taken.”

The Marquess of Salisbury said that there was nothing in the terms of the motion that threw the duty especially on the House of Commons or prescribed any particular measures. Steps must be taken by the Government or the Prime Minister or any other authority. It seemed significant that the suggestion should be made that they should pass a resolution but cut out the words that implied that effectual measures should be taken to carry it out.

The Marquess of Crewe said that the whole trend of the debate had been that they were unable to say that effectual measures could be taken.

The Muslim Deputation to the Viceroy.

ALTHOUGH at first sight it might appear that there were no pressing reasons for the Moslem Deputation to the Viceroy on Wednesday, the important pronouncement made by Lord Hardinge with regard to the “unswerving loyalty” of the community towards the British Government fully justifies the action taken by the Moslem leaders. It cannot be denied that since the Balkan war the loyalty of the Indian Mohamedans has lain, so to speak, under a cloud among a section of people in England, owing chiefly to persistent misrepresentations of certain papers who saw, or pretended to see, something ominous in the openly expressed sympathy of the Indian Moslems for their co-religionists in Turkey. Some of the papers even went so far as to declare that the Indian leaders had deliberately set themselves to the task of inflaming religious passions, promoting racial antagonism, and vilifying the Christian religion with the view of expelling the British from India. But the deadliest traducer of all, the National Review, gave publicity to a statement from its writer on Indian affairs,—whose identity is well-known,—that attempts were made by Moslem politicians to tamper with the loyalty of Moslem troops,—a statement the outrageous falsehood of which we exposed at the time. But however such statements might be, there is no doubt that the campaign of calumny in England had its inevitable effect,—with the result that the work, ideas and aims of a great community of seventy million people, always noted for their affectionate regard for British rule have been for some time widely misrepresented to the British reading public. It was with this feeling uppermost in their minds that the Mohamedan representatives approached His Excellency. They told the Viceroy that they had no grievance to point out nor requests to make but they appealed to the head of the Indian Government for an expression of opinion that their loyalty and friendly feelings had in no sense been impaired by their equally genuine sympathy with the troubles of Moslem races in other parts of the world. And Lord Hardinge's response to this appeal was characteristic of His Excellency's statesmanlike breadth of vision. After referring to the aspersions cast on the Indian Mohamedans by certain English and foreign writers, His Excellency declared: “I can well sympathise with your feelings of resentment at the aspersions that have been cast upon you and your people as a whole, but I can only assure you that I and my Government have never doubted the unswerving loyalty which we know quite well to be one of the noblest and most sacred traditions of your community. Thus, once more has Lord Hardinge cast oil on the troubled waters of Indian life, thereby earning the gratitude of seventy millions of His Majesty's Indian subjects, who give indications in the new spirit which animates them of a great and fruitful future.

The address of the Moslem delegates and the Viceroy's reply raise an important question which it is necessary to examine briefly. What foundation is there for Indian Moslem criticisms of British Foreign policy and what may be their claims with regard to that? As to this, Indian Moslems have always been careful to repudiate any claim to dictate the foreign policy of the Empire, as it affects Moslem States. Indeed, they must recognise that such a claim would be preposterous. It would be an insult to their intelligence to assume that they expect British to undertake the impossible task of a protectorate of all Moslem nations, but it may well be a cause of pain to the Indian Mohamedans to find how often the influence of England has been used against the independence of Moslem States. How far she could have used her influence usefully, or even safely, to protect Tripoli or Morocco may be questioned; but it would be idle to assert that in other parts of the world British influence always assisted in a thoroughly sympathetic policy. In Turkey England did her utmost to prevent the Balkan War, but it certainly seemed at its close as if she were ready to intervene in order that Adrianople, against the wishes of the vast majority of its inhabitants, should be again taken from Turkey. Happily we have been spared that injustice; but, in judging the words of Indian Mohamedans, it should not be forgotten that in England there have been those who have not been ashamed to preach a crusade against the Turk and clamour for his spoliation; nor, on the other hand, must our Moslem fellow-subjects forget that, terrible as have been the sufferings in the Balkans, a general conflagration would have been far worse, and a European war would most probably have been in the end as little productive of a just settlement as has been the recent war in the Near East—The Bombay Chronicle.

Lord Morley's Latter-day Thoughts.

It may seem an impertinence to seek for a single central or connective thought in a discourse whose very title, “Notes on Politics and History" (Macmillan), carries a disclaimer of singleness of purpose. There is, indeed, hardly one of the great secular issues regarding the meaning and method of history in its relation to human happenings that is not freshly re-set within the covers of this slender volume. What is the real part played by politics or the art of government in the wider stream of national life? How far can the Historic Method carry us towards a Science of History, and how far can such a science be a profitable feeder to practical statecraft? In the critical events of history how much does the reason or will of some "hero" or strong man prevail, and how far are these men the creatures or instruments of the spirit of the age? So with great thinkers and their books. How many of them rank with Grotius, Calvin, Rousseau, Adam Smith, and Paine, as actors in history, not mere commentators? Again, how profitably Lord Morley discourses of the general spirit of history as Weltanschauung, and the revolution wrought in man's entire outlook upon the universe by the acceptance of the evolutionary standpoint! Yet how slow is the world to reap the true fruits of the growing sense of inter-relation and of unity which should be the greatest contribution of historical science to the progress of humanity! For there has cut across this great cosmopolitan movement of the scientific spirit, with its manifold enlargements of human, world-wide intercourse, a new turbulent stream of Nationalism which for our time has actually weakened the wider "allegiance to humanity." What is, and shall be, the rightful place of the nation in the federal civilization of the future? Or turning once more to the substance of human history, how far can we find in it progress as a spontaneous force or a fixed historic law? Once more Lord Morley points out how recent and novel has been the idea of "progress," and what slight direct testimony history affords for the firm confidence which modern Western thought reposes in it. By what right, indeed, do or can we assign to the actual course of events the meritorious values conveyed in the term progress? The standard for such valuation cannot be got out of the study of history itself. Still less can "politics" be found amenable to any clear accepted ideal or standard of the good or humanely valuable. The spirit of Machiavel still powerfully pervades, if it does not dominate, the art of politics, and we find to-day a South African statesman repeating with absolute conviction the very language of the great Italian absolutist, "the State is Force." Lord Morley cites indeed Cavour's famous saying about "people like me who have more faith in ideas than in cannon for mending the lot of humanity," but he does not care to dogmatize upon the exact extent to which even the most enlightened State can dispense with Force. He prefers to leave the issue in the shape of the qualitative questions, "What sort of State, what sort of Force?" realizing that the dilemma for humanity ultimately springs from a too abrupt and finally unphilosophic severance of physical and moral motives.

But throughout the discussion of all these matters there seems to run what is perhaps not so much a single thread of argument as a single attitude or temper. It is the mature criticism of the practical politician upon the theory of politics, of one who has helped to make history upon the making process. To some readers, the sceptical and opportunist notes will sound overstressed. All the great questions he raises and leaves open. He owns no strict allegiance to the science of history or to a reasoned art of politics. Though quite polite to the historical method, he sets far stricter limits upon its powers and achievements than arm-chair historians would easily admit. "Political science suffers from the same defect as political economy in the earlier part of the nineteenth century. There is a strange rarefaction in its atmosphere. The abstract political man wears the same artificial character as the abstract man of the economist." It is by such false abstraction that history is made to seem to repeat itself, a process essential to the strictly scientific method. Historical parallels are commonly appraised too high; they are more often misleading than illuminating. "In truth, say what we will of the unity of history and the identity in the elements of human nature, the general body of two political cases is never exactly the same. Nations are not the same, their ideals are widely apart, their standing aims and pre-occupations are different." Hence it is the case that "History's direct lessons are few, its specific morals rare." Nor is the weakness of scientific history confined to the tendency to "fake" laws and principles by unwarranted abstraction. The study of history can never be assimilated to that of the natural sciences. For the subject-matter is too recalcitrant. Modern historians have, indeed, sternly set their faces against the partisanship and the sentimentalism of the older style of history. "To-day, taste and fashion have for a season turned away from the imposing tapestries of the literary historian, in favour of the drab serge of research among diplomatic archives, parish registers, private monuments, and everything else so long as it is not in print." Certain sorts of truth are doubtless attainable in this way, but can we get "the truth" about a character or an episode? "Bismarck, reading a book of superior calibre, once came upon a portrait of an eminent person he had known well. Such a man as is described here, he cried, never existed; and he went on in graphic strokes to paint the sitter as he had actually found him. 'It is not in diplomatic materials, but in their life of every-day that you come to know men.' So does a singularly good judge warn us of the perils of archival research." And, indeed, it is evident that in the selection, rejection, and utilization of the most reliable of first-hand materials, there is infinite scope for the personal bias of the historian. In a word, the reconstruction of the past, even to the simplest of its scenes or actions, must always be an art in which the personal tastes and proclivities of the artist play an immeasurable part. By conscientious self-restraint and patient balancing of evidences, the scientific historian may do much to release himself from the sophistication of a Macaulay or a Froude, but, if he is to interpret or make intelligible the past, he can only do so by imposing an order and a valuation which spring ultimately from the depths of his own personality.

If this is true of written history, still more is it true of living politics. The notion that even the most thoughtful statesman works out his policies or forms his judgment by nice balancing of "pros" and "cons" or cold calculations, cannot be seriously maintained. "Improvisation has far more to do in politics than historians or other people think." "Both contemporaries and historians, more often than they suppose, miss a vital point because they do not know the intuitive instinct that often goes farther in the statesman's mind than deliberate analysis or argument." This of course, does not signify that historical information and reasoning from facts count for little, but that such knowledge and the scientific principles it may yield are only handmaids to the art of politics. In other words, genius for politics consists more in a fine tact or feeling than in an exact weighing of the evidence. "For myself at least," Lord Morley again quotes Bismarck, "I have often noticed that my will had decided before my thinking was finished."

If this is applicable to the political actions which are submitted most clearly to the judgment of individual statesmen, how much more will it hold of the part contributed by public opinion, popular movements, or party projects to the work of making history? Lord Morley pleads for patience with those who express such bitter disappointment with the working of democracy.

"Popular government, or any other for that matter, is no chronometer, with delicate apparatus of springs, wheels, balances, and escapements. It is a rough, heavy bulk of machinery that we must get to work as we best can. It goes by rude force and weight of needs, greedy interests, and stubborn prejudice; it cannot be adjusted in an instant, or it may be a generation, to spin and weave new material into a well-finished cloth."

We think that here Lord Morley does somewhat scanty justice to the capacities of popular Government. No writer has commented more incisively upon the uses and abuses of metaphor in politics. Political discussion cannot, indeed, be conducted without frequent recourse to metaphor. But a great deal depends upon whether metaphors are drawn from the organic or the inorganic world. When Burke was the advocate of constitutional freedom and reform, the constitution was a tree; when he became the fanatical enemy of change, it was an edifice or a machine. The issue is a truly vital one, the difference between a structure containing no inner energy of growth and no power of self adjustment and one that is, however slowly and imperfectly, responsive to the new needs of the time and the larger and more complex work it is required to do. No doubt there is an element of the merely mechanical in the instruments of popular Government, as in every institution. But the hope and efficacy of democracy depend upon the vital energies which can direct and improve these instruments so as to secure more of an organic and a spiritual character from the structure and the operations of a "body politic."—The Nation.

The Colour Question.

THE following address was delivered by Mr. Jela! Shah before the National Union of Clerks in London:—
Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen,

Before I proceed with my address, I feel that I owe you an explanation for my appearance before you to-night. Owing to the inability of Mr. East to deliver his address on the "Colour Question," as had been previously arranged—which I am sure is a matter of very great regret to all of us—your energetic Secretary. Mr. Goldwater, came to me the other day on what, to all intents and purposes, appeared to me at least to be a perfectly peaceful mission. I was certainly aware that this subject was down for your deliberations this evening and at a moment of thoughtlessness on my part, Mr. Goldwater had already extracted a solemn pledge from me to take my humble part in your proceedings of to-night and that piece of business had been transacted, if my memory serves me right, as long ago as last summer, almost directly after my return from my holidays in the country. I am not going to give you the details of the exact procedure adopted by your Secretary in gently breaking the sad news of Mr. East's inability to keep his engagement to-night, as well as the soft yet strongly persuasive manner in which he desired me instead to accept the responsibility of delivering an address on this undoubtedly important question myself. Suffice it to say that Mr. Goldwater on the occasion of his recent visit to me came, talked and conquered, and in brief I could not help falling a miserable victim to his magnetic personal influence; and here I am.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I make no apology in counting upon the indulgence of the meeting in attempting to place before you the salient points arising from the subject under discussion, a subject, I need hardly remind you, not determined upon by myself, but all the same, a subject which is obviously of vital interest to me and my fellow countrymen. The lack of time before me, under the unavoidable circumstances with which you are now familiar, has certainly prevented me from devoting the necessary attention and study to the subject, which it undoubtedly deserved; but my task this evening will no doubt be made easy if you, ladies and gentlemen, with your usual courtesy, would bear in mind, as I earnestly trust you will, that I am to-night only acting the poor substitute's part and not by any means discharging the duties of a lecturer, who has the subject his own.

Turning now, ladies and gentlemen, to the subject of my address, I must frankly admit that, by including the "Colour-Question" in the list of your sessional programme, your Union has shown that lofty and thorough grasp of high ideals, that insight of affairs in general, and that broad-minded awakening to facts concerning the community at large, that are of absolute necessity, if you are going to look beyond your immediate environments and if you are going to attach any importance to the educational aspect of your work. The "Colour-Question"—to me personally the very term is revolting, for which perhaps my religious and professional training, which happily recognises no colour, creed or caste, is mainly responsible—the "Colour-Question," I am giving it the name it has received in ordinary usage, is as you will readily understand, a very wide and elastic expression, if we are going to divide the entire population of the globe into the two sections as is usually done; persons of colour and I suppose persons of no colour or anemic individuals, (laughter) European and non-European races; orientals and occidentals; Easterns and Westerns; though, of course, it must be remembered that the term—Colour Question—deals with a much larger area than that indicated by some of these geographical designations.

Now the question we are about to discuss has been gradually though steadily becoming prominent amongst the public of this and other countries. It has been engaging the serious attention of what is usually called the white peoples. On the whole very divergent but none the less strong views are held by different schools of thought concerning the relations of the white races with those who are conventionally called coloured races. Some people in Europe and America are unfortunately so heavily saturated with their inborn prejudice against us that they would never miss an opportunity for showing their condemnation and hatred towards their coloured fellow creatures. They are utterly devoid of reasoning and common-sense. They have been brought up in the school of colour-prejudice and nothing in the world would for one moment induce them to consider the subject from a higher plane and to approach it in a purely unprejudiced and disinterested spirit. With this class of people, of course, it is perfectly useless to discuss, as nothing, however sound and reasonable, would succeed in shaking off their hereditary and traditional views on the matter. Another section of the so-called white population will "tolerate" us, but will not conceal the fact that they are all the same, fully conscious of their superiority over the whole coloured population. These are the more sentimental class of the community and though they are prepared to go to the narrow length of toleration in their relation with us, they are certainly not ready to proceed a single step further in that direction. Even their sentimentality, which has created a certain amount of fellowship and fellow-feeling in their conscience, has a well-defined limit. On coming down a step further we meet with a school of thought, which on humanitarian grounds considers all men as equal and which is therefore ready to treat the coloured races on the same level as the whites, showing no distinction whatsoever in its conception of humanity at large. This doctrine, however, so noble and so great in theory, I am sorry to say, is not always followed in practice and consequently a considerable number of this "humanitarian" Society are really so theoretically, though it is only fair to admit that an overwhelming majority of them do certainly observe not only the letter but the very spirit of their fundamental doctrine. Yet another portion of the white races is guided in its behaviour towards us entirely by political considerations. If diplomacy dictates a more sympathetic policy, they are immediately changed into "friends" and "well-wishers," but their true colours are alas! only too transparently veiled by their political garb of apparent friendship, which deceives nobody but themselves. There is still another creed which as a class is favourably disposed towards their coloured colleagues. I refer to the professional, literary and scientific bodies. Any individual of whatever caste, colour or creed, distinguished in any branch of science, arts or literature, is honoured by them and respected and though, generally speaking, such is the case, we certainly from time to time meet with cases in which even in this enlightened circle, the golden rule has not been followed.

So ladies and gentlemen, you will at once realise the difficulty one has to face in dealing with the abstract problem embodied in the term, Colour-Question. As I have tried to remind you, there are numerous channels through which we could tackle this problem, everyone of them from a different point of view. I cannot possibly handle the subject with anything like justice, were I to enter minutely into a detailed discussion under all those various headings, which I have placed before you, as the time before us will not permit. But, if you would allow me, I intend to treat the subject mainly from the two standpoints of, firstly, what I may call "education" and secondly, of "politics." As regards the other aspects of the question, perhaps, I may be pardoned if I were to dwell upon the subject in general terms.

Now let us consider the situation with "education" as our basis. Let education, civilisation and intellectual attainment be the bed-rock of our discussion for the moment. It is the very key-note of the whole problem and it undoubtedly is our strongest case. Comparing the two artificial divisions of mankind—divisions, let it not be lost sight of, as I have always held, merely and solely for the sake of argument—I frankly admit we have not reached that pinnacle of civilisation that has been arrived at in the West, if we are to attribute to "civilisation" the Conventional Significance with which it is associated in Europe. I need not again remind you that I am speaking of the entire white race as a whole, as contrasted with the entire body of coloured races. The critic who travels all over the huge Continents of Asia and Africa and for purposes of criticism just selects some of the savage races in those parts of the world to help him in his arguments against us, is guilty of bad sportsmanship. To judge the entire coloured race for instance, by the low degree of civilisation and education that undoubtedly prevails amongst the aborigines of India or the pagan races in the heart of Africa would be similar to presenting the barbarous inhabitants of the Balkan Peninsula or even the rebel tribes of the United States as typical representatives of the Continent of Europe and the New World. That would be an absurd and an impossible position to adopt, though even in that case, I am not sure if our "representatives" would not hold their own against such "representatives" of the white races, as I have just mentioned. No, let not the critic forget that if the white population contains in its ranks such great nations as the Anglo-Saxon, the Teutonic, the Russians and the Latin races, we can also boast, and I think rightly boast of our Indian, Persian, Egyptian, Japanese and Chinese elements, who, if unfortunately have by force of circumstances fallen back to-day from the front rank of education and civilisation have, as is only a matter of history, in the past played a great and noble part in the field of Science and Learning. It is not my duty on this occasion to inflict upon you a lecture on ancient history but, you will pardon me. I hope if, in passing, I may just draw your attention to the deep debt of gratitude Europe owes to-day to some of the great nations of the East. Is it not a well-known fact of history that the Moorish occupation of Spain was immediately followed by the Universal extension of various branches of Arts, Science, and Learning in which the Arabs excelled and which was not excelled without its influence towards the moral, Social and intellectual uplifting of Europe as a whole?

Need I similarly remind you of the extraordinary impetus that was afforded to the assimilation of knowledge in the Continent of Europe by the great works that had already been accomplished in Egypt? Do you not associate the fundamental origin of the Science of Astronomy and Mathematics, and particularly that of Algebra, with the ancient Egyptians? And are you not aware of the immense Share the ancient Arabs could claim in the advancement of Science in general and Chemistry and Medicine in particular? I am not making these statements without authority. They are recognised and established facts.

China could boast of an age of civilisation and progress, when nothing but darkness reigned in the West. India was a land of intellectual and industrial activity at a time when Europe was labouring under a deep spell of ignorance and barbarism. Hindustan was leading the way in philosophy, when the rest of the world was undergoing an extraordinary transformation in the struggle for her very existence.

Let me now briefly deal with Persia. Can we possibly forget the heroic role this ancient kingdom has taken in the educational and political history of the world? The Persian Empire of old had spread a network of civilisation within its boundaries, which, even during those primitive days, was indeed remarkable. Persian literature and Persian poetry have always been awarded the place of honour in the code of the world's literature and I am sure our famous poet, Omar Khayyam whose "Rubaiyats" have been made immortal by Fitzgerald's excellent English translation of them, is not altogether unfamiliar with most of you in this hall to night. The Omar Khayyam Society of London to day is a living monument to his extraordinary intellect and philosophical genius. The critic may again tell us that he is fully aware of all these qualities that have been attributed to the various Asiatic nations and that he admits their respective shares towards the civilisation of the world at large; but that all what I have stated are things of the past. Can the so-called coloured races show us to-day the same standard of educational attainment and intellectual achievements? Or are they now also gifted with the same degree of civilisation as compared to the white races, that has been their distinguishing feature in the past? I confess that would be a reasonable attitude for our opponents to take up. It is unfortunately true that taking us as a whole, we have certainly failed to keep up the brilliant record of our forefathers. I shall attempt in a few minutes to explain to you the reasons for our descent in the ever-changing ladder of intellectual and educational superiority, though I am not prepared to admit that we have for a single moment ceased to be what you may perhaps call a "civilised community." But in the meantime, I shall be failing in my duty if I were not to place before you, what I think significant fact, that even in accordance with Western ideals and Western sentiments, individually we have not moved even a hair's breadth backwards from the progressive path of education and culture in the various fields of learning. Even to-day in India we can rightly boast of a Rabindranath Tagore, whose literary fame has travelled all over the world, and whose eminence in the field of literature was only the other day acknowledged by the award of the coveted Nobel Prize. (Cheers.) The student of literature will come across numerous writers of both prose and poetry at this very moment in India, whose talent and worth will favourably stand the most critical comparison with their contemporaries in the West. Modern India has not been backward in holding her own even at the English Universities. The Chancellors' Medal at Cambridge in English literature was only last year awarded to an Indian, which speaks for itself, and the Senior Wranglership has likewise repeatedly fallen to Indian Mathematicians of renown, to say nothing of the numerous scholarships and exhibitions that are being daily won by Indian undergraduates, in competitive examinations, at both Oxford and Cambridge, as well as in the various provincial Universities in Great Britain. In legal and medical education, we have shown the same proficiency in this country, as is well-known to those who are in close touch with these two learned professions. There is no honour list in any British University which members of the so-called coloured race have not adorned, and I feel a natural pride in making that statement. The science of medicine even to-day claims several Asiatics amongst its most brilliant workers. A distinguished Indian physician from Bombay occupied the honoured position of Vice-President at the annual meeting of the British Medical Association, held in London a few years ago, and the International Congress of Medicine, which sat in this great Metropolis last summer, was attended by several Asiatic delegates of European reputation, who took no mean part in the deliberations of that august assembly. Medical literature abounds to-day in the valuable researches of Japanese, Indian and other Oriental scientists who have left their mark in the history of tropical medicine. Even the celebrated Ehrlich, whose name will go down to posterity as the discoverer of "606" or Salvarsan, the present day remedy for one of the most dreadful ailments we know of, had a Japanese physician, Hatar as his right hand man in his research laboratory in Germany, and has with characteristic courtesy prevailing in this noble profession associated the latter's name with his own as a co-benefactor to the suffering humanity.

The Land of the Rising Sun in the far East has likewise contributed its share to the world's literature and poetry, and the superb poetry of Yone Noguchi has rendered his name a household word in England. Similarly we find Utamaro, the celebrated painter of Japan, holding a position unique even in the famous rank of the great masters of the present age.

I have, as no doubt you will understand, been obliged to just refer to a few cases only, in my attempt to remind the meeting that even to-day we are not by any means wanting in men, whose culture and intellect would certainly entitle them to respect and admiration, not only in the East, but in Europe and America as well. I trust I have succeeded in driving home to you the fact that judging us individually and personally, there is certainly no widespread intellectual decay and educational degeneration amongst us in the East—as is held in certain quarters in this country—and that, comparing the Orientals with people of the Occident, there is still as much individual knowledge and as much intellectual refinement amongst the inhabitants of Asia and Africa as we find amongst those of the Western world. (Hear, hear.)

Now let me turn back for a moment to the comparatively lower grade of national education that exists amongst the States, inhabited by the so-called coloured races. I think you will find my reasons for this condition of affairs satisfactory, if you are in any way acquainted with the contemporary history of those dealing with lands. Again I find it necessary to make it clear that we are the coloured races as a whole; and as a matter of fact, with the time at our disposal, it would be impossible to discuss the matter in detail. Now I need not remind you that the various nationalities in the huge continents of Asia and Africa, for purposes of discussion, must be sub-divided into two main groups: those who are independent and those who are directly or indirectly under foreign control. Let us take, in the first instance, the case of the independent Asiatic States, which, alas! are only too few. In this group, at the present moment Japan is pre-eminent amongst others, not only in the material progress of the country but also as regards her freedom from European influence. It is true this ancient country, as a result of the misgovernment and despotism of her rulers, had sunk very low in the scale of national education and national culture, but the extraordinary changes, almost miraculous it seems to me, that have been brought about in that marvellous island kingdom in the Pacific during the last 40 years have been instrumental in at once placing the Japanese amongst the leading nations of the world. (Hear, hear.) During those 40 years, which after all is not a very long period for a national movement of reform to be undertaken with adequate success, the Japanese determined to safeguard their national interests and passionately bent on seeing their house put in order, have, as you will and must admit, achieved what might perhaps go down in history as its most brilliant chapter of the past century. I am the last person to deny that almost equally remarkable events have occurred in Europe during the 19th century, e.g., in France, Germany and elsewhere; but the exceptional conditions that exist in Asia, which make it so hard, if not actually impossible, for Oriental nations to progress, surrounded, as they are, by the ever-vigilant eyes of crafty European diplomacy, that is traditionally hostile to Asiatic progress and territorial expansion, you will at once realise the true greatness of this stupendous wave of Japanese reformation. So, I am sure you will bear me out in my statement that national advancement and national education in a really independent Asiatic country are on the same level as they exist in most, if not all, the Western countries.

Now let me deal with the second group, mainly those states in Asia which are directly or indirectly under foreign control and foreign supervision. I am not going here to discuss the merits or disadvantages of European annexation of Asiatic States, on which I certainly hold very strong views, but which must not influence us when we are considering the existing conditions in the East as they are at present actually situated. In other words, we must approach the question calmly and dispassionately, if we are going to endeavour to reach the solution of the problem. Now, when we carefully survey this group of cases, we are driven to the only conclusion that we can possibly arrive at. It is a mere question of cause and effect. Foreign control and alien rule have always exercised a restraining influence over national evolution and national advancement. Even with the best intentions, they naturally retard the progress of education best suited for the foreign-governed country. The spread of education, under each condition, mainly proceeds through the medium of the foreign language, and in consequence the national language, the mother tongue of the people, gradually loses its original significance and its reality. Public business is necessarily carried on in the foreign language, if not immediately on annexation or conquest, not very long afterwards. Could there be a more forcible check on the national progress of subdued communities imagined? Is it then surprising that national education in such cases becomes arrested? This state of affairs is not explainable only in Asia but is, as you know, equally noticeable in some of the smaller States of Europe under foreign yoke, such as Finland, Poland, etc. So I maintain that what we find in such Asiatic countries, where unhappily the freedom, independence and integrity of the States are either completely lost or to a great extent interfered with, is the effect of those causes which I have, I hope and trust, in no obscure language tried to place before you.

If the standard of education and the degree of civilisation amongst various nationalities are to be the lines upon which we are to judge such communities, after what I have ventured to explain to you, I hold that you cannot condemn the so-called coloured races as in any way inferior to the white population. An educated and a civilised man, whether he is of the East or of the West, must be treated and dealt with as such in any enlightened community. On the other hand, it is obvious that lack of education and want of culture or refinement, whether in an Oriental or Occidental, for, believe me, one is only too frequently brought in contact with such individuals in Europe as well, should certainly be the governing factors in our estimation of people. So, if this is to be the law of communion between man and man, I am sure you will agree with me when I say that we must once and for all do away with that disgraceful relic of past barbarity, which is involved in the term "Colour-Question," itself symbolic of an uncivilised age. The "Colour-Question", I am now speaking to the English members of the audience, is of vital importance to you, as great Britain's wide interests in Asia and Africa render the subject of what I may term momentous consequences, if this delicate matter is handled carelessly and wantonly. You will, I hope, forgive me if I candidly tell you to-night that during my now, somewhat long stay in this country, nothing has surprised or indeed pained me more than the wide and universal ignorance, which unhappily prevails in England, even amongst those who ought to be better informed, concerning the conditions and the destinies of millions of Asiatic and African peoples, who owe allegiance to the king. The average Englishman, and even the average politician for the matter of that, is only too ready, I admit, through want of information to show his indifference towards the great problems in the East, which are daily presenting themselves for solution. He can unfortunately seldom shake off his prejudices and his sinister views and look upon this truly Imperial question in a truly Imperial fashion. He seems to forget that the sacred heritage which has been handed down to him by his forefathers is too serious a problem to be ridiculed and played with. The varied constituents who go to form this mighty Empire, he overlooks, are with him fellow-subjects of the same king, and as such, fellow-citizens of the same realm. I am not an alarmist by nature, but I must warn you of the great disasters which must necessarily follow if people of Great Britain would not open their eyes to these facts. With them, at any rate, there is no earthly excuse for the retention of the term "Colour-Question." May I, with deference, remind them that the British Empire does not consist of the 40 million souls in these islands only? There are no less than 315 millions of His Majesty's subjects in India itself, who are as self-respecting and as enlightened a community as any that is this day contributing to the glory, good name and honour of the British Empire. They are, need I draw your attention to it, originally of the same stock of mankind from which the British race itself has sprung, viz. the Aryans. They are fellow-citizens and fellow-subjects of the same Empire and as such they rightly and justly demand the same freedom and the same privileges that are the birth-right of every British subject—privileges that have been definitely and clearly promised to them by Her late Majesty Queen Victoria in her memorable Proclamation of 1858 and twice since confirmed with equal preciseness by similar proclamations of the late King and His present Majesty. Can a stronger case be conceived or a more cogent reasoning imagined, when your fellow-citizens in that great Dependency of the Crown desire, and I think do so with justice, that the ridiculous colour bar, which has unhappily so sharply divided them from their fellow-subjects in other parts of the Empire, should be forthwith abolished? If England takes pride in her Indian Empire, and if the British Crown boasts of its millions of Indian subjects, is it not only fair that India should take its proper part in the vast family, that has helped to make the Empire what it is to-day? Nelson's famous words—England expects every man to do his duty—were not merely meant for Trafalgar. They are applicable to-day with even greater force. Every Englishman, who has an atom of patriotism still in him, must do his duty to his fellow-subjects, to say nothing of sentimental and humanitarian grounds, which likewise warrant his sympathy, good-will and confidence towards his fellow-creatures. We are often told that India is the brightest jewel of the British Crown. If that is so, why then all this turmoil and fury about the Colour-Question? It is simply monstrous to think that, in spite of the long and intimate association that has existed between this country and India, we still find such strong colour prejudice amongst the people of Great Britain. They are over-anxious to reap the fruits of their Indian Dependency but they are reluctant to acknowledge the sterling worth of their Indian fellow-subjects. They are ready to enjoy the full benefits of their Indian investments but, no, they are unwilling to open their heart and conscience towards their Indian benefactors. They are always prepared to sing the praise of their Indian fellow-citizens, but they are both to convince them of the reality and honesty of their purpose. In theory, we find them fully conscious of the common tie that so strongly binds them together with their Indian compatriots, but in actual practice they are guilty of the most wicked disregard for the great and sacred laws of fellow-citizenship.

It is a deplorable scene indeed. The results and the consequences of this extraordinary attitude of mind may be still more deplorable. The reaction bound to follow, which heaven forbid, will be the outcome of their own folly. The responsibility will lay on their own shoulders. Even now it is not too late to prevent that awful catastrophe. Let every Englishman rise to the occasion and let him follow the traditional ideals of his race. Let the past be forgiven and forgotten and let them set themselves seriously to the task that lies before them. If he extends his hand of genuine fellowship to his fellow-subjects—and I assure you, that would be the only possible solution of the problem—he is bound to meet with that generous and hearty response, characteristic of the East. I make bold to say that the Englishman with any colour prejudice is a danger to the safety and well-being of this mighty Empire.

The Empire, so jealous of her own honour, cannot afford to let such an unpardonable offence be meted out to a great section of her citizens. Colour-prejudice cannot and must not prevail in England. The sooner the so-called Colour-Question evaporates, the better for every one of you, for England and for the whole Empire. (Cheers.) The era of peace and tranquillity and the dawn of brightness and progress will gleam over the over-sea possessions of the Empire only if and when this root-evil is completely and thoroughly eradicated. When colour-prejudice is dead and buried, then and only then could the Empire be embodied under the common flag as a strong crystallised mass of living territory, over which one could truly say the Sun would never set. Until then, it is divided and scattered into a multitude of discontented units, which would do no credit to the Empire itself nor to the great and varied parts of which it is composed. Apart from this consideration, so vital in itself, you must not lose sight of the fact that England is to-day in political alliance with a great Asiatic country, which is as keenly sensitive and as justly proud of her own racial traditions as you are of your own in this country, and that significant fact must certainly weigh in your general out-look, when you proceed to seriously consider the subject under discussion.

You will, I hope, forgive me in having taken so much of your precious time, but I trust I have succeeded in showing that all what we see in the East to-day is nothing but the essential effects of all those causes that I have just enumerated. But apart from our political lethargy, brought about, as I have already said, entirely by the force of circumstances, I emphatically maintain that morally, intellectually and socially we are to-day, as individuals, situated on the same level as the people of Europe.

I have yet to come across a European who has had the occasion to closely study the character, temperament and characteristics of Asiatics—whether individually or as a whole—and who, mind you, has judged us impartially and fairly, who would not confess the truth of that statement. I am the first to admit there are numerous examples amongst us, who would bring nothing but disgrace on their own community, just as there are similar instances amongst yourselves who would equally dishonour the good name of your own community. Do not judge the so-called coloured races by a handful of individuals that you may have possibly known yourselves, or of whom you may have heard. Neither do we deceive ourselves by judging, say the people of this country, by Tom, Dick, Harry and Jones.

Compare our best men with the best amongst yourselves and you could then realise how little there is to choose between them. On the other hand you may contrast the worst amongst us with the most detestable section of your own community and I assure you the difference will not be very great, indeed. (Cheers.)

If we are going to sit in judgment on the merits or drawbacks of any community, that will be the only possible method before us for collecting reliable and trustworthy evidence.

Approaching the question with an unbiased mind, I submit, you will not thus fail to immediately and definitely discard this wicked doctrine, which underlies the term Colour-Question, and which has been the root-cause of so much unpleasantness and hatred in the past. You will thereby feel the satisfaction of having contributed your own share towards the promotion of that universal peace, harmony and concord, which should be the earnest aim and object of every thinking man and thinking woman. This emancipation of the human spirit in the West from the thralldom of the rusting traditions of old world be secured only if you are prepared to recognise your duties and your obligations between man and man, irrespective of colour, caste or creed.

If you are ready to take that noble and honourable part in the sacred cause of humanity at large, then—

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share;
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere;
They only live who dare!

THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF AL-BAYANFIULUM-UL-QURAN

HELD AS AN INTRODUCTION TO THE COMMENTARY
OF THE

HOLY QURAN CALLED TAFSIR-I-HAQQANI.

The original book was written by M. Abu Muhammad Abdul Haqq Haqqani of Delhi in the Indo-Arabic language. The learned author has left nothing untouched concerning what is required for a valuable book of this nature. The unfair objections raised against Islam by its enemies, through their ignorance or injustice, have been treated and refuted at full length. The existence of God through reasonable arguments, the refutation of suspicions and doubts raised by Agnostics and Atheists, the discussions on the nature and attributes of God, filled with deep learning and logical reasoning, together with refutations of the false and absurd assertions of the opponents are subjects worthy of appreciation by lovers of truth. The nature of angels, their existence as independent beings, their transformation into any shape they like: the thorough investigation of these statements of the rationalists and philosophers on the subject: the debates on the mission of the true Prophets; the different aspects of inspiration; and revelation, the proof of the miracles performed by the Prophets and Saints; the just answers to the plausible statements of the disbelievers in the Prophets and their miracles; the soul and the next world; the transference of man to it; the reward and punishment of good and evil deed; the refutations of spurious religions and of Atheists by their insufficient and false teachings; together with reasonable answers to the suspicions cast by the malignant spirit of the enemies of Islam and the false imputations charged by them against the holy person of the Prophet, together with the testimonies borne in favor of him by the critics of Europe, have been fully described in this translation.

An abstract of review by the Comrade:—The translation in English is quite good. The printing and get-up is excellent: Messrs. Thacker, Spink & Co., being responsible for it. The book has about 750 pages, but from beginning to end besides being learned and instructive is very interesting reading for a Moslem, and more so for a non-Moslem in search for truth about Islam. The book for the sake of convenience is divided into three chapters, and has an Introduction which deals with knowledge gained by External Senses, Internal Senses, by Revelations and by means of Signs and Emblems. The first chapter deals with the last and the greatest of all the Prophets of God, Mohamed, the attributes of God—the creator of the universe, Sanctification, Angels, Genii, Soul Resurrection, and the next world, with objections raised by opponents of Islam and answers to them. The second chapter is the most important as it deals with the early history of Islam, gives a brief sketch of the life of the Prophet, and discusses fully all about crusades, polygamy and inspiration of the Holy Quran, Judaism, Christianity, Vedas, Buddhism, Jainism, etc. It explains the Divine Science in the Quran, explaining the prayers, Zakat, Fasting, Haj and Jihad. In the last chapter, a great deal is explained about the Old and the New Testaments and the portions thereof which have been lost. Very useful information is given about the Christian and the Hindu sects, and closes with an account of Zoroastrians. It is a book which will be most useful for the English educated Moslems, as it would give them a very clear insight into their faith, and prepare them to defend it easily against the attacks of the Christian and other Missionaries. Books like this dealing with the modern الكلام were badly needed and we strongly recommend all to purchase and study it carefully."

FATEHPURI, Delhi, 22nd September, 1912.

The English translation of "Al-Bayan," the famous book written by Maulana Abdul Haq, has been given to me for reading and reviewing by Hajee Muhammad Ishaq.

The book is so well translated that the beauties of the author's style and diction have been amply preserved. This treatise would be a most valuable addition to the Islamic literature in the English language. It expounds in a most lucid and logical manner the teaching of the Great Prophet, and gives a rational and logical refutation of all the attacks on Islam.

This book would be useful both to the Mohamedan readers and those Europeans who want to learn the truth about Islam.

(Sd.) M. A. ANSARI, B.A., M.B., M.D., M.R.C.S., I.R.C.P.

This book will be a best companion to the Moslems and non-Moslems in India and Foreign Countries and the members of the New All-India Mohamedan Religious Association. Price has been reduced from Rs. 15 to Rs. 10/8 so that learners of truth about Islam may easily purchase it.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor
of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Repees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parlez necessary.

The Week.

Ulster

London, April 12.

Colonel Seely, speaking at Draycott, said there had been grave danger of bloodshed in Ireland through hot headed persons seizing arms in isolated depots. Hence this moving of troops to Ulster. His orders were punctually and implicitly obeyed but Conservative newspapers went mad on the subject. Colonel Seely, denied that there had been a plot to butcher Ulstermen, many, including the majority of officers and men of the army, apparently believed. Moreover, the belief of many Liberals that there was a plot in the Army to disobey, and to shatter Home Rule, was groundless. His determination simply was to safeguard Government property, and it was never intended to employ the Army to crush political opposition. Thereby, the great principle for which their forefathers had fought had been upheld.

The Civil Service Commission.

London, April 10.

The report of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service will be published shortly. The Daily Telegraph understands that it will contain drastic proposals, including a complete discontinuance of patronage.

THE FOURTH REPORT ISSUED.

London, April 14.

The Fourth report of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service has been issued. It deals with the home Civil Service and recommends closer co-ordination of the educational systems and the Civil Service examinations and also greater facilities for progress from primary to secondary schools and Universities. When a person is appointed through patronage to a high administrative position, a statement of his qualifications et cetera must be laid before Parliament. Various similar regulations are proposed, restricting patronage in professional and technical appointments.

Turkey

Constantinople, April 15.

The Vali of Mosul reports fighting at Barzan between Turkish troops and rebel Kurds under Sheikh Abdul Selah. The Kurds lost heavily, the casualties including eight Chiefs. They fled and are being pursued by the troops.

Turkish Loan.

London, April 10.

Agreements in connection with a big Turkish loan and other financial facilities, also regarding Turkish concessions to French groups have been initialled in Paris.

Constantinople, April 18.

A correspondent of the Daily Telegraph says that according to the Bill ratifying provisional loan agreements, recently initialled in Paris, the loan amounts to 85,400,000 pounds Turkish.

Turkey and Egypt.

London, April 9.

The Mussalman world in Egypt is greatly perturbed over the unconfirmed report that the Egyptian Officer Aziz Ali who organised the Arab resistance in Cyrenaica has been sentenced to death in Constantinople. The charges have not been published but it is stated that he was charged with mismanagement of Government funds at Tripoli. The Times in an editorial says that if a judicial murder has been perpetrated, relations between Turkey and Egypt will be seriously affected and probably not only between Turkey and Tripoli.

London, April 11.

The Italian garrison at Magusal Tripoli repulsed an attack by six hundred tribesmen killing and wounding a hundred. The Italians had nine casualties.

London, April 10.

According to a telegram to the Times from Teheran, brigands have attacked and looted a gendarmerie convoy between Sultanabad and Kum. Major Moeller was wounded.

Bitlis.

Constantinople, April 8.

A telegram from Bitlis reports that all is quiet and that troops have arrived there.

Albania.

Durazzo, April 9.

It appears that the Albanian Government has mastered the situation at Korytza and that the insurgents have surrendered. The movement is regarded as suppressed.

Vienna, April 9.

The reply of the Triple Entente to the Greek note regarding Albania and the Aegean Islands has been handed to Count Berchtold. The Entente proposes to use its influence to secure that the rights and wishes of the Epirotes shall be respected in Albania and demands guarantees for the rights of the Mohammedans in the Islands, ceded to Greece.

London, April 11.

The Times in a special article describing the situation in Northern Albania says that while everything is at present quiet, conditions do not inspire confidence for a peaceful future. The paper pays a tribute to the restraining influence of Colonel Phillips commanding the international garrison at Skutari in averting the tribute and counselling patience to restless tribes who object to the incorporation with Montenegro but says that the trouble is inevitable unless the frontier is altered.

Durazzo, April 15.

Preparations for the equipment of the Militia are proceeding actively and will be completed in a few weeks. Then, if necessary, the Prince will march southward at the head of his troops and will take forcible possession of territory assigned to Albania by the Powers.

Epirotes' Revolt.

Athens, April 12.

Albanians occupied villages between Premoti and Leskoviki. They were attacked by Epirotes and compelled to withdraw with heavy loss.

Athens, April 14.

The programme of Albanian concessions to the Epirotes includes a sort of local self-government with scholastic and religious autonomy on condition that the Epirotes make immediate submission.

London, 14th April.

Hedjaz Railway.

Bombay, April 13.

An interesting report has come to hand regarding Turkish activities in Arabia. He says the Turks are said to be determined to extend the Hedjaz Railway from Medina to Mecca. A party of Turkish engineers and surveyors are reported to have arrived at Medina for the purpose of making fresh preliminary investigations in connection with the project. It is reported, however, that the Bedonins who have hitherto monopolised the pilgrim traffic between Medina and Mecca are opposed to the scheme and are threatening to give trouble and are said to have sworn that they will not allow the line to reach Mecca. It is already rumoured that the tribe of Hurb have raided Jeddah and lifted some cattle and camels.

Writing on the situation in the Hedjaz the Mecca correspondent of the Cairo Arabic paper the Al Makattum says:—"The Vali Wahib Bey, a brother of Essad Pasha, who defended Jannina in the recent war, is trying to recruit young Arabs for Turkish army in spite of the fact that the people of the Hedjaz are already exempted from military service. He is also attempting to introduce changes into the administration and to start various innovations. Many Hedjaz notables of the Vilayet have sent telegrams to Constantinople demanding the dismissal of Wahib Bey. The Sheriff of Mecca has also intervened in the question in consequence of some sanguinary encounters taking place between the Turkish troops and the Arabs. There is an unconfirmed rumour that an attempt has been made upon the Vali's life.

Afghanistan.

Allahabad, April 15.

The Pioneer's frontier correspondent states that on reaching Kabul the Amir issued orders for the Governor of Kandahar to send to Kabul two Raisis from each tribe as he intends to raise volunteer regiments from the tribesmen, under officers to be selected from their respective tribe.

Constantinople, April 15.

The sentence of death passed on the Egyptian officer Aziz Ali has been commuted to one of fifteen years' imprisonment.

The German Emperor.

Bukharest, April 13.

The German Emperor will shortly pay a visit to the King of Rumania. In diplomatic circles it is declared that the object of the visit is to strengthen the relations between Rumania and the Triple Alliance in view of recent Russian efforts to obtain influence with Rumania.

THE POLITICAL CRISIS.

THE political crisis arising from the resignation of General Gough and the officers of the Cavalry Brigade in Ireland has been exclusively engaging the serious attention of the country and Parliament during the past few days. Nobody seems for the moment inclined to discuss the question of Ulster or the Home Rule Bill. The Army problem is the sole topic of comment and it has eclipsed all other important political matters. The debates in the House of Commons have surpassed anything that I can remember in the way of heat and party feeling. Not even at the height of the Veto Bill or the Insurance Bill controversy was the House ever so excited and so uncontrollable as it has been these days. "Scenes" are of frequent occurrences and disorders and interruptions follow as a matter of course. The most violent unparliamentary language and expressions are being constantly thrown across the table and the speaker's position is a most unenviable one for the moment. I have never before seen hon. members so fully determined to take advantage of the least provocative. Even a challenge for a duel has been flung to an Irish member by a Unionist. Only two days ago, the First Lord of the Admiralty was "reluctantly and with respect" obliged to withdraw the expression "hellish" in obedience to the chair. Mr. Winston Churchill was certainly provoked by a question from Mr. Amery, which, as the Speaker remarked, ought not to have been put. Mr. Amery had asked whether the First Lord hoped there would be bloodshed and disorder in Ulster so that he may use the Navy to put down the revolt. The Speaker was immediately on his feet. The hon. member had no right to put a question of that sort and he would not allow it. But, all the same, Mr. Churchill rose soon after. "Since the question has been put," he proceeded angrily, "With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House, I would like to say that I repudiate that hellish insinuation." The Opposition was instantly in an uproar. Even Mr. Lowther, who had risen to intervene, could not be heard for a few minutes. He was at last understood to say that he hoped the right hon. gentlemen would see his way to withdraw the term "hellish," which was quite unparliamentary. He quite appreciated the feelings which had prompted the First Lord to show his temper, but he really could not allow an unparliamentary expression to go on record. "I have been in this House for 14 years," retorted Mr. Churchill gravely, "and have never been requested to withdraw anything I have said before. If you rule it so, Sir, I beg, with respect, to withdraw the epithet "hellish." This is after all a small incident in the House, but it serves to indicate the kind of feeling and the party spirit which is to-day surrounding hon. members in all quarters.

Brigadier-General Gough and his officers had resigned their Commissions rather than to lead their men against the Ulster Protestants. They were summoned to the War Office and, as a result of negotiations between them and the Army Council, have been, for the time being at any rate, satisfied and accordingly reinstated in their former ranks. Though the public was given to understand by the Brigadier that he had received a written assurance from Col. Seely and Sir John French to the effect that he and his officers would never be called upon to act against Ulster in order to force upon them the Home Rule Bill, the officers had hardly returned to the Curragh camp in Ireland, when the ministerial statements in both Houses of Parliament disclosed the extraordinary fact that such assurance had not been given to General Gough on the responsibility of the entire Cabinet, but on that of the Secretary of State for War alone, that it was therefore inoperative, and further that Colonel Seely, for having thus misled the Prime Minister and his colleagues, had resigned his office and that, still further, Mr. Asquith had refused to accept his resignation. The Cabinet had approved of the following reply being sent to General Gough, when Sir Arthur Paget, Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, had informed the War Minister that the Brigadier and most of the officers of the Cavalry Brigade had decided to send in their papers of resignation, if they were ordered to proceed to Ulster. The document, which was initialled by Colonel Seely, Sir John French, Chief of the Imperial General Staff, and Sir J. S. Ewart, the Adjutant-General, proceeds thus:—"You are authorised by the Army Council to inform the officers of the 3rd Cavalry Brigade that the Army Council are satisfied that the incident which has arisen in regard to their resignations has been due to a misunderstanding. It is the duty of all soldiers to obey lawful commands given to them through the proper channel by the Army Council, either for the protection of public property and the support of the Civil Power in the event of disturbances or for the protection of the lives and property of the inhabitants. This is the only point it was intended to put to the officers in the questions of the General Officer Commanding, and the Army Council have been glad to learn from you that there never has been and never will be in the Brigade any question of disobeying such lawful orders."

As mentioned before, the above text was approved by the Cabinet, but, through an "error of judgment," the War Minister, who was not present during the whole sitting of the Cabinet Council when the draft of the above document was under discussion, added the following lines to the official reply sent to General Gough: "His Majesty's Government must retain their right to use all the forces of the Crown in Ireland or elsewhere to maintain law and order and to support the Civil Power in the ordinary execution of its duty. But they have no intention whatever of taking advantage of this right to crush political opposition to the policy or principles of the Home Rule Bill." The inclusion of this additional statement to the official reply, of course, would at once serve a death-blow to the Government and it would clearly indicate their submission to the Army demands—which could never be tolerated by the country as a whole. For some reason or another, Lord Morley has admitted a sort of "half-share" in the responsibility with Colonel Seely for these additional clauses in the document, but he never tendered his resignation to the Prime Minister on that account; whereas the War Minister's reason for so doing was the fact of his having unconsciously committed his colleagues in the Cabinet to a statement, which they had never approved of. There are all sorts of rumours in the air to-day—that Sir John French and Sir J. S. Ewart have also resigned, that the War Minister and the Colonial Secretary are exchanging places, etc. The Premier is making an important statement in the House to-night and until the official announcements are made, one cannot, of course, rely upon such rumours.

In certain quarters, both Liberal and Labour, it is being freely hinted that the King has used his influence in favour of the Army demands in this crisis. Mr. John Ward, the Labour member, who sits on the Liberal Bench, was the first to give expression to this view. During a fiery speech in the House the other day, he emphatically declared, amid loud Ministerial cheers, which were renewed again and again, that the question was whether the people through their representatives in Parliament were to make the law without interference from the King or the Army. This view, it must be frankly admitted, is generally shared by the rank and file of the Liberal Party. No more convincing demonstration in favour of this view could be witnessed than the spontaneous scene that occurred in the Smoking Room of the National Liberal Club the other day, when the deliberate remarks of a member—"three cheers for John Ward for saying what we all think"—were received by an outburst of cheering and applause that could not possibly render its meaning and significance at all doubtful. The Commons debate has at all events disposed of the mischievous rumours relating to the King. It is not, however, the least of the services of Mr. John Ward's memorable speech on Tuesday that it has brought these rumours to the floor of the House and settled them finally. The Prime Minister's unequivocal assurance that the King has throughout this trying ordeal acted in strict accordance with constitutional practice—that is, entirely and exclusively on the advice of his ministers—will give universal satisfaction.

What effect the Government's official withdrawal of Colonel Seely's additional clauses in the reply to General Gough will have as to the future attitude of the Brigadier and his officers is yet to be seen, but it is certain that the matter will not be allowed to rest where it is.

The Government for obvious reasons cannot afford to submit to the demands and the dictates of the Army. That would at once break up the very fundamental principles of Parliamentary Government. The Army has obeyed in the past, and must obey in the future, the orders of its constituted authorities, whether the Liberal or the Conservative Party is in office. Nothing but disaster and ruination will overcome the British nation, if the Army were to take sides in politics. The soldier's duty is to obey his superior officers, whether he happens to be a Private or a General. It is not for him to argue one way or the other. The Army is maintained by the nation as a whole—not by the Conservatives or the Liberals exclusively. If General Gough's example is allowed to go unpunished, it will no doubt serve as a most mischievous precedent. Mr. Asquith must deal with this problem firmly and promptly and in any steps that he may take to establish the lawful and constitutional rights of Parliament he can depend on the entire and unwavering co-operation of all thinking men and women, irrespective of any political creed or party, who believe in the formula—"Government of the people by the people."

RECEPTION AT THE PERSIAN LEGATION.

The Persian Minister held a Reception at the Imperial Legation last Saturday, the 21st inst. on the occasion of Nawroze or the Persian New Year. A very large gathering, which included the prominent members of the Persian colony in London, had responded to His Excellency's invitation, among those present being His Excellency Tewfik Pasha, the Turkish Ambassador, the Argentine Minister and Mme. Dominguez, the Greek Minister and Mme. Gennadius, the Norwegian Minister and Mme. Vogt, the Rumanian Minister and Mme. Mian, the Portuguese Minister, the Bulgarian Minister, the Serbian Minister, the Siamese Minister and Mr. Archer, the Spanish Minister, M. Tomanowsky, Sir Arthur and Lady Clementine Walsh, Lord and Lady Lamington, Col. C. E. Yate, M. P., and Mrs. Yate, Sir Alfred Newton, Lady Owen-Mackenzie, General Jardine Hallows, Mrs. Moud, Sir J. D. Rees, M. P., Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, M. P., Sir Henry Dalziel, M. P., Sir John Rolleston, M. P., Mr. and Mrs. Amcer Ali, Dr. Rutherford, Sir Joseph Walton, M. P., Lady Harcourt Smith, Sir Thomas and Lady Barclay, Sir Thomas Jackson, Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Hugh and Lady Barnes, Colonel and Mrs. Sykes, the Hon. Harry Lawson, M. P., General Beresford Lovett, Mr. Abbas Ali Baig, the Hon. Eustace Fiennes, M. P., Sir Charles and Lady Lyall, Colonel Rundall, Mr. Stephen Gwynn, M. P., Dr. Chapple, M. P., Mrs. Alwyn Parker, Mr. Percy Armytage, Mr. R. F. Sylge, and Mr. and Mrs. Greenway.

THE AGA KHAN.

His Highness the Aga Khan has arrived in Europe and is at present in Monte Carlo. His Highness, I understand, is contemplating a visit to East Africa in the immediate future and is not likely to be in England for some months, possibly till the beginning of the autumn. This, of course, is the Aga Khan's present arrangement, which he will certainly carry out, unless anything unforeseen may occur, which might possibly necessitate a change in his programme. So far as one can judge now, it is unlikely that His Highness will be able to preside at the annual meeting of the London Moslem League in the summer, which will be keenly regretted by the Indian Moslems here. His presidential address last year, in which he gave such splendid and sound advice to the young Indian Moslems, stands as the distinguishing feature of that memorable occasion. The London Moslem League's Annual Meetings, unless relieved by the presence and the eloquence of some distinguished Moslem from India, such as His Highness himself or a few others, who have honestly and faithfully served the community—and that too, let it be at once said, without the least personal interest or selfish motive—are very dreary and dismal proceedings. One or two "friends" of Indian Moslems—almost invariably drawn from the ranks of the retired Anglo-Indian community—are generally put up to act the "adviser," and we meet, on such occasions, with the old old story again. The speeches of individuals like Sir John Somebody, K. C. I. E., or Mr. Thomas Something, C. I. E., do not now-a-days appeal to the bulk of Indian Moslems in London, particularly to the younger generation.

As I have mentioned in one of my recent letters to you, Mr. Amcer Ali has an excellent opportunity before him, if he would only take advantage of it. Let "bye-gones be bye-gones" and let him seriously rise to the occasion and he is sure to find the young Moslems perfectly willing, and in fact only too anxious, to extend to him their respectful co-operation and their humble recognition of his position, for which his eminent literary services to Islam in the past have rendered him so highly qualified.

MEMORIAL SERVICE FOR DEAD TURKISH AVIATORS.

After the usual Juma-Namaz last Friday at Lindsey Hall, held under the auspices of the Islamic Society, a short memorial service was held for the repose of the souls of the three Turkish aviators, who have recently lost their lives during a flight across Turkey to Egypt. The Khwaja Kamal-ud-din of Woking Mosque and Kazi Hareddin Effendi, who is attached to the Ottoman Embassy, officiated. The service, which was intensely impressive, was attended by a large congregation.

THE PROPOSED WOMEN'S MEDICAL COLLEGE AT DELHI.

The announcement in the Press, which has appeared through Reuter's Agency, of the laying of the foundation-stone of the proposed Women's Medical College at Delhi by Lady Hardinge, is heartily welcomed here by the Indian colony. This institution will undoubtedly provide what has been a long-felt want in India and is certain to facilitate the conditions for the proper study of medical science by Indian women to an unparalleled degree. It is true the existing medical colleges in India have been open to lady-students as well, but the fact remains that, under the present conditions, there are numerous intelligent and industrious young women, who, though anxious to qualify themselves as doctors, have not been tempted to join such institutions. The new scheme, under which the future lady medics will be able to pursue their studies and investigations in a medical school exclusively reserved to themselves will in time produce excellent results.

A country like India is particularly in need of capable lady-doctors. The handful of European and Indian lady-doctors who are to-day so nobly attending to the sufferings and agonies of the women in that vast Continent are hardly sufficient and the supply is hopelessly out of proportion to the large demand throughout the country. No sensible Indian can have anything but admiration for the small army of European lady-doctors in India to-day, whose devotion and attachment to their patients, rich or poor, and whose professional efficiency and scientific attainments have rightly earned them the universal esteem and regard of their Indian sisters. But it will not be ungenerous or disrespectful by any means if one has to lay it down as an axiom that the conditions and the circumstances prevailing in India require the discharge of these heroic and sacred duties, mainly at any rate, through the medium of the noble daughters of the soil themselves: just as one keenly feels now-a-days the great necessity for the wider recognition by the Government of the sterling worth and professional eminence of the numerous Indian medical men, with the best and the highest British qualifications, who could bring nothing but honour and fame to the teaching staff of any hospital in the country, but whose merits are entirely overlooked in favour of English surgeons, mostly from the ranks of the I. M. S., which Service is to-day practically enjoying the sole monopoly for all the "prize" appointments on the various hospital staffs in India. I hope to write shortly a special article for the Comrade on this all-important question and so I am not entering into it in this letter, but am only contenting myself with the problem of female medical education in India. Already there are some Indian lady-doctors in practice, who possess the best medical qualifications, degrees and diplomas that the English Universities and Examining Boards could give. It may perhaps be interesting to recall that the very first lady member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, after that highest surgical Body in Great Britain had permitted women to offer themselves as candidates for its various examinations only three years ago, was a Parsee lady. I do not for one moment insinuate that there are no European lady-doctors in India with good qualifications, but I am perfectly confident of the existence of Indian lady-doctors to-day with at least equal, if not higher, qualifications. Such Indian lady-doctors will be offered a new avenue for serving their sisters and their country, if they are appointed as teachers in their respective special subjects in the Delhi Medical School, when fully matured. No doubt, at the beginning it may not be possible to fill all the appointments by Indian lady-doctors, and it will be necessary to engage suitable European lady-doctors from England or perhaps from the existing hospitals for women in India, which are, at least as far as the higher grades of appointments go, entirely conducted by European lady-doctors. But, even at the beginning, those responsible for the proposed Delhi Medical College would be well advised to make an appropriate number of Indian appointments on its staff. It is perhaps premature to discuss these points now, but the matter, even at this early stage, is well worth considering.

A great move has thus been made in the field of female progress and female enlightenment in India. The question of the medical training and medical education of Indian women is of vital importance to the country as a whole. The problem goes to the very root of the progress, welfare, health and well-being of the community at large. There are at this moment thousands of Indian women perishing for want of medical care and medical attention. They are ready to sacrifice their very lives rather than seek the advice and assistance of medical "men;" and we know there are not sufficient medical "women" to alleviate their sufferings and, if possible, to save them from certain death and disaster. They are hopelessly ignorant of the most elementary principles of Eugenics and are equally in the dark as to the sacred duties and responsibilities of motherhood. What an appalling mortality in child birth prevails in the country!

In spite of the various excellent lying-in institutions in India, it is a fact, and a very deplorable fact indeed, that there are hundreds of women there who daily discharge the perilous functions of matrimony in their own homes, amidst the most unfavourable surroundings that could be possibly imagined, rather than take advantage of the comfort, safety and luxuries of science that would be at their disposal in such hospitals. Is it, therefore, surprising that statistics show such a dreadful mortality amongst Indian women on such occasions? The so-called midwives, who in most cases attend them, know nothing, not even the rudimentary essentials, of the science and art of obstetrics and the abominable ignorance of such midwives of the fundamental laws of antiseptic surgery—the very thought of which would make Lister shudder in his grave—is responsible for the vast sacrifice of so many precious and dear lives. There are scores of other instances and other afflictions peculiar to women which are so cruelly allowed to proceed to their fatal terminations for the mere want of timely gynaecological assistance. All these calamities are chiefly due to the great lack of Indian lady-doctors in the country.

The proposed Medical College for women, as I have said before, supplies a long-felt want, and the institution will have the best wishes of all those who have the true interest of India at heart for its success and welfare.

TETE À TETE

We desire to inform the subscribers to the Ottoman Treasury Bonds that the Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris has been authorised by the Ottoman Government to pay the first instalment of the capital (one-fifth) and also the interest for first year on the Treasury Bonds which were in the first instance directly or indirectly purchased through this Bank. The coupons of those Bonds purchased from other banks may also be sent to this Bank for collection. The coupon to be cut is the one on the right hand side of the Bonds (No. 1) and both the coupons for interest and redemption should be sent together. We had received numerous letters from subscribers asking us to state what procedure they should adopt in case they did not desire to get the interest. We have now been informed, in reply to our inquiry, by the Acting Ottoman Consul General at Bombay that those subscribers who are not willing to draw interest on the Bonds, while sending the Bonds for payment, may write on the Coupon of interest: "Interest is not required and left for the benefit of the Ottoman Treasury."

An Associated Press message from Bombay states that the deputation to England from the Indian National Congress, consisting of Messrs. Mazharul Haque, Sachchidananda Sinha, Krishnashahay Samarth, S. Iyer, S. B. Sarma, and Mohamed Ali Jinnah left Bombay by the mail steamer on the 18th. instant. Mr. Bhupendranath Basu will not, however, leave for another fortnight. Mr. Jinnah interviewed about the object of the visit stated that the deputation would place themselves in the hands of Sir William Wedderburn, who was making all arrangements for them. The most important question to be dealt with was the reform of the Secretary of State's Council, as it appeared that the idea was to change the character of the Council from a consultative to an administrative one. Other questions included the Press Act and separation of judicial and executive functions. "We propose," said Mr. Jinnah, to put our views on behalf of the people of India before the Secretary of State for India if possible, and before the members of Parliament in support of the demand which was made at the Congress last session as well as at the meeting of the All-India Moslem League. We trust the people of India will back us up by holding public meetings and passing resolutions as soon as the Bill is before the country." The questions that the deputation will have to deal with have been most seriously engaging the attention of the Indian public for some time past, and each of them formed the subject of important resolutions at the last sessions of both the Congress and the All-India Moslem League. We trust the deputation will do its work thoroughly and will receive full and unanimous public support from this country. The Bill for the reorganisation of the India Council has not yet been introduced in Parliament, but in view of the anticipated changes in the constitution and powers of the Council it is bound to be an important measure, and the Indian public opinion should be on the watch to prevent it from becoming a reactionary one.

We are glad to learn from Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din Sahib that his missionary efforts in England are daily growing in fruitfulness. His regular series of lectures on Islam in the Mosque at Woking every Friday attract large audiences who evince great interest in the religion of Islam and earnestly follow the discourses in which the Khwaja Sahib expounds its spirit and doctrines. This "invasion" of Islam has produced anxiety and alarm in the

The Preaching of Islam.

Christian missionary camp, as is evident from the two extracts from the English papers which are reproduced elsewhere. It is not without its significance that the Christian missionary should have begun to recollect his duty nearer home only after a Mussalman missionary has appeared on the scene to preach his simple message of faith in a Christian land. The difficulties of the Khwaja Sahib's mission are obvious enough, but he is gradually overcoming them by his courage, patience and noble zeal for his faith, and the success that he has already achieved is in every way solid and full of abundant promise. We learn that two more Englishmen have embraced Islam a few weeks ago through the Khwaja Sahib's efforts. Their original names were Edward Woodward and Albert Smith (dental surgeon), and they have been given the Islamic names of Mohamed and Abdul Qadir respectively. It is of the utmost importance to organise regular and adequate financial help in India in order that the scope of the Moslem missionary effort may expand according to its growing needs in England. More funds are needed as well as more competent and devoted workers to help Khwaja Kunal-ud-Din Sahib in his great and arduous undertaking. In his long communication published in Hamdard, the Khwaja Sahib explains the nature of the work he has to do, the difficulties that he has to face and the type of the workers he needs to help him at this stage. He points out with special emphasis that the missionaries that may be sent out from India to share his labours must be staid, experienced men of mature age. Young men with imperfect training and little control over the impulses of youth would probably involve the whole missionary effort in disaster. He rightly advises the Delhi committee that has selected a youngman like Anis Ahmad for the purpose to leave him first of all to gain experience in India and prepare himself by self-discipline for missionary work before he goes out to preach Islam in foreign countries. Intellectual training is only a part, and by no means the most important part, of the missionary's equipment. It is the living example of a well-ordered, clean and noble life that wins converts to a new faith.

We noted last week how the majority of the Anglo-Indian papers have tried to belittle the importance of the Moslem Deputation to the Viceroy by the simple method of "ignoring" it. Nothing more decent or honest could apparently be expected from the amiable gentlemen who had taken a hand in the innocent game of mud-splashing and scandal-mongering. We were curious to know how the matter would be treated by the arch-instigator of the campaign of "under against the Mussalmans and creator of the "Indian Peril," the Times. We searched through the copies of the Times received by the last mail to find any reference to the Moslem Deputation, and it was only after a long search that we came accidentally across a few lines thrust away inconspicuously in a corner without any headline, which seem to have been taken from the Reuter's message on the subject. This is how the public in England is served by one of the loudest custodians of Imperial interests. Surely the Deputation's Address to the Viceroy and His Excellency's reply deserve at least as much space as the Times devoted to "selections" from the correspondence between the Rt. Hon. Syed Ameer Ali and Mr. Syed Wazir Hasan. No Mussalman can forget the part played by the Times in creating the fog of suspicion and mistrust about the attitude of his community, and it was due to its own journalistic sense of duty and fairplay to make some reparation to those whom it had tried to injure by its wicked libels. But fair dealing is not a part of the game in which the Times and its numerous henchmen are engaged for the glory and prestige of the Empire. Only a future historian will be able to measure accurately the harm done to true Imperial interests by the type of journalism which flourishes by pandering to the vanity of dominant cliques, by exalting expediency at the sacrifice of truth, by setting class against class and by denouncing whole communities in unmeasured terms if they show the least desire to claim a fair and decent treatment in the councils of the Empire. The suppression of the truth is not less wicked at times than the active propagation of falsehood, and if the Times has not hesitated to preach falsehood occasionally, it is not unoften that it has deliberately suppressed the truth. We think the Times is not unaware that there is a law of contempt in British India, and nothing would give us greater satisfaction than if it brought a charge of defamation against us in the court of the District Magistrate of Delhi.

The trial by the military court at Constantinople of Aziz Bey, the Egyptian officer in the Turkish army, on certain grave charges has created some amount of sensation—thanks to the chivalrous efforts of certain disinterested English on-lookers in Egypt and the very chivalrous Times. From the gushing narratives of the correspondents of some English newspapers—the inevitable Egyptian correspondent of the Pioneer is, of course, in the front rank of this gallant band—it would seem as if the whole of Egypt were seething with ferment and the entire Arab world were in revolt on account of the monstrous decision of the Turkish authorities to try according to the law an officer accused of corruption, dishonesty and insubordination. This mischievous agitation seems to have been working to set design. First of all came the shrieking little paragraphs from "our own correspondents" in Egypt and elsewhere who discovered the growing excitement and indignation amongst the Egyptians and the Arabs, whose love for Aziz Ali Bey, we were assured, verged on infatuation. Then came the deliberate assertions that the trial would be a farce, that Aziz Bey was innocent, that the charges framed against him were vague and false and that he was to be got rid of in that way because he had incurred the jealousy of Enver Pasha on account of the great fame and popularity he had acquired amongst the Arabs by his heroic deeds in Cyrenaica. Last of all came that grave and ominous portent in the political sky, a leading article in the Times, bristling with all the dread phrasology that it can command so well when it is trying to exaggerate or create an international crisis. It felt a sudden sympathy for the Egyptians and made the fate of Aziz Bey its special concern. It drew attention to the deplorable impression that would be produced "throughout the Arab world were sentence of death, whether executed or not, to be passed upon this gallant officer, whose chief offence seems to be that he served the cause of his fellow Arabs too devotedly, and thus acquired a prestige that gave offence in influential Young Turkish and Pan-Islamic quarters." One fails to see why the prestige of Aziz Bey should have given offence in influential "Young Turkish and Pan-Islamic quarters." The Young Turks have often been denounced by the Times itself as "Pan-Islamites" and the "Pan-Islamism" of the Times imagination has always appeared to us to be some sinister attempt to organise the entire Mussalman races of the world into some militant confederacy against Europe or Christendom. But this is a mere inconsistency that can hardly touch the invulnerable honour of the Times. It snited its object just at present to play the Arabs and the Egyptians against the Turks and the case of Aziz Bey was fastened upon as lending itself magnificently for the purpose. It went on to say that the passionate interest taken at Cairo and in other Arab centres "in what must be termed his persecution by the Young Turkish authorities indicates the nature of the feelings that would be aroused should harm befall him." Gathering up all its solemnity at this point it continued: "Great Britain is responsible for the maintenance of order in Egypt, and cannot therefore remain indifferent to any untoward incident that would stir Egyptian feeling." It admitted that Aziz Ali is not technically an Egyptian. He is, as a matter of fact, of Circassian descent domiciled in Cyrenaica. It also admitted that he "is a Turkish officer and is subject to Turkish military discipline." One should have thought after this that the fate of Aziz Ali would be of no concern to the British Government or even the Times. But, no; the Times discovered a warm and sympathetic corner in its heart for the Mussalmans and would not see them treated fairly. Turkey might yet be an independent sovereign State, and Aziz Ali an Ottoman subject and amenable only to the laws of the Ottoman Empire, but the Times in its excessive love for the Egyptians and the Arabs and the Mussalmans in general would have little patience for the Turk, his independence, his sovereignty or his laws. "Great Britain, who is responsible for the good and just government of so many millions of Mussalmans, is in duty bound to see that no legitimate means of preserving Aziz Ali from 'accident' of any kind is left untried." And it wound up with a solemn exhortation to the Ottoman Government "to appreciate the importance of our position, and take it fully into account in their dealings with Aziz Ali Bey." It would be hard to find in journalistic banalities anything to match the mockery of it all. The Times in its role as a friend of the Mussalmans is often a sight for the gods. We need not recall the circumstances, still fresh in the memory of the Indian Mussalmans, how the Times had sympathised with them in their recent troubles. Its love for the Egyptians and the Arabs is also an old passion, the full measure of which was tasted by them just after the memorable affair at Denshawai. We have full admiration for the services of Aziz Bey in Cyrenaica and we regret as much as any of his admirers that he should have been found guilty of serious crimes. But the Turkish Ministers are not a pack of fiends who are bent on hunting to death all patriots and devoted servants of the Ottoman Empire. They know their business and their duty, and can well afford to treat the vile attacks and insolence of the Times and their other traducers with the contempt that they deserve. The men in power at the Sublime Porte to-day are not of the pliant and feeble stuff of which Kiamil was made. The Times is very well aware of this, and hence its subtle efforts to sow difficulties in their path by cleverly playing on the alleged susceptibilities of the Egyptians and the Arabs. We doubt, however, if the patriotic and intelligent Egyptians can be easily made its catspaws and its dupes.

In the course of a letter received with the last mail, Mr. J. H. Polak, whose son's great services in the cause of Indians in South Africa are so well-known, writes to us: "The last news from South Africa by cable seems to be much more satisfactory and "I have hopes that a permanent settlement, in accordance with the wishes of the leaders of the Indian community there, will soon be arrived at. Of course one cannot expect to get all they ask for, but "I believe that the principal points have been conceded." Writing about the proposal of Mr. Frank O'Donnell to establish an India House in London, Mr. Polak says: "The idea of Mr. Frank O'Donnell, re a 'grand India' House in London—non-sectarian, non-political, not 'under the influence of the India Office or of any other official body'—managed by a joint body, partly on the lines of a club and somewhat on the lines of the Colonial Institute and Society of Arts combined—is a splendid one. You ought to be able to collect the funds in India, say £150,000, within a month, if you try personally. It could also be a sort of Indian Chamber of Commerce in London. I should be pleased to act on its executive and make it a huge success. India does not advertise itself sufficiently in England." We invite the attention of our readers once more to the suggestion of Mr. O'Donnell and we think a discussion of the scheme and its details by our readers would be appreciated by Messrs. O'Donnell and Polak.

MR. SYED ABUL AZIZ, Barrister-at-Law, Bankipore, writes to us:—

"There are very few Indian problems which are more pressing and important than the question of Indian students in England. But it is not easy to get the apathetic Indian public interested in a subject which is neither sensational nor sectarian. Matters of real importance are apt to get obscured and shelved when the country is so easily plunged in a ferment either about Cawnpore affair, Ajodhya riot, special electorate or election to various Boards and Councils, which mostly occupy the anxious thoughts of our politicians. It is, however, a matter of satisfaction to me that a section of the Press and a few public spirited men have from time to time taken notice of the Indian students in England. The news that an unofficial committee is being formed under the presidency of Lord Haldane for bringing young Indians into intimate touch with the better sides of English life will be received with great gratification by all those who take interest in the education of the Indians. But none can welcome this announcement with greater delight than I do, for during my residence in England, which terminated over a year ago I had the occasion to discuss at some length in the Press the question of Indian students in England. In dealing with the situation which called for serious consideration, I urged the necessity of some such unofficial movement as the one on foot which will minimise the evils of the official Bureau at 21, Cromwell Road. As one who has endeavoured within his small powers and opportunities to remove misunderstanding and promote friendship between the English and the Indians, I feel constrained to remark regretfully that the bitterness of feelings and disagreeable experiences of the Indian students have largely grown since the creation of the central Bureau, whose method of operation, with all its good intentions, has resulted only in subverting the object which thoughtful Indians and Englishmen alike have at heart. Any genuine desire to help Indians in making the best of their stay in England is bound to be appreciated by them. The hospitable treatment which Indian students are likely to receive at the hands of some eminent and magnanimous men who are forming the Committee will bear fruits that will be enjoyed both by Indians and Englishmen. I trust the students will realize their sense of duty and responsibilities and will avail themselves of every opportunity to enhance their social status, to advance their intellectual attainments and to improve their physical fitness." It would not be without interest to peruse the following sentence in a letter addressed to India by an "Indian Resident in London." He says: "I have occasion to see a good many Indian students in town, and am in a position to say that the majority of the students look upon this and similar other attempts of organised patronage as charity, which no self-respecting Indian would think of accepting. Although the Committee is said to be unofficial, and, as it were, spontaneous, yet the names of many officials, and others connected with the Cromwell Road organisation, are to be found in the list of the members of the Committee. This point has not passed unnoticed." For our part, we are not inclined to agree with the view that the "Hospitality" Committee regards the social assistance it proposes to give to Indian students in England in the light of "charity", and there is such a thing as super-sensitiveness. As for "21, Cromwell Road", we do not think it right to pass an adverse judgment without further enquiry, though we have no hesitation in saying that it is in very bad odour with Indian students who suspect it of espionage. Many have dubbed it "the Thana." But the "Hospitality" Committee need not be involved in the same odium and we await with interest the result of this new and welcome experiment. Its membership, though somewhat mixed, gives promise of excellent results and, to point out only a few names, who could distrust a Committee which includes men like Sir William Wedderburn, Sir Herbert Roberts, M. P., Mr. Edwyn Rowan, Mr. Howell, Mr. Herbert Burrows, and, last but not least, Mr. H. G. Wells. We wish the Committee every success.

The Comrade.

Aligarh Old Boys.

SINCE 1907, when the Aligarh Old Boys' Association for the first time secured a constitution, every recurring annual re-union used to be attended with a crisis of no little importance to the College and to the Association; for the forces which had succeeded in securing a constitution for the Association after a hard struggle had still to contend with those who were anxious to keep the Association within "manageable" proportions from the point of view of the reactionary that mistrusts the multitude. Luckily, however, the Old Boys' Association had a franchise that was the despair of the reactionary. Unlike the Trustees of the Aligarh College, whose numbers are limited and who become members of the Board by co-option, every Old Boy of Aligarh could become a member of the Association by contributing one per cent. of his income. The reactionaries aimed at killing all interest in the Association on the part of its present and prospective members, so that they could always remain in office and use it as a tool in furtherance of their own designs and in thwarting the efforts of those who held different opinions. On the other hand, those that desired to see the Old Boys take a deeper interest in the affairs of their Alma Mater and a correspondingly larger share in the administration of its affairs worked hard to increase the membership of the Association. For many years one saw the strange spectacle of the office-bearers of the Associations doing less than nothing to increase the number of its members and yet reluctantly offering the tribute of well-deserved praise on this score to those whose influence in the Association they heartily desired to diminish.

But even though the Association became "unmanageable" in size, its office-bearers continued to "manage" it, because most of its members were scattered over a vast area, and when they met together once a year at Aligarh, they were no match for a powerful clique that controlled resident members. These latter were for the most part in the service of the College, and thus in awe of the Association's office-bearers who also happened to be Trustees possessing enormous power on the Board of their employers. The non-residents, however, could not be easily canvassed by any party, and when they came to Aligarh their votes could be easily divided. Naturally, they were averse to the making of parties within the ranks of a brotherhood, and a certain excess of "conscience" supplied the place of party discipline. The result was, however, intolerable, and a Reform League was founded with a view to canvass the members and secure a solid vote in the Annual Meeting of the Association based on the views of the majority of the members of the League. In other words, a new party was created with a view to crush the party feeling created by an existing clique.

This homeopathic treatment succeeded in effecting a cure in a remarkably short space of time. Those who established the Reform League had always had logic and ethics on their side; but logic and ethics do not always prevail in such contests, and, therefore, "brute force" prevailed. By organising their forces on party lines, they added "brute force" also to their stock of ethics and logic. Their opponents soon gave up the game as lost, and one by one fell away and ceased to take any interest in the Association. The result is that among the resident Old Boys also, the remnants of the old clique cannot secure a majority, and the Association is at last free to work without party machinery. Those that honestly apprehended a permanent split among the Old Boys through the establishment of the Reform League are now satisfied that they were wrong to think so, for the Reform League has quietly disappeared after the breakdown of the old clique. This has synchronised with a period of unprecedented prosperity for the Association. For the first time its membership reached four figures and its income reached five last year. The Report of that year was a record of great progress, but even more significant was the tone and temper of the meeting in which it was presented by the new Honorary Secretary. The proceedings were characterised by a camaraderie which was wholly unlike the party spirit of the previous years, and the perfect unanimity that prevailed was shown by the easy passage of a new set of rules and the voting of so large a sum as Rs. 25,000 for the construction of the Old Boys' Lodge which was first decided upon in 1907.

When the Old Boys met once more this year, the atmosphere was to some extent charged with electricity. This looked something like a return of the old clique days and needs some explanation. Last year a new element, then only imperfectly understood, was introduced in the annual meeting. An Old Boy had proposed that Sir Theodore Morison should be received in a fitting manner by the Association a few days later when he intended to revisit the College. There was nothing strange in honouring a former Principal, though many members of the Association frankly mistrusted the attitude of Sir Theodore towards the College, and almost all disapproved of his share in the decisions of the Secretary of State with regard to the Muslim University. But signs were not wanting to show that the honouring of Sir Theodore Morison was intended by some of those who had at first suggested it not as the honouring of a former Principal, but of a present member of the India Council. When this event came off, the suspicions entertained at first began to be confirmed, and more recently they have been proved to the hilt. Whatever one thought of the old clique one had to admit that its motive-power was to be found among a section of the Old Boys themselves. But the new element that has begun to make itself felt seems to receive its mandate from the outside. Last December, on the occasion of the Annual Sessions of the Educational Conference and the Muslim League, there was a remarkably large attendance of Old Boys, and the mandatories asserted themselves with a degree of self-confidence that was alarming. They insisted on the Honorary Secretary's renunciation of his connection with the "Servants of the Ka'aba Society" and threatened to go on a strike if their demands were not accepted. This stiffened the attitude of the Honorary Secretary who had been contemplating a resignation of his office in the Association itself, and he now announced the intention of continuing in office for the full term. This resolve was assisted by the confidence which an overwhelming majority of the Old Boys then present at Agra appeared to repose in him.

Shortly after this a special meeting of the Trustees of the College was held at Aligarh in which an unfortunate resolution relating to the Old Boys' Association was passed in the teeth of the opposition of a large number of Old Boys who took part in the deliberation as Trustees. We dealt with this matter at the time and need not refer to it in great detail. The old rules of the Association made it possible for a student expelled by the authorities of the College to be admitted as a member of the Association if a majority of the members voted in his favour. This rule appeared to be too harsh in one respect and too lenient in another. To treat every expulsion as a disability seemed unnecessary, and it was, therefore, decided that only such expulsions should make an Old Boy ineligible for membership as involved, in the opinion of the authorities of the College, a degree of moral turpitude. But naturally no disability could constitute a perpetual bar. Nevertheless, it was decided that if a majority of two-thirds, instead of an ordinary majority as under the old rules, voted in his favour, an Old Boy who had been expelled from the College could be admitted as member of the Association. Of course if the bar was removed by College authorities themselves, there was nothing more to be said about the matter. As a further restriction it was decided that the question of such an Old Boy's admission could not be raised in the Annual Meeting merely on his application as under the old rules, but required the recommendation of the Central Standing Committee as a condition precedent. These rules were drafted by a Sub-Committee of which the College Proctor was an approving member. The draft had been circulated in February, 1913, fully a month before the Annual Meeting of the Old Boys. It was discussed very fully in the Meeting and passed in a slightly modified form without a dissentient voice. One would have thought that this had given an ample opportunity to all concerned to raise such objections as occurred to them. But in Aligarh it is not unoften the unexpected that happens. After the rule in question had been unanimously passed, the Honorary Secretary of the Trustees raised an objection, based, as we believe, on an objection taken by the Principal of the College to the presence of Mr. Ghulam Husain, Sub-Editor of the Comrade, at the Old Boy's Annual Meeting and Dinner for which he was at Aligarh for a few hours last year. The Honorary Secretary of the Trustees moved them to pass a resolution to the effect that no student of the College expelled by the authorities should ever be admitted as a member of the Old Boys' Association except with the previous sanction of the Honorary Secretary and the Principal of the College. It is an irony of fate that neither he nor his predecessors in office should have taken an objection to the old rule which was obviously more lenient, but that he should have objected to a more stringent measure. But it was still more surprising that a few Old Boys themselves as Trustees voted on this occasion with the Honorary Secretary after having voted before as Old Boys in favour of the rule to which objection was now taken. But it is absolutely inexplicable how the Proctor of the College could sign a Circular Letter condemning in a violent manner those who stood by the new rule after having himself assisted in drafting it.

As we have already stated, the resolution of the Trustees was passed in the teeth of the opposition of a large majority of the Old Boys present on the occasion on which it was discussed. One of them who represented the Old Boys' Association, gave notice of a motion for the Annual Meeting of the Association, that in view of the foregoing considerations, the Trustees should be informed most respectfully that, as at present advised, the Association did not see its way to amend the rule in question in the manner suggested in their resolution. The letter accompanying this resolution explained at length all the circumstances of the case, and not even the most captious critic could detect in the letter or the resolution itself any indication of a want of respect for the Trustees or their resolutions. Nevertheless, two of the resident Trustees and half a dozen employees of the College who were Old Boys, including the Proctor, circulated a violently partisan letter in condemnation of the motion, its mover and its supporters, and, in fact, of the Association as a whole. What object was meant to be served by this denunciation is more than we can say, for even if the motion had been rejected, the rule to which the Trustees had objected could not have been amended this year, for the simple reason that the authors of the Circular Letter had not taken the trouble to give notice of any amendment.

These two matters then were expected to be the storm-centres in this year's re-union of the Old Boys, the position of the Honorary Secretary of the Association and the question of admitting such Old Boys as members who had been "sent down" in their College careers. But those who were not content with watching the surface and could also discern things lying deeper were not troubled by any grave apprehensions, and their optimism was fully justified by the sequel. Two stray resolutions, sent in by a non-resident Old Boy who had heard of the Honorary Secretary's intention of resigning this year, but had not heard of his subsequent resolve, proposing a vote of confidence in him and requesting him to continue in office for the full term, although superfluous from the Honorary Secretary's point of view, provided an ample opportunity for all those mandatories who had threatened a strike three months previously at Agra if the Honorary Secretary did not renounce his connection with the Servants of the Ka'aba Society. A prominent spokesman of the tribe was present on the occasion, but, after the trial of strength at Agra, appeared to be no more than an exploded volcano, and when it came to voting even he refrained from opposing these resolutions. Of the written votes only eight had been received against the two motions, and one may have a sigh of relief that very probably one would hear nothing of a strike of mandatories for sometime to come if the Honorary Secretary did not renounce the habit of offering prayers five times a day, or did not shave off his beard.

As regards the question of membership, the mover had had occasion to learn that the Honorary Secretary of the College was evidently labouring under a misunderstanding with regard to its motive and purpose. The Old Boys only meant to make it clear that their Association was an independent body which could not surrender into other hands, no matter how capable, its discretion as regards admitting Old Boys to its membership, and that it disapproved of the doctrine of Eternal Damnation. So long as these two points were placed beyond pale of controversy and doubt, not only in theory but also in practice, no one desired to disagree with the Trustees. Out of deference, therefore, to the Honorary Secretary of the Trustees, the mover of the resolution suggested an amendment that a deputation consisting of Mr. Justice Rafiq, the Hon. Syed Riza Ali and Mr. Mohamed Ali should wait on the Trustees and explain the reasons why they could not make the admission of any Old Boy to their membership dependent on the previous sanction of the Honorary Secretary of the College and the Principal, and to express the readiness of the Association to give their earnest consideration to every proposal of the Trustees and to meet them more than half way so long as it could be done without prejudice to the independence of the Association. This proposal was unanimously accepted, and the only dissentient was one who suggested a different personnel for the deputation. But he was very fully answered when his own name was suggested for membership of the deputation by another pseudo-dissentient amidst loud laughter and his own louder protests.

This was the end of all the apprehensions of a "split" of which false prophets have not yet ceased to talk in spite of repeated experience during the last six months. We have every hope that the Trustees would realize the insurmountable difficulties in the way of the Association's acceptance of their resolution of last January, and they would reconsider the matter and leave things undisturbed so long as necessity does not force an amendment of the existing rule on the Association itself. One thing, however, was made fully clear during the discussion on this question. Not a single dissentient voice was raised when members of the Association were pointedly asked whether they desired the Association to continue as an absolutely independent body or were prepared to accept, at least in practice, any modification of this absolute independence. We, therefore, trust no occasion will arise in future when this universal verdict would become a subject of dispute. The Old Boys of Oxford and Cambridge constitute the ultimate authority of the University, and the time is not far distant when the Aligarh Old Boys would occupy the same position at Aligarh. The independence of their Association must, therefore, be respected, and we have every reason to believe that the Trustees will always respect this if only the remnant of a once powerful clique among the Old Boys themselves would not carry its jealousies into the deliberations of the Board of Trustees.

Unfortunately a very destructive tendency was shown by a member or two of this clique during the two days' sittings of the Associa-

Men. Incredible as it may appear, it was actually moved that, although the full interval provided for by the rules between the issue of the agenda and the receipt of written votes was allowed by the Honorary Secretary, by curtailing the time allotted to him under the rules for recording these votes, the Annual Meeting should not take place on the dates fixed, simply because the agenda was issued to a few members a day or two later than the due date through default of the press, in spite of the fact that nobody had complained of it and many Old Boys had come to Aligarh for the Meeting from every corner of India. A no less absurd objection was raised, and with less justification even of a technical character, that as the Honorary Secretary, in the capacity of an ordinary member of the Association, had not proposed more than one Old Boy's name for every seat on the Muslim University Association allotted to the representatives of the Old Boys' Association, the Association should not be represented on that body till another meeting had taken place. This was proposed simply because the objector would have preferred to see more members of his own type elected and had not taken the trouble to nominate them for election in spite of a sufficiently long notice. When the objector was asked to state what section of the rules had been contravened he gave up the quest after wasting a good deal of the Meeting's time. Nevertheless, he was more persistent than this suggests, for what he could not do in person he asked a legal representative of his to do for him. This gentleman wasted some more time, but finally the President ruled the objection out of order. These are matters far too trivial to discuss in these columns, but we are compelled to refer to them because the objections were taken by no less a person than Dr. Zia Uddin who has recently officiated for a long time as the Principal of the Aligarh College, and no doubt regards himself as an exemplar of discipline.

But it would be extremely unjust to the Association if all this should lead any one to believe that the Annual Meeting of this important body concerned itself only with squabbles about the Servants of the Ka'ba Society and admission of expelled students as Old Boys, or frivolous objections of the character we have mentioned. As a matter of fact only a couple of members were responsible for most of these things, and the Association was in no mood to agree with them or even take them seriously. On the first day a very interesting ceremony was performed by the President, Mr. Syed Zain-ud-Din, when he opened the first storey of the Old Boys' Lodge. The building contains two spacious reception rooms, four suites of bed-dressing- and bathrooms and four bijou hexagonal rooms in the turrets on the four sides, besides a large hall or corridor in the centre of the building which would later on have a staircase leading to the top storey with similar reception rooms and suites of living rooms. The place is neatly furnished and is sure to attract a constant stream of Old Boys who were often prevented from visiting their Alma Mater on account of lack of accommodation near the College for such guests. The Honorary Secretary gave a short history of the scheme of the Old Boys' Lodge and tried to remove some peculiar notions which were entertained in certain quarters as regards the objects for which the Lodge was proposed to be built. He assured every well-wisher of the College and particularly his colleagues, the Trustees, that no one considered the traditions of Aligarh more sacred than the Old Boys, who were at once a conservative and a progressive element in the body-politic at Aligarh. The President replied in a most feeling speech in the course of which he said that they who had lived in their College careers in the boarding houses near by, and had had the time of their life in those glorious days, now felt as if after the vicissitudes and wanderings of their worldly careers they had once more been admitted into such a boarding house to revive old memories and associations. But he reminded the Old Boys that discipline used to be rather lax in their old boarding houses in those glorious days, but the discipline of their new boarding house would be far more stringent. They were expected to provide examples for their younger brothers, in fact, in many cases for their own sons, now studying in the College, and he felt he could give to the Trustees, of whom he is one, and to the world at large, the assurance that the Old Boys would never belie the best expectations that could be formed of them.

A notable resolution passed after a protracted discussion of the details has authorized the expenditure of Rs. 4,000 a year on two scholarships to be offered by the Association to members of the Indian staff, one in the College and one in the School, for proceeding to Europe for at least six months to study the system of education. The amount of the scholarship is obviously too small to provide for all the expenditure that a member of the School or College staff would have to incur even in a six months' trip to Europe. Similarly, the minimum period is obviously insufficient for a very close study of different systems. But it is hoped that the scholarship would be a handsome contribution towards the expenses of such a trip, and even 20 or 22 weeks judiciously employed according to a carefully prepared scheme would give to an Indian graduate already employed in teaching considerable insight and a much wider out-look than he possessed before. We trust the experiment will prove successful, and, in any case, the Association would be able to judge within a few years whether it would be more profitable to increase quality at the expense of quantity, unless of course it could afford to do both.

In this manner the Association has more than doubled its contribution to the College, for hitherto it had been paying only Rs. 3,600 a year for the Science Chair, and would now contribute Rs. 8,320 a year, paying, in addition to the old contribution, Rs. 4,000 a year for the new scholarships and Rs. 720 for two engineering scholarships for Roorkee which existed merely on paper before. We hope and believe that, for their part, the Trustees of the College would also increase the representation of the Old Boys on the Board of Trustees from 5 to 15. It would be a graceful acknowledgment of the assistance rendered by the Association if the Honorary Secretary to the Trustees himself proposed the suggested increase in the next Annual Meeting. It must be remembered that the Association would have made a much larger contribution to the funds of the College if it had not had to provide so large a sum as Rs. 35,000 for the Old Boys' Lodge and a fairly large sum for the preparation of an exhaustive Directory of the Old Boys. But this expenditure in non-recurring, and the Directory would enable the Association to double its membership and income before many years. The Budget Estimate of the Association is now nearly Rs. 28,000, though this amount includes a large aggregate of contributions for the Old Boys' Lodge. But it may safely be hoped that in the following year the net contribution of the Association to the College would not fall much short of Rs. 12,000 a year. The progress hitherto achieved is, we hope, only an earnest of better things in the future.

But it is not in money alone that the Old Boys can, and do contribute their mite to the College. Mr. Said Mohamed Khan has this year been elected a Trustee for five years on behalf of the Association in the place of Mr. Mohamed Faiq who was elected last year at a bye-election. We hope the presence of the new Trustee on the Board would be no less valuable than the monetary contribution that synchronises with his election, and we trust Mr. Mohamed Faiq will once more become a Trustee very soon, and be enabled to continue the good work that he has hitherto been doing. It was a very difficult choice between the two, and our only regret is that both candidates could not become Trustees this year.

Honours.

II.

We hope we have made it sufficiently clear in our first article on the subject that both the great Parties in British politics are conscious of the questionable uses to which the power of recommending persons for honours to the Crown is sometimes made to lend itself. The debate in the Lords was no doubt initiated by the motion of a Conservative leader, and the speeches of some of the Tory peers struck a very solemn note and were steeped in deep emotion in parts. There was, however, on the whole no desire in the House to make the discussion a part of the usual party game. Lord Crewe, who spoke on behalf of the Government, did not deny that the evil existed. He adopted the defensive tone only when he came to deal with the remark of Lord Milner "about no fewer than 63 barons which the present Government, in their eight years of office, have created—about one-sixth of the total number of barons in this House, although it has existed for more than two hundred years." Lord Crewe could not help seeing in this statement an implication that "some of those peerages were connected with party funds." He thought, however, that there had been a tendency to exaggerate the position as it now existed and that there had been some attempt to indicate that public life was becoming less pure and honourable than it was and that, as the poet said, "we are worse than our grand-fathers, and our children are likely to be worse than ourselves." He launched into a long argument to show that their past political history was not a quite clean and honourable record in this respect. He recalled the time when boroughs and votes were bought by the dozen and referred to the famous case of Lord North who bought boroughs for a particular election at the price of £2,500 per seat. He reminded Lord Milner that between 1784 and 1801 Mr. Pitt made 140 creations or promotions in the peerage, mainly English. He did not think Lord Milner would say that a great many of those titles now honourably borne by their descendants were given on account of anything which in strict sense could be called service to the State. "There is no object in raking up stories," said Lord Crewe, "which tell hardly upon our forbears, but it is necessary to mention these facts in order to show that when an almost portentous tone is adopted in relation to what is considered to be the corruption of to-day, we ought to remember that at a "matter of fact we are living in an infinitely clearer atmosphere in this respect than ever existed before the Reform Bill."

The root of the evil, as was generally recognised by the speakers on either side, is the Party system, and the Party Whip is "the villain of the piece." But, as the Saturday Review aptly says, he is only "villain on necessity; all that he is evil is by a divine or rather diabolic thrusting on." He is certainly not more depraved than other people. Money furnishes the chief sinews of war in party politics. For the smooth working of the elaborate party organisations of to-day immense funds are necessary. A vast and mobile electorate has to be wooed and won over to party causes, and a huge and expensive propaganda has to be kept going on from year's end to year's end. Large contributions to party funds are, therefore, welcome to party Whips, and in most cases the rich contributors have got to be "rewarded" for their services. The election expenditure has also enormously grown and vast sums are paid in salaries and expenses to the agents of the electioneering organisations. As Lord Charnwood said, a large and flourishing political industry has come into existence. "Was the education of the electorate," he asked, "really effectively promoted by gentlemen who preached political views for hire?" While he expressed a high regard for some of these gentlemen, yet, according to him, their ranks included some who would as readily preach on the other side as on the one. Lord Selborne characterised this greed of all political parties for money as "the clay foot of Democracy." The question of money was mixed up with all they called popular movements, which could not be worked by either Party without any large sums placed by wealthy partisans at their disposal. He instanced the Land Campaign recently organised by Mr. Lloyd George. "Am I to be told," he asked "if his (Mr. George's) organisation is financed by the mites of Liberal widows, or by a kind of Peter's pence of the Liberal Party?" Democracy has got to be educated and, above all, a huge machinery must be set in motion to bring the last man to the poll, and for these purposes both the Parties are forced to cry out more and more for money.

When an honour is "sold," the Whip takes good care to see that the transaction does not appear as an open bargain. The thing is not done in that way. Nor is the party chief freely let into the secrets of the Whip. As the Saturday Review says, there is an elaborate etiquette studiously framed to keep the chief of an administration in virgin ignorance of such matters. "The right-hand of the Prime Minister may have some shrewd suspicion of what the left hand of the chief Whip is doing. But officially all this business is a mystery to him. He takes it for granted that there is some good reason why the fountain of honour should flow on the overgrown grocer, the bloated tobaccoist, the lord of many tea-shops, or the aspiring provincial mayor." It is as well understood, says the Spectator, that the Prime Minister must never hear anything about the unpleasant side of the Whip's business as it is that a fine lady must never hear specially unsavoury domestic details about the sewers, the disposal of "soil" and so forth from the house-keeper, the estate mason, or the gardener.

Under the British Party system it is inevitable that Party services should be rewarded. When this is so, how is it possible to maintain that large contributions to Party funds are not Party services? The wealthy contributor not only gets a coveted distinction, but is beginning to have an important say in the conduct of public affairs. According to the Spectator, not only are honours now, in effect, sometimes sold for large contributions, but there is a tendency for policies also to be purchased by subscriptions. It illustrates this tendency by recalling an episode in the career of Cecil Rhodes who "not only induced the Irish Party by a large subscription to declare their policy in the way which he desired—there was no secret about that matter—but bargained privately with Mr. Schnadhorst, the Liberal wirepuller, for an undertaking that the Liberal Government would not make the evacuation of Egypt part of their policy. Mr. Rhodes was then specially intent on his Cape-to-Cairo Railway."

Lord Milner's speech was almost sombre in its gravity, and he deplored in a bitter ironic vein that he was not able like some of the noble lords to add to the gaiety of nations on that occasion. The rebuke was specially meant for Lord Ribblesdale who seemed to think that the thing complained of must be, that it did not very much matter, that it had always gone on, and was very likely to go on, and that if it did not go on in one form it would go on in another. Lord Ribblesdale derided Lord Selborne's motion which, even if it were carried in both Houses, would in his opinion signify nothing beyond an expression of a pious and a slightly Pharisaical opinion. He ridiculed Lord Charnwood's suggestion for the appointment of a Royal Commission. His objection to a Royal Commission was that they either reported so much that it was impossible for a Government to do anything, or so little that it was not worth doing anything. He doubted if the giving of honours was such a terrible evil. He put his standpoint in the following sentences out of which, he believed, a syllogism could be constructed:—

"That for good or evil, we in this country have for a long time lived under Party government; that Party government, of which ever side, requires large sums of money; that more money there is the better the Party government would be—that is, the machinery of Party government would be perfect. To that extent, therefore, he thought it was a good thing, as they must have Party government, that it should be well endowed with funds." He went on regaling the House with a mixture of chaff and cynicism and concluded with something like the airy assurance of the man who thought everything was the best in the best of all possible worlds.

Lord Ribblesdale's reckless optimism was matched by the frank and cheery banter of Lord Willoughby de Broke, who declared, to the infinite amusement of many of the noble lords and the dismay of not a few, that he had dabbled in the sale of honours himself. He described the circumstances of an attempt of his in this manner: "He wanted a large sum of money for an enterprise that could not entirely be dissociated from politics, but which he assured noble lords was entirely patriotic in its design. He called on a gentleman and suggested that if he would give him the money he would use his influence with his Party to secure for him not a peerage, but a baronetcy only. He was not quite sure what the price of a baronetcy was—perhaps the noble lords opposite could inform him—but the price he asked was not excessive. The very natural question was: 'That is all very well, Lord Willoughby, but when are you going to deliver the goods?' He certainly could not tell when the Unionist Party would get back to office, and said that he did not know, and he was not surprised when he was politely 'shown to the door.'"

The speeches of some of the noble lords were really those that added to the gaiety of nations. They ridiculed the attempts of over-virtuous people to reform the methods with which honours were sought by wealthy supporters of the party or showered by party leaders. The transactions were not after all of such a scandalous character as to furnish texts for solemn sermons to the moralist. The net result of the debate was a general approval of a pious resolution that things should be better than they are, though none seemed to be sure how this desirable end could be achieved. Many hoped that the force of public opinion would prove the best corrective.

Although India has, as we have said, no Party System and therefore no Party funds, popular opinion is daily growing in force against the manner in which most of the honours are bestowed in this country. The force of public opinion in England cannot be ignored by the government in office, for it depends for its tenure of power directly on the vote of the electorate. In India there exists no salutary check of this character to control the will of the Executive. The Government of India may exalt whomsoever it lists and may disregard public opinion without the least apprehension that the day of reckoning would ever come. We do not, of course, suggest that Indian Government sets itself to deliberately flout public opinion. Its standards have, however, grown to be such that they rarely furnish it with a reliable guide to pick the right persons, outside the official hierarchy, for reward and distinction. Being a Government that enjoys, so to speak, a perpetuity of tenure, its first consideration naturally is to reward its own servants for the faithful performance of their duties. It is also natural that the vast, non-official body of educated Indian opinion, which is concerned with watching independently and criticising the acts and measures of the administration, should not be treated by the official classes with frank and cordial approval. A tacit rivalry of aim, standpoint and interest has sprung up between the two. Here we have an ample scope for the existence of an even bitter and unrelenting partisanship without the open device of the Party System. No government in the world has ever openly declared that it did not exist for the people, and as far as government acts and measure require public justification, popular opinion must occasionally act as a moral force. But public opinion can to a certain degree be influenced by a State patronage of particular types of views and opinions. And here-in lies the temptation of a government circumstanced as the Government of India. That Indian Government honestly regards its own point of view and its own estimate of things in general as the best and the truest is quite beside the point. The main fact is that it usually rewards men who habitually think and feel like its own officials, or such delightfully free and simple persons who have resigned their consciences into the keeping of the officials within their reach, and have never done any thinking on their own account. Men of real merit, of intellectual eminence and moral distinction, who have done and are doing real service to their fellow men, usually stand apart from this group, and are consequently neglected. There is no wonder if the honours bestowed by the sovereign are losing their real value in the eyes of the public. The Indian Honours' List is studied as a curious human document. The values that it sets on individual merit in many cases excite the wonder and strain the credulity of the uninitiated. We are prepared to play the part of Lord Selborne and Lord Milner in India, but would some honest, cold-blooded cynic among the officials play the part of Lord Ribblesdale and Lord Willoughby de Broke?

The Council.

By THE HON. MR. GUP.

"As long a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

—As You Like It.

WHEN, on the 6th of January last, the HON. MR. GUP, still under the stimulus of the New Year's resolutions, resumed his seat among the gods that leisurely contemplate the dull debate and hesitating, half-hearted conflicts of mere men below, and refreshed a worn-out and tired world with his banter three weeks later, little did he think that he would once more provoke mirth by recounting the affairs of the 9th of January on the 18th of—April! But the claims of loyalty as proclaimed in the Viceregal Lodge at Delhi, and of disloyalty as proclaimed equally loudly in another Lodge last week, had to be satisfied, and the appreciation of greatness in debate, whether it be of SUREN or of FREE-LANCE, had to take a back seat. The balance-sheet of servility and sedition having been prepared and duly audited, the HON. MR. GUP returns gladly to the suavity of those columns which is equidistant from sedition and servility.

BOOTLAIR SARKIS was in the Chair and commenced the proceedings of the day with a message of mourning. Reuter had brought the sad news of the sudden demise of Sir John Molesworth Macpherson who was busy in England in consolidating the statutes of India. Council knew him well in the familiar title of "Mac," and had bid him good-bye at Simla on the last day of the autumn session on September 22nd, 1911. H. E. had expressed his regret at the retirement of MAC and pronounced a eulogy couched in the warmest of terms. Thereafter non-officials had entertained him at a farewell luncheon at which had reigned all the sweet-sadness of farewell. How sad to recall now the HON. MR. GUP's remarks about the last piece of work done by MAC. "When the Lunacy Bill," wrote he on the occasion, "was chaperoned into the Council by SANDOW II, 'he looked knowingly at Sir Guy, who in his turn passed on that knowing look with a still more omniscient gesture with the thumb to the 'non-officials. This was the last of the Bills to be drafted by MAC 'in his career of 34 years, an appropriate coup de grace 'deservedly commended by SANDOW II. Could picture MAC 'tenderly nursing the last of his legislative babies, the pet child 'of his old age, a piece of perfect creation to the production of which 'ambitious service under eight Viceroys of various temperatures and 'nine Law Members of sundry complexions must have contributed 'largely. And after years of secret toil and loving patience, what 'a pleasure was his to hear those words of eulogy from a connoisseur 'of lunacy, and to feel that so long as a lunatic breathed the air of 'this glorious Empire, the name of MAC would be remembered 'with gratitude and his memory kept green in all lunatic asylums!"

Alas, poor Mac is no more; he is now beyond the jurisdiction of jokes and Lunacy Bills, debates in Council and divisions, having died in harness a sudden death which all who knew him must deeply mourn. BOOTLAIR SARKIS's tribute to his memory was eloquent of the esteem and affection in which MAC was held by all the Councillors. CHERRY CHITNIS, doyen of non-official Councillors, also associated himself on their behalf with the sentiments to which BOOTLAIR SARKIS had given expression.

KHUSH-HAL asked ten out of a total of a dozen of questions chiefly arising out of his recent study of the views of ancient Commissions the reports of which had long since been buried under the dust that accumulates in official pigeon-holes. As usual, while the other official members vouchsafed half a dozen words, more or less, in reply, the RAILWAY SLEEPER brought wagon-loads of information in reply to KHUSH-HAL's questions. The successor of dear MADGE, equally valiant, reminded NO-MORE-KAY of MADGE's Own Regiment of Black and White, but could secure no definite information. The LION OF BAGANAPALLE offered a suggestion about the non-official representation of Cantonment stations in Legislative Councils and was met with a non possumus in reply. Where the Army rules there can be no Parliament!

The NEW SAGE moved for the reference of the Destructive Insects and Pests Bill to a Select Committee. Wonder why Government did not nominate as an expert the well-known MR. KEATING, whose advice would have been invaluable in the Select Committee. Hope the select Committee at least would sprinkle a good deal of MR. KEATING's powder on their persons and their report before they returned to the Council with the latter. As it is, there are too many parasites in the Council. SANDOW III moved for the reference of the Motor Cars Bill to a Select Committee in which the place of honour was given to the HON. SHIKARI, also known amongst his friends as Ticca-garri. At last the Leader has found a use for this sporting member. After WORTHY MEYER had asked for and obtained leave to introduce the Local Authorities Loans Bill, legislative business was over and the real business of the day commenced.

SUREN, mighty with the pen and mightier with the tongue, moved that the pledges given about the Press Act in 1910 by his worthy fellow-countryman, the predecessor of the MOSLEM DOWAGRA, should be redeemed, and that bête noir of the Calcutta Police, the High Court of Fort William in Bengal, be given an effective jurisdiction in cases of forfeiture under the various sections of the Act. SUREN disavowed all desire to revive ancient memories of four years ago, but felt it necessary to remind the Council that the Press Bill was passed amid some opposition in this Council and a terrible lot more in the country. Reference to the proceedings of the debate showed how the non-officials had fought against odds on the question of giving to the Press Bill a place among the permanent statutes of the land; but the opinion of the people had not commended itself to the official majority. The Act had now been in operation for four years and SUREN was in a position to judge of its character. SUREN evidently inclined to spell "operation" as "oppression." How it had worked, what were its defects and how they can be remedied, seemed to SUREN pertinent questions, although they may appear to SANDOW III impertinent questioning of Home Department authority. SUREN therefore moved the resolution which he described as the "irreducible minimum." This description even more than literally true, for you can't reduce the length and breadth of a point, and SUREN's resolution had even lesser dimensions than a point in Geometry—for it was wholly pointless. The pledges of 1910 led nowhere, and even the extension of the jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court could have blown nobody any good so long as the section defining the offences under the Act remained an unreduced maximum.

Listening to SUREN addressing an English audience, who could think that butter could melt in his mouth? He commenced his attack with compliments so sweet that it was a wonder how the Government could avoid a complete surrender. He regarded the acceptance of his irreducible minimum as the first definite step towards the final annulment of the Act. That the Act was bound to be repealed sooner or later—sooner, hoped SUREN, than later—was as clear as the noon-day sun. But SUREN did not say whether he referred to the noon-day sun of Bengal, which dries up a bureaucrat, if it does not give him brain-fever, or to the dim and pale fugitive that seldom shows its face through the veil of clouds and the solid London pea-souper in SANDOW III's native land. The Act, argued SUREN, was inconsistent with the great traditions of British Rule and those (ahem!) noble principles of government which are incarnated in British administration. Having said this, SUREN looked round towards the avatars of noble principles sitting around him. There was the god of Learning, the male version of Sarasvati, enthroned in H. E.'s chair. There was NO-MORE-KAY that could equally pass for Vishnu, the Protector, and Shiva, the Destroyer. There was the MORMON DOWAGER, British by adoption if not by birth, representing the deity that devises laws. There was the NEW SAGE, officiating as the god of fecundity of the soil in ancient mythology and the reaper of bumper harvests even in times of famine which is peculiar to modern conditions. Again, there were the ADMINISTRATIVE ORPHAN, god of Commerce, WORTHY MEYER, god of the Golden Treasury, and SANDOW III, god almighty of everything. SUREN scanned their faces but found no consolation. Still hopeful of the fruits of flattery he went on to say that no concession to popular freedom had been made by the British Government in India which had ever been withdrawn. He cited the example of the Jury Notification which was cancelled, and the Vernacular Press Act which was repealed, and hoped so it would be with this Act in the fullness of time. The Government of India, standing at the head of the nation (Not, we hope, with a fire-chambered revolver) becoming every day more and more Nationalistic (Beware of bombs!) in its views by the breadth and liberality of its policy, ought, in the opinion of SUREN, to show us the way.

Tired of all this climbing, SUREN came down to the customary level and pitched into the police. The Act had given very large powers to the police. The Magistrate is the police, and the police is of the variety known not as the Sipahi but as Siyahi, or more correctly as the C.I.D. SUREN then flourished a document that he held in his hand as the proof of the Government's guilt. It was a statement giving the names of newspapers which were called upon to find security and consequently ceased publication. He informed the Council that of these 17, only 3 were Hindu papers, and the remaining 14 were all Muslim, another instance of the gross partiality of Government towards the "favourite wife," and a recognition not only of the numerical strength of the Mussalmans but also of their political importance and the services they had rendered to the Empire as the "gate-keepers" of India. Indirectly, of course, it may also have been a recognition of the "dynamic force" of the community as exhibited by means of an explosive Press!

SUREN particularly referred to the case of the Ahli-Hadis of Amritsar which had replied to certain strictures which had appeared in a missionary organ reflecting upon the Mohamedan faith. The newspaper was asked to furnish a security, but no notice had till then been taken of the book in which the strictures upon Mohamedan faith had been published. Little did SUREN know that the book which tempted the Ahli-Hadis to tempt the Magistrate to call for security had similarly tempted the Badr of Qadian, to tempt another District Magistrate to believe that Christians in India would be brought into hatred and contempt because the Badr had reproduced an article, twice published before in other journals since the Act came into being, stating that the Virgin Mary was a hermaphrodite, and that the Immaculate Conception was the result of natural causes. Verily the Press Act is a capital instrument in the hands of the bureaucracy, for when the laws in England against blasphemy were being severely attacked by Christians themselves, it was necessary in a heathen land, where every prospect pleases and only man is vile, to demand securities and confiscate them together with the presses if newspapers did not express full faith—in miracles. One may be sure after this that the famous verdict of a philosopher that miracles do not happen nowadays would be proved to be false, and more miracles would happen in India in the 20th century through the instrumentality of the Press Act than all those which are reputed to have happened before. Indeed the Press Act itself is the most marvellous miracle, and its administration the perfection of "holding the balance even."

SUREN cited the instance of another newspaper, the Zamindar of Lahore, which was guilty of high treason for protesting against the removal of a Mosque and speaking of a Lieutenant-Governor in terms only applicable to men. For this offence the security of Rs. 2,000 had been forfeited and another of Rs. 10,000 demanded. And while SUREN was referring to this case, another Lieutenant-Governor was contemplating the forfeiture of the second security also together with the entire press for high treason against—Piccadilly! Curious thing this Press Act, and curious results flow therefrom. As it happens, discourteous and disrespectful remarks about a Lieutenant-Governor cost an Indian editor Rs. 2,000, but discourteous and disrespectful remarks about the fair and fragile things that flit about Piccadilly after dark cost him just ten times as much.

The next reference of SUREN related to the Cawnpore Herald, which had published some two years ago "A Dramatic Scene." The D. S. P. called upon the proprietress of the paper and wanted to know the writer's name. On declining to do so she was taken to task for the impropriety of permitting her newspaper to be the means of criticism directed against the police and the municipality, two corporations which in Cawnpore at least are not only above criticism but may well be regarded as also above law. The dénouement of "A Dramatic Scene" was the demand of security from the good lady who was guilty of high treason against Chowkidars and Chungi.

After quoting figures furnished by his hon. friend, the Home Secretary (Who said SUREN was hostile to British Rule?), SUREN came to an authoritative expression of opinion. He refrained from referring to the popular verdict, for that might not have commended itself to "gentlemen on the other side of the House"; but the leader of His Majesty's Opposition cited the authority of the Chief Justice of the High Court of Bengal when delivering judgment in the Comrade case. This, SUREN felt sure, was "an authority of unquestioned weight whose pronouncement would command the implicit acquiescence of all members, be they official or non-officials." And while SUREN rolled out this sentence in his sonorous voice, the testimony of the ears of the audience was considerably affected by the testimony of their eyes which detected an unusual protuberance on the left side of his face, not altogether unlike the frequent phenomenon which one notices in a schoolboy speaking with his tongue in his cheek. And here he read out a passage from the famous judgment showing the all-comprehensive character of section 4 of the Act within whose wide-spread net, as the Chief Justice had prophesied with unerring prescience, would come an attack on that degraded section of the public which lives on the misery and shame of others. India may now easily explain her intellectual poverty, for, said the Chief Justice, much that is regarded as standard literature could undoubtedly be caught. So no more standard literature for India, and the publishers of the thousand and one "Hundred Best Books" may console themselves by joining the "Indian Press Defence League" of the Editor who paid twenty thousand in damages for casting doubts on the chastity of Piccadilly.

After this came more quotations from the judgment, more arguments in its support and more insistence on the unredeemed pledges of the former Law Member, followed by a worthy peroration. SUREN argued that a sensible improvement in the situation had already taken place and a change for the better had been generally admitted in the tone and temper of the press. In making the appeal for a substantial modification of the Act, if not its repeal, SUREN said, he did not speak only as a member of the Council, but as "one with whom journalism had been the cherished vocation of his life." Over the heads of his audience he flashed the "Sword of Damocles," then talked of "the great organ for the ventilation of popular grievances", and, of course, of the "safety-valve of the State." Nor was a reference to the time-honoured distinction (Who said "without a difference"?) between liberty and licence omitted. And last of all, SUREN promised the Government that if it was good it would proclaim to the world "the unalterable determination of the Government to redeem its pledged word and to make justice to the aggrieved party the key-note of its policy."

Hardly had he resumed his seat after this little bonne bouche of complimentary oratory, when up rose the gallant FREE-LANCE, foremost in the files of Punjab loyalty. FREE-LANCE does not beat about the bush. He does not conceal his hostility to anything under the cloak of meaningless compliments. He throws no chaff to the bird, but puts out his hand straight to catch it without the aid of net or snare. The gallant FREE-LANCE has no faith in flanking movements but charges direct, going straight for the enemy and directing his weapon towards the breast of his foe with unerring aim. So, just as he let not a moment slip between the speech of SUREN and his own, he did not let a word pass his lips that did not declare his aim and purpose. "Sir, I am 'the greatest enemy of the seditious Press!' was a declaration as direct and sudden as the question of Mr. BROADBENT to NORA, in John Bull's Other Island, within two minutes of meeting her: "Will you be my wife?" But FREE-LANCE did not content himself merely with this declaration of war. He added: "Had I had the power I 'would have never allowed this resolution to be moved and discussed 'here to-day.'" After this the Council wondered why FREE-LANCE stopped at that, and did not say: "Had I had the power I would

"have brought SUREN's head on a charger. Had I had the power I would have shot down every non-official member of the Council except the representatives of the (ahem!) people from the Punjab, a few landlords and my unfailing co-voter from Burma, and given all their votes to official members. Had I had the power I would have poisoned every member of the Royal Commission on the Public Services except such as had taken an oath to vote an increase of salaries to members of the Civil Service and to close its doors to my fellow-countrymen. Had I had the power I would have abolished the High Court of Calcutta, in fact all Law Courts except the Chief Court of Lahore, which is, strictly speaking, as you all know, not a Law Court at all. Had I had the power I would have abolished education and doubled the expenditure on the Army. Had I had the power I would have destroyed Oawnpore and given to Mr. Tyler all the powers of the King in Parliament and even of Sir Edward Carson. Had I had the power I would have annexed Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan and every other Muslim country and compelled their rulers to pass votes of thanks to Sir Edward Grey as their greatest benefactor. Had I had the power I would have suppressed every newspaper except the Pioneer, and that I would have published as the Government Gazette. Finally, had I had the power, I would have killed the Hon. Ma. Gur and drunk a full hog'shead of his seditious blood." The Council lost the opportunity of hearing this characteristic speech and had to content itself merely with the pious hope that had the FREE-LANCE had the power—he would have asked to move a counter-resolution for making the Press Act still more stringent.

Three days ago, on SUREN's motion relating to education, FREE-LANCE, disdaining such restraints as relevancy imposes, had already attacked those who wanted to persuade the Government to modify the Press Act. So proud was he of this feat that he reminded the Council of it and even boasted that last year too, "when there were no signs of this resolution being discussed here," he had emphasised in the course of his Budget speech the necessity of making the Press laws more effective. FREE-LANCE had been born on horse-back and hoped to die also on horse-back, though no one need discuss the question "When?" The horse's bare back was to him even more secure a seat than the one which he occupied in the Council through the kindness of the Government. He did not even need a bridle wherewith to control the most mettlesome charger of the Shahpere breed. But even the horsemanship of the valiant Captain of the Tiwana Lancers was unequal to the demands made by an "unbridled Press" which the FREE-LANCE declared on oath, with the utmost modesty and self-effacement, to be "the greatest curse of India." Never, said the gallant Captain, was a more appropriate and more useful Act passed in the Council; and before the Council could recall similar praise of other Acts, FREE-LANCE himself came out with the exceptions that proved the rule, the Seditious Meetings Act and the Conspiracy Act.

But it is the Seditious Press which, according to FREE-LANCE, "lies at the root of the other two." "It is papers or other seditious pamphlets which poison unsteady persons." Now if that be true, what consummation is more devoutly to be wished than the poisoning of unsteady persons? No one with any decency would like to poison so steady a person as FREE-LANCE, specially when he is coming from the Tiwana Regimental Mess in the small hours of the morning.

FREE-LANCE reminded the Council that there was not a single discussion on the subject in which he did not take part, because he felt that "if such propaganda are not crushed with a strong hand serious danger would result in the future." And what hand could be stronger than his. There are only two hands that really matter, the hand that holds the Tiwana lance kills the Press, and then the hand that rocks the cradle can peacefully rule the world. He warned the Council that "if anything happens then on a very big scale the peace-loving subjects of his Majesty the King-Emperor would be the real sufferers and the irresponsible small set of sedition-mongers would gain money by setting the house of the poor on fire and witnessing the blaze from afar." A new way of gaining money this, by setting the house of the poor on fire and witnessing the blaze from afar. One would have thought the incendiary would set the house of the wealthy Tiwapa, the "Protector of the Poor", on fire, and instead of witnessing the blaze from afar would help himself at close quarters with the salvage. (Please don't arrest me for arson in the office of a newspaper on the strength of this!)

FREE-LANCE cited the confession of a political prisoner in Montgomery Jail that "his mind was upset by reading articles in newspapers and pamphlets", and believed the story, because the confession was made "when he was in prison and as the whole thing was over he had no motive for saying anything but truth." What a wonderful reformatory our jails must be, and how all those who suspect Khan Bahadurs and Honorary Captains of frequent departures from the truth must long for the power to send them to Montgomery Jail so that they may have "no motive for saying anything but truth." With absolute mathematical precision, FREE-LANCE said we could safely hold the Press responsible for 97 per cent. of crimes of this nature. But if this is true, who can safely be held responsible for the remaining 3 per cent.? Again, if Montgomery Jail had among its denizens the editor of a seditious paper, and he were asked to confess, when "he had no motive for saying anything but truth," would he not say that "his mind was upset" by the vagaries of the Punjab bureaucrats, Khan Bahadurs and Honorary Captains? Could we not then safely hold this holy alliance responsible for 97 per cent. of writings of this nature?

FREE-LANCE and his confrères of the martial classes of the Punjab "cannot tolerate any weakness in the Press", as if the Press that required the strong hand of a Tiwana to crush it could be called weak. But let us not bother with the sound, when we get sense enough and to spare in the speech of FREE-LANCE. Well, intolerant of weakness or strength, he would not allow "fire to be lit near a tank of petroleum which may be in the house we reside in." But what a house to live in for the head of the Tiwans! One may have suspected a fair-sized distillery in a Tiwana bedroom, but—a petroleum tank?

FREE-LANCE recalled the fact that the Punjab L. G. had "specially remarked about the mischief caused by presses of a certain class." Now nobody can call this a sweeping condemnation, for only "presses of a certain class" were attacked. The tailors and outfitters have something to be thankful for, because it is possible that trouser presses were not contemplated at the time when this condemnation was pronounced. Although the Punjab Government had determined to put a stop to such presses, very little was done "in view of the leniency of the Press Act as it is in the present form." Really it was tremendous hard lines on the L.G.'s, for the Press Act only permitted the confiscation of the Press and the security deposited and did not permit "our worthy Lieutenant-Governor" to bury the editor alive, throw the publisher into boiling pitch and crush the printer in a sugar-cane mill. Besides, "it hardly stands to reason that the Local Government should have to decide upon specific offending words or articles etc., as laid down in the resolution, which are seditious." What stands to reason is that Local Governments should at least be granted the powers of God Almighty who can read the unuttered thoughts of mankind. What a pity the gallant Tiwana was not born in the spacious days of the Inquisition. The Scarlet Woman had evidently absconded with the clothes of FREE-LANCE while he was bathing, and anticipated him by some four or five centuries.

Nevertheless the gallant Tiwana had not done so badly without his clothes. People could rob him of his vesture, but not rob him of his voice, and, as he said, he had been advocating the cause "ever since I had voice." We have it on the authority of an affidavit of the nurse of FREE-LANCE that the infant Tiwana's first howl after his birth was a protest against the leniency of Press laws, and the second sounded something like "Rule Britannia!" He has since spoken in various Councils "as strongly as words could permit me." Oh for the tyranny of words! Did not Hamlet exclaim "Words! words! words!" Did not FREE-LANCE himself just now declaim against the restriction of "specific offending words" imposed upon Lieutenant-Governors? What is a word except an articulate sound or combination of sounds by custom expressing an idea or ideas? Why should sounds be articulate and why should they be bound to express an idea or ideas? How easy would it have been for FREE-LANCE to have uttered sounds without bothering about the custom of expressing an idea or ideas, or, failing that, to have spoken strongly without the use of words. After all, as the Latin proverb says, "a word to the wise". Now, I ask you, what had Tiwana done to be saddled with words? Nevertheless, would feel certain that, words permitting, he would speak with the utmost strength on this question, for he is a real friend of India and cannot expose "the poor peace-loving population, the lambs of India to the attacks of the wolves of the Press" (Who said, "Wolfe Wolf?")

Before resuming his seat FREE-LANCE recalled the fierce fight that had raged a year ago round the Conspiracy Bill when "the whole Council, official and non-official, were on one side, while the Hon. mover of to-day, with one faithful follower, (and here MADRAS-CHUTNEY-PICKLE-ACHAR blushed modestly) adhered like heroes to fight to the last when the position was really untenable." How unlike was that scene to the one in which the gallant Tiwana so valiantly figures, like god, always on the side of the bigger battalions! But the last act of FREE-LANCE was really the coup de grace, for he abolished the judiciary altogether with the most logical conclusion, that abashed even Aristotle, that "the High Court is no doubt a big court, but at the same time the Lieutenant-Governor of a province is not an ordinary authority, and as he knows about the executive as well as the other side, I think he ought to be the highest authority in the province." The "other side" was delicious. Long live the Tiwana, FREE-LANCE!

Confirmation at Woking

BISHOP OF WINCHESTER AND THE MOHAMEDANS.

THE Bishop of Winchester administered the rite of Confirmation to about seventy-five candidates at Christ Church, Woking, on Wednesday evening, in the presence of a good congregation. The robed clergy in attendance were the Revs. E. R. Price Devereux (Vicar of Christ Church), Norman Pares, R.D. (Vicar of Horsell), G. W. Grundy (Chobham), C. A. Hamilton (Pyrford), H. R. Bates and T. S. Porterfield (Christ Church parish), while the Rev. Cyril Wilson, of Woking was in attendance upon the Bishop and carried the crozier. The Churchwardens (Messrs. Bingemann and Collins) were also in the procession, bearing their wands of office.

The candidates came from Woking, about 50; Chobham 14, Pyrford 8, and Horsell 3. The hymns sung during the service were "Soldiers of Christ arise," "Come, Holy Ghost," "Thine for ever," and "O Jesus I have promised," Mr. W. D. Boseley, Mus. Bac., presiding at the organ.

In his address to the candidates after the laying-on of hands, the Bishop, in speaking of the difficulties they would have to contend with in life, said he wanted them to be not merely good men and women, but also Christian men and women. Since he was last in Woking he understood there had been started amongst them a movement of the Mohamedan religion. That was rather a difficult thing for Christian people to know how to consider, but he wanted them to look upon the good side. They must evidently behave with charity and courtesy, but they could not help entirely refusing it as a religion, although it helped them to understand what the truth of their own religion was. Heaven forbid that he should say the Mohamedans had no goodness in them, and he often thought they set Christian people an example in the matter of prayer; but their religion was not one which they could accept, because they could not believe that anyone but Christ could have been sent from God to be the Redeemer of mankind. The good he wanted Woking people to get out of it was that they should realise more willingly, faithfully and thankfully, what the reality of their religion was. The Mohamedans certainly could not say in the words of the Bible that God was a treasury of grace for his people. Their lives were Christian lives, and they must fashion them that way—a life of unselfishness, patience and sacrifice, and follow the Life which was a perfect example to the whole world. So they might see a little more clearly than before what confirmation was; they must think of those things and exercise themselves in those matters. They must be very steady in their prayers and look upwards to Him, taking care they were not found by Mohamedan ignorant of the Lord to whom they belonged.

The Uplifted Banner.

WITH twelve ladies and gentlemen arrayed in the curious silks of the East and native grass cloths of Central Africa, the platform at the Goldsworth Road Lecture Room on Monday evening presented an unwonted appearance. The Rev. W. H. Tebbit presided over a large audience, and stated that the object of the demonstration was to show the value of the work of the Baptist Missionary Society in India, China and the Congo.

Mr. Tom W. Smith introduced the separate spheres of work, referring to specially drawn maps hung at the back of the platform. India was represented by Mr. H. Haycroft, as a convert from Hinduism, Mr. H. Cleave as a Mohamedan convert, Miss E. Carver as a Hindu woman, Mr. A. Willoughby as a native Colporteur; China was represented by Mr. A. C. Smith as a Chinese student, and Miss E. L. Ellis as a Chinese school girl, while Mr. J. Haines spoke on the value of medical missions. The history of the Congo Mission was told by Messrs. A. Harvey, H. W. Smith and G. M. Timms, while Mr. H. Badge, as a Congo Chief, spoke of the difference that Christianity had brought to the natives of Congoland. Five "Congo Boys" (Messrs. A. Lush, J. Bond, A. Hay, A. Hooper and H. Hopkins) sang a native boat song in the Bobangi dialect, using Congo boat paddles in the same way as their brothers on that mighty river. Mrs. Haines sang special verses appealing for sympathy in these spheres of labour, and Mr. A. T. King summed up the results of the work. A stirring appeal for personal consecration was recited by Mr. C.B. Smith, and after a collection on behalf of the funds of the Baptist Missionary Society had been taken, the meeting closed with the singing of the Doxology.—The Surrey Herald.

The "Islamic Review."

(By CLEMENT E. PIKE.)

A FORERUNNER of our times, significant of much, is the Islamic Review. It is one of the many refutations of that prophecy of Kipling that "East is east and West is west, and never the twain shall meet." The order may not be quite accurate, and I have not Kipling by me to refer to, but in substance that is the prophecy, and it is refuted by the Islamic Review. The frontispiece to the first number of the second volume refutes it. There East, in the person of Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din, meets West, in the person of the Right Hon. Lord Headley, and the significance of this meeting is emphasised in a little poem by Lord Headley printed on the first page, of which this is the last verse—

"Great Allah, Lord, our God our King,
Who knowest what for us is best,
We praise Thy Name and loudly sing
The fusion of the East and West."

All this meeting of East and West is no new thing to those of us who have attended one of our International World Congresses. At these great gatherings East and West are brought into pleasant contact at the festive board, over the teacups, in solemn temples, in railway carriages. It was in one of these, on that most delightful expedition to Chantilly at the World Congress in Paris, that I had the pleasure of meeting the editor of the Islamic Review.

In that compartment Europe, Asia and America were represented. The Universalist minister and his wife must have felt quite at home in it. There was a correspondent of a great London daily, and the editor of the Islamic Review. Since then Muslim India and Islamic Review (now the titles are reversed) has been sent to me, and I have found much in it of instruction and interest. It ought to remove prejudice against a religion professed by millions of our fellow-subjects.

It has been a grievous calamity that, in the past, Christianity and Islam have met each other in degraded forms, thus causing hostility, contempt and misunderstanding.

"I received a letter," writes Lord Headley, "It was apropos of my leaning towards Islam, in which the writer told me that if I did not believe in the divinity of Christ I could not be saved. The question of the divinity of Christ never seemed to me nearly so important as that other question: Did he give God's message to mankind? Now, if I had any doubt about this latter point, it would worry me a great deal; but, thank God, I have no doubt, and I hope that my faith in Christ and his inspired teachings is as firm as that of any other Muslim or Christian. As I have said before, Islam and Christianity as taught by Christ himself are sister religions only held apart by dogmas and technicalities which might very well be dispensed with." There are, I suppose, few Unitarians who would not respond to this with a hearty "Amen."—Christian Life.

Full Text of the White Paper.

THE following is the complete text of the White Paper issued by the War Office on March 25. It would be apparent from its perusal that the Reuter's messages had made a confusion of dates which obscured the course of events and which we pointed out in our leading article on the subject:—

Memorandum of an interview between Secretary of State for War and the General Officer Commanding in Chief.
16th December, 1913.

I saw the General Officers Commanding-in-Chief on the 16th December, 1913, and made them the following statement with reference to the duty of soldiers when the possibility of resignations of their commissions was brought to my notice.

I first dealt with the legal question. The law clearly lays down that a soldier is entitled to obey an order to shoot only if that order is reasonable under the circumstances. No one, from general officer to private, is entitled to use more force than is required to maintain order and the safety of life and property. No soldier can shelter himself from the civil law behind an order given by a superior if that order is, in fact, unreasonable and outrageous.

If, therefore, officers and men in the army were led to believe that there was a possibility that they might be called upon to take some outrageous action—for instance, to massacre a demonstration of Orangemen who were causing no danger to the lives of their neighbours,—had as were the effects on discipline in the army, nevertheless it was true that they were, in fact and in law, justified in contemplating refusal to obey.

But there never had been, and was not now, any intention of giving outrageous and illegal orders to the troops. The law would be respected, and must be obeyed. What had now to be faced was the possibility of action being required by His Majesty's troops in supporting the civil power, in protecting life and property when the police were unable to hold their own.

Attempts had been made to dissuade troops from obeying lawful orders given to them when acting in support of the civil power. This amounted to a claim that officers and men could pick and choose between lawful and reasonable orders, saying that they would obey in one case and not in another.

The Army had been quite steady. During the past year there had not been brought to the notice of the authorities one single case of lack of discipline in this respect. At the same time, in view of the statements in the press and elsewhere, it was well to make the position clear.

I informed them that I should hold each of them individually responsible to see that there was no conduct in their commands subversive of discipline.

They could let it be clearly understood that any such conduct would be dealt with forthwith under the King's Regulations. If any officer should tender his resignation, they would ask for his reasons, and if he indicated in his reply that he desired to choose which order he would obey, I would at once submit to the King that the officer should be removed.

Instructions to Sir A. Paget.

War Office, Whitehall, S. W. 14th March, 1914.

Sir,—I am commanded by the Army Council to inform you that in consequence of reports which have been received by His Majesty's Government that attempts may be made in various parts of Ireland by evil disposed persons to obtain possession of arms, ammunition, and other Government stores, it is considered advisable that you should at once take special precautions for safeguarding depots and other places where arms or stores are kept, as you may think advisable.

It appears from the information received that Armagh, Omagh, Carrickfergus, and Enniskillen are insufficiently guarded, being specially liable to attack. You will, therefore, please to take the necessary steps and report to this office.

Officers in command of all barracks where guns, small arms, ammunition, and other Government stores are located should be warned that they will be held responsible that all measures to ensure the safety of the stores, etc., under their custody are taken, and that at no time should barracks or buildings be left without adequate armed guards.

I am to add that although certain places have been specifically referred to above, the intention is that no steps should be omitted to ensure the safety of Government arms and stores in the South as well as in the North of Ireland.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Sir A. Paget to the War Office.

March 20, 1914 [Received 7 P. M.]

Officer commanding 5th Lancers states that all officers except two and one doubtful are resigning their commissions to-day. I much fear same condition 16th Lancers. Fear men will refuse to move.

Sir A. Paget to the War Office.

March 20, 1914 [Received 11 35 p. m.]

Regret to report Brigadier and 57 officers 3rd Cavalry Brigade prefer to accept dismissal if ordered North.

Secretary for War to Sir A. Paget.

Despatched Midnight, March 20, 1914.

War office, Whitehall, S. W.

Your telegram with reference to 5th and 16th Lancers received. You have authority of Army Council to suspend from duty any senior officers who have tendered their resignations or in any other manner disipated your authority.

Take whatever action you think proper and report to the War Office.

Direct Gough and officers commanding 5th and 16th Lancers to report themselves to the Adjutant-General at the War Office without delay. They should leave by first possible boat. They should be relieved of their commands, and Officers are being sent to relieve them at once.

Resignations of all officers should be refused.

General Gough's Report.

Headquarters, Irish Command.

With reference to the communication from the War Office conveyed to me verbally by the Commander-in-Chief this morning, I have the honour to report the result of my interviews with the officers of my brigade.

The officers are of unanimous opinion that further information essential before they are called upon at such short notice to take decisions so vitally affecting their whole future, and especially that a clear definition should be given of the terms "Duty as ordered" and "active operations" in Ulster.

If such duty consists of the maintenance of order and the preservation of property, all the officers in this brigade, including myself, would be prepared to carry out that duty.

But if the duty involves the initiation of active military operations against Ulster, the following numbers of officers by regiments would respectfully and under protest prefer to be dismissed:—

Brigade Staff, two officers.

4th Hussars, 17 out of 19 doing duty.

5th Lancers, 17 out of 20 doing duty.

16th Lancers, 16 out of 16 doing duty.

3rd Brigade R. H. A., six out of 13 doing duty, "including R. M."

4th Field Troop R.E.,—one out of one doing duty.

3rd Signal Troop R. E., one out of one doing duty.

In addition the following are domiciled in Ulster, and claim protection as such:—

1th Hussars, two officers.

5th Lancers, one officer.

3th Brigade R. H. A., two officers.

Curragh, 20th March, 1914.

Copy of Letter from Brigadier General Gough to the Adjutant-General.

23rd March, 1914.

Dear General,—On thinking over the points raised by the Secretary of State this morning, the question has arisen in my mind, and it will undoubtedly be one of the first questions asked me by my officers when I see them, viz.:

In the event of the present Home Rule Bill becoming law, can we be called upon to enforce it on Ulster under the expression of maintaining law and order?

This point should be made quite clear in your draft letter, otherwise there will be renewed misconceptions.—Yours, sincerely, (Signed) H. R. Gough.

Instructions to General Gough.

Brigadier-General H. De la P. Gough, C. B.

You are authorised by the Army Council to inform the officers of the 3rd Cavalry Brigade that the Army Council are satisfied that the incident which has arisen in regard to their resignations has been due to a misunderstanding.

It is the duty of all soldiers to obey lawful commands given to them through the proper channel by the Army Council, either for the protection of public property and the support of the civil power in the event of disturbances or for the protection of the lives and property of the inhabitants.

This is the only point it was intended to be put to the officers in the questions of the General officer Commanding, and the Army Council have been glad to learn from you that there never has been, and never will be, in the brigade any question of disobeying such lawful orders.

His Majesty's Government must retain their right to use all the forces of the Crown in Ireland or elsewhere to maintain law and order and to support the civil power in the ordinary execution of its duty.

But they have no intention whatever of taking advantage of this right to crush political opposition to the policy or principles of the Home Rule Bill.

The Army Crisis. The House of Commons.

Colonel Seely's Resignation.

March 23.

MR. BONAR LAW (Bootle, Opp.), who was greeted with cheers, said:—With reference to to-day's debate, there is a suggestion I should like to make to the Prime Minister. It must be evident to every one that there are many gaps in the White Paper which require to be filled up before there can be an adequate discussion of the subject. I shall only name one or two of the questions which I think must be answered, and as I understand that the Secretary for War is going to speak immediately afterwards, I shall be quite satisfied if he takes note of them and answers them in the course of his speech. Is there any addition, as is reported in the Press, to the letter that was given to General Gough, and, if so, what are the terms of that addition? Another question is in reference to the promise given by the Prime Minister that the memorandum of the verbal instructions given General Paget would be included in the White Paper. They are not here, and I ask the Secretary for War to fulfil that pledge by reading them in the course of his speech. I wish to know also whether the War Office will now communicate the authentic version of Sir Arthur Paget's of the address which he himself gave to his commanding officers, and which was the cause of the resignations. The only other question I wish to ask now is whether or not the letter sent by General Gough on behalf of the officers was communicated to the War Office before they dismissed General Gough, and to the two colonels of the regiments. (Cheers.)

The War Secretary's Speech.

On the order for the second reading of the Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill.

Colonel Seely (Ilkeston, Min.), who was received with cheers, said:—In view of the statement which I shall feel it my duty to make at the conclusion of my speech, I beg to ask the indulgence of the House in explaining to them, not only my knowledge of the facts connected with this correspondence, but also my personal share in this matter. I shall hope to make the story as complete as I can, and I can assure the House and hon. members in all quarters of the House that I hope to conceal nothing and to tell the whole story. (Hear, hear.) I will deal first with the meeting I had with the general officers commanding in chief in December. The Chief of the Imperial General Staff and the Adjutant-General represented to me that owing to attempts which had been made in many quarters to subvert the discipline of the Army—I make no complaint on one side or the other for the moment—it was desirable that special steps should be taken in order to ensure that that discipline should be maintained. At their suggestion I accordingly summoned the general officers commanding in chief of the six commands in the United Kingdom and I laid before them the document which is here printed.

The general officers commanding in chief accepted the statement that I had made to them and promised me, naturally enough, that they would do their best to ensure that there was no indiscipline in the Army (cheers), and that if and when any officers should attempt to resign their commissions, rather than obey a lawful order to support the civil power, they would take the action which I had then informed them that I had decided it was my duty to take. From that day until the recent occurrences in what we may call the Carragh incident there had been no resignation of any Regular officer. Fourteen cases occurred of retired officers who wrote to the War Office, saying that they must qualify their promise to serve on mobilization. They were informed by the Army Council that the Army Council could not accept any qualified service. (Cheers.)

SAFEGUARDING MILITARY DEPOTS.

I pass now to the second of the documents here printed. Owing to information received by the Government, I considered it necessary to take special steps as Secretary of State for War to safeguard certain depôts—namely, Omagh, Armagh, Enniskillen, and Carrickfergus—from the possibility of attack by evilly-disposed persons. I was then, and am now, aware that any such attempt would be discountenanced by the responsible leaders of the Ulster movement. (Hear, hear.) Such was my information; but I also knew, from information placed before me, that there was a very real possibility in the present disturbed state of these very important places being attacked, and here may I say that the right hon. gentleman, the member for the City of London (Mr. Balfour) has not perhaps quite realized how important a place a depôt of Army stores on mobilization is. I therefore caused to be issued in the name of the Army Council, who, of course, were fully cognisant of these movements, the necessary instructions which are contained in the second document. I need hardly say, also, as has been stated by the Prime Minister, I did so with the full authority of the Cabinet, who had considered this matter. Sir Arthur Paget came over to London to discuss with us the best manner of carrying out these movements. (An Opposition member, "What date?") I cannot carry in my head the exact date, but it was a few days afterwards. It was after the 14th, and it would be about the following Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain (Worcestershire, E., Opp.)—Was he summoned to come over?

Colonel Seely.—He was summoned to come over, and so far as my recollection serves me, he was anxious to come over in order to discuss it. That is not a material point. Obviously, he would be desirous to discuss this important movement of a precautionary nature, and we were anxious to discuss it with him. It appeared to us and to him that although these movements were of a purely precautionary character, there was a possibility that a state of excitement might be caused which would result in civil commotion in all parts of Ireland. We therefore took the necessary steps to support these movements in the event of their being opposed by armed force. We did not think it likely, but we thought it possible, and the General Officer Commanding would have failed in his duty if he had not represented to me, as he did, that he must be quite certain that he would be able to safeguard those vital points from possible attack. I would ask the leader of the Opposition if he would interrupt at any time if I fail to answer the questions which he put to me, as they were given to me at such short notice that I may miss them in the course of the statement I have to make. Sir Arthur Paget then returned to Dublin. The moves were carried out, and there was no opposition or difficulty.

Mr. Bonar Law.—May I interrupt, at the right hon. gentleman's suggestion? One of the questions I put, and prominence was also given to it by the Prime Minister, was that the memorandum on the verbal instruction given to Sir Arthur Paget would be communicated to the House.

Colonel Seely.—My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has no recollection of making that statement, but I have nothing to conceal.

Mr. Bonar Law (reading from the official report).—"May I ask the Prime Minister whether the statement will include the memorandum of the Secretary of State for War to the Chief of General Staff as to the oral instructions given to Sir Arthur Paget? The Prime Minister.—Yes, Sir."

The Prime Minister.—Yes, but that is the first paper. (Hon. Members.—"Oh.")

THE AUTHORSHIP OF A MEMORANDUM.

Colonel Seely.—May I clear this up. I can assure the House that I wish to tell them the whole story. (Cheers.) With regard to the officer question, the only instructions were those contained, as the Prime Minister says, in this paper. All other instructions were, as they ought always to be, verbal instructions. With regard to the movements there were no written instructions, but there were constant conferences between myself and the Chief of the General Staff, the Adjutant-General, and Sir Arthur Paget, in regard to the movements which must be taken in the event of these attempts to safeguard, as we hoped successfully, the stores at Omagh, Carrickfergus, Enniskillen, and Dundalk, where the guns were. My answer to the right hon. gentleman is, then, that there are no other written instructions to Sir Arthur Paget. I made no memorandum, and, indeed, it would be ridiculous that I should, of the consultations I had with Sir Arthur Paget, together with the Chief of the Imperial General Staff and the Adjutant-General in regard to these movements. If there should be such a memorandum, it was not prepared by me, and if there be such a memorandum prepared by the Chief of the General Staff, I am sure there is nothing to conceal. The position is perfectly clear. We desired to make sure that these places were safeguarded. We were most anxious to avoid any chance of a collision. (Cheers.) Sir Arthur Paget himself was most anxious to take any and every step to avoid a provocative action, and so informed me and so informed his officers.

Sir Arthur Paget returned to Dublin. The movements were carried out, and every order was punctually obeyed. The next matter which appears in these papers is the telegram from Sir Arthur Paget, which is printed as the third of these documents, saying:—"Officer commanding 5th Lancers states that all officers, except two and one doubtful, are resigning their commissions to-day. I much fear same conditions in the 16th Lancers. Fear men will refuse to move."

Mr. Bonar Law.—You have missed one of the questions. One of the questions I asked was that you would repeat to us the version given to him by Sir Arthur Paget as to the instructions given to his officers.

AN APPEARANCE OF DELIBERATE DEFIANCE.

Colonel Seely.—We have not got to that point yet. I received on the evening of March 20 this telegram about Sir Arthur Paget. I summoned the Chief of the Imperial General Staff and the Adjutant-General to my house, when I received it, and we dispatched a telegram. In that telegram, as hon. gentlemen will see, we stated that the senior officers should come at once to London, that they should be relieved of their commands, and that officers would be sent to relieve them. (Cheers.) It appeared to us from the telegrams received—and I think the House will agree that it was likely we should make that assumption—that these officers had deliberately defied the lawful order of Sir Arthur Paget and had defied his authority. The officers arrived in London. With them came this document which is printed—a letter from General Gough, which shows conclusively that there had been a complete and honest misapprehension of the statement made by Sir Arthur Paget to the meeting of officers which he held.

SIR ARTHUR PAGET'S VERSION OF HIS SPEECH.

I had better now state what Sir Arthur Paget himself says in the concluding portion of this statement to the officers, who consisted of the divisional generals and the brigadier-generals under his command, except those who could not arrive because of the distance, for instance, the general from Cork. This is what he telegraphed last night to say what is his recollection of the substance of what he says:—"Sir Arthur Paget felt that the outcome of the precautionary moves might be misinterpreted and lead to a situation demanding further action and he felt that the time had come when he must ascertain upon what general officers and others he could rely." (Cheers.) That is all I have obtained by telegram from Sir Arthur Paget. (Opposition cries of "Oh" and Ministerial cheers.) That is all I received last night by telegram from Sir Arthur Paget with reference to the statement, by his military Secretary and my private Secretary, I hope the House will appreciate how difficult it is to keep pace with these rapid movements of telegrams and men, and will excuse us for not having printed this, seeing it only arrived late last night. I have seen Sir Arthur Paget since this episode. I saw him the other night after the debate on Monday, after the right hon. gentleman spoke. I asked him if he could explain this discrepancy.

WILD RUMOURS.

Might I put it this way in order to make the House understand what the discrepancy was? These officers believed that there was a plan to treat Ulster as an enemy country, and to overwhelm her with a surprise attack. That was their honest belief (Ministerial laughter and Opposition cheers), and that belief, I can imagine, must have been largely fostered—I make no charge—by the wild rumours that flew about, as we had foreseen they would, as a consequence of these moves—first, that 200 warrants were out to arrest all the leaders, for which there was not a shadow of foundation (cheers); but were published widely throughout the Press; and, secondly, that there was a secret movement to move instantly and disarm the Ulster volunteers. There was not one shadow or shade of foundation for either of these suggestions. (Cheers.) They never occurred to me, they never occurred to the Prime Minister, they never occurred to any member of the Cabinet, but we know that directly we moved to safeguard these depots wild rumours would fly about, and that is the justification, and I submit an absolute justification, of my action as Secretary of State for War in accepting a suggestion of Sir Arthur Paget and of all competent soldiers that we ought to be prepared for a state of disorder following on these necessary movements. These officers believed that this was the intention. Sir Arthur Paget has informed me that he cannot understand how they could obtain that impression from anything he said. He stated to me before he left that he had made it clear to the officers that these were precautionary movements, that they might have to be supported, that there was no intention whatever of taking the initiative, as General Gough thought, of surprising Ulster, and that what was necessary was to secure that the movements should be carried out.

Mr. Bonar Law.—I certainly do not want to interfere with the right hon. gentleman's speech, but we do wish to have it as clear as possible. The right hon. gentleman heard the version of Sir Arthur Paget's speech which I gave. Did he not take the precaution to ask Sir Arthur Paget to give in writing his account, and now will he kindly explain how the difficulty had arisen with the officers, seeing that the whole difficulty was that they thought they were to be engaged in initiative engagements against Ulster, after Sir A. Paget had said there was no such intention?

AN INACCURATE VERSION.

Colonel Seely.—I will deal with both points. The first question is, Did I ask Sir Arthur Paget whether the letter the right hon. gentleman read out purporting to come from an officer who was present. I think (Mr. Bonar Law nodded assent), formed an accurate version of what he said. Sir Arthur Paget had to return immediately to Ireland. I asked him whether that did represent accurately what he said. He told me "No it certainly did not." Parts of it, he said, were an accurate version of parts of what he said, but parts of it were wholly inaccurate. What General Paget said was this, and I repeat it again. He told the officers, first, that the movements that had to be made were with the object of safeguarding the depots and Government property, and that it was necessary for him to make sure that he could support these movements.

"IN A BLAZE."

With regard to the phrase which the right hon. gentleman says was used, "in a blaze," he told me that he said there might be a blaze, certainly a blaze in the Press. (Ministerial cheers.) I do not wish to strike any controversial note, for the moment is a very serious one to me, and I only wish to tell the whole story as completely as it can be told. The next point is the officers being here are interviewed by the Adjutant-General. They explained to the Adjutant-General that they had no idea that they were only going to be asked to support the civil authority and to maintain law and order. Indeed General Gough went so far as to say that had he been ordered to Belfast he would have gone without question. (Opposition cheers.) It was only because of a misapprehension, which he had obtained from something said, that made him think that there was to be some attack upon Ulster in order to crush her by force of arms before she was ready. I wish to be absolutely fair to all parties. When he sent this message which is here printed, the Adjutant-General, who is charged with the discipline of the Army under me and under the highest authority, considered that the explanation of these officers was satisfactory. The Chief of the Imperial General Staff also interviewed General Gough. Those two high officers of the Army Council together brought General Gough to my room, where Sir Arthur Paget was present. I told General Gough that it was reported to me by the Adjutant-General and the Chief of the Imperial General Staff that he was prepared to obey all lawful orders. He replied that he was prepared to obey all lawful orders. I said to him "How has this difficulty arisen?" and he said, "Because we thought we were going to be asked to coerce Ulster and that an immediate movement was to be made in which we were to take the initiative." "That it would seem to me," said General Gough—I paraphrase his words, I could not take them down at the time—"that seemed to us to go outside the lawful orders which we are bound to obey." I then put to him the substance of what is printed at the conclusion of this document, and I would ask hon. gentlemen to turn to it. I said to him, "It must be made clear that his Majesty's Government must retain their right to use all the Forces of the Crown in Ireland or elsewhere to maintain law and order, and to support the civil power in the ordinary execution of its duty." But I said to him, with regard to your second question, it is quite clear that it is your duty to go anywhere in Ireland or elsewhere in support of the civil power whenever it is attacked. I can tell you clearly since the situation already has been made irregular, I think it proper to tell you clearly that his Majesty's Government have no intention whatever to take advantage of the right to protect the civil power whenever attacked, or however attacked, in order to crush political opposition—in other words, to shoot down enough people who have shot nobody else in order to make the rest submit to a law of which they disapproved. I would ask my hon. friends on this side, and members in all quarters of the House, whether there is one man in this House who would demur to that statement. (Cheers.) To this General Gough agreed, but he said, "There have been many misunderstandings already; would it not be better that this clear statement should be put in writing to me?" I said to him—

Mr. John Ward.—Did he dictate the letter?

Colonel Seely.—I said to him, "I consider that it is not only desirable, but necessary that you should have this in writing, and I propose to put it in writing."

THE KING.

Now I must ask the indulgence of the House if I give them an account of my personal movements and actions which led up to the decision which I have felt obliged to take. After seeing General Gough I went to the Cabinet. I told them what I have now told the House, and I added that, as I had not had time to draw up any statement of what I had said, I would ask the Adjutant-General to make a rough draft for me to consider. At 1 o'clock I had arranged to see his Majesty at Buckingham Palace to report to him how matters stood. And may I say here, Sir—I think it proper to say—that any suggestion which has been made outside—none has been made in this House—that his Majesty took any initiative of any kind in this matter is absolutely without foundation? (Loud cheers.) A situation of grave peril to the Army had undoubtedly arisen, and I reported at frequent intervals to his Majesty, who is head of the Army, how matters stood, and I wish emphatically to repeat the statement I have made—

Mr. Wedgwood.—What is "initiative"?

Colonel Seely.—I do not wish any misapprehension. I use the word in its broadest sense his Majesty took no initiative of any kind.

Mr. Wedgwood.—What is initiative?

Colonel Seely.—I have nothing more to say. I returned from the audience that his Majesty was pleased to grant me to the Cabinet, which had then broken up. I found that in my absence they had discussed the draft which the Adjutant-General had prepared of what I had said, of what it was proper for me to recall as a record of what had taken place and as a record of what was proper for us to say. I had only a moment, and the Prime Minister had but a moment to give me, and this draft had been altered in various particulars. I do not regard it as a complete document. Indeed, in form it did not appear to me to be so. I understood that I, as Secretary of State, was charged with the duty of making a statement to these officers in accordance with the decision to which I had come at half-past 11, and accordingly I proceeded to fill up that statement in order that it might conform to the statement I had made, and to the statement which I thought it was right to make. These two paragraphs are found at the concluding portion of this paper. I then sent the document over to the War Office. In the meantime, I would ask the House to observe this. I had received a letter from the Adjutant-General enclosing a letter from General Gough, which is printed as the last document but one. The letter did not seem to me to be material. Indeed, to be quite frank, I paid little attention to it, for this reason, that General Gough had never seen the document which I was considering, and could not have the least idea of what was in it. Therefore any idea that might be gathered from the form of this paper that after General Gough protested we drew up this document in order to meet his wishes would be an inaccurate statement, because General Gough had not seen the document, and could not have seen it when he wrote that letter.

MEANING OF THE DOCUMENT.

Now I come to the next point. After General Gough had received this document which I had drawn up, he asked Sir John French—a fact of which I only became aware this morning—whether this document meant—and as there is no copy of this document in the possession of Sir John French or the War Office, I can only state the general purport of it, and I hope I state it accurately—that he would not be called upon to order his brigade to take part in the coercion of Ulster in order to compel them to submit to the Home Rule bill, and across the document Sir John French wrote, "I should read it so." I am quite sure that Sir John French, whose loyalty and help to us in this crisis I desire to acknowledge to the full, this great soldier to whom the honour of the Army is dear, but who, at the same time, is determined to see that discipline is maintained (cheers)—I am quite sure, indeed I know, that what he meant by that was a re-assertion of the last two paragraphs. No possible blame in this matter can attach to Sir John French or to any member of the Army Council, for, as it is observed that the Army Council itself, or those members of it who signed the document—namely, Sir John French and Sir Spencer Ewart—did not know that this was not a Cabinet document, so they are absolved from all possible blame in the matter.

COLONEL SEELY'S ACCEPTANCE OF BLAME.

Moreover, if blame is to be apportioned no possible blame can attach to Sir Arthur Paget. He has acted throughout with loyalty, and a determination to do his duty beyond all praise, and I desire to say that he has the full confidence of the Army Council, and of all those who work with him. (Cheers.) Now comes the question of where the blame, if blame there is, does really rest. Blame does rest, and it rests upon me, and I will tell the House for what. I added to a document which the Cabinet had considered my version of what I thought should be said. I have said, and I repeat, that I did not apprehend that the Cabinet had seriously considered this document, and regarded a document of this kind as a matter of vital concern to them all. I see now that it is (Ministerial cheers)—not at all because I recede by one inch from the principles laid down in the last two paragraphs—but because it does appear that an officer asked for conditions, and that his conditions were accepted, I did not so understand it, but I can see quite clearly that, taking it broadly, that impression can be given, and if I have given that impression, however inadvertently, even though my intentions, as I assure the House they were, were honestly to do my duty in this matter (cheers) I have been gravely to blame. Before I conclude let me add one word—the Army Council are greatly concerned in this matter. They did not sign as a body this actual document, for as is proper, any three members of the Army Council, any two and the Secretary of State, may send an Army Council letter, or make an Army Council decision, always assuming that they are carrying out the general policy of the Council, as is the custom whether in Cabinets or any other society of men. But they ask me to say this, and to say it most emphatically, in order that their position may be clear, that nothing that has been said to any of these officers detracts in any way from their power and their duty to employ all forces of the Crown should they be required, which are under their control, in accordance with the principles laid down in the Army Act and in the Manual of Military Law, and they wish me to emphasize this without any qualification whatever as their considered judgment, and I will read the words, although they are on the papers. This is what they ask me to read, as their considered judgment without any equivocation whatever, from which they will not recede:—

RESIGNATION TENDERED.

Now I hope that I have made the position of the Army Council quite clear, and I have now only to say this. I have misled my colleagues in the Cabinet inadvertently—with honest intentions I misled them. They thought that the document which they had prepared was final. I did not know that. Had I been present at the discussion, none of this misunderstanding would have occurred. (Cheers.) I am not going to make excuses, but the House will realize how great the pressure of work has been in a crisis which has been of very real magnitude, and owing to my absence this misapprehension occurred; but that does not alter the fact that I am gravely to blame in my judgment, and for that reason, while I ask the House to believe that throughout this difficult business I have acted with the sincere desire to be loyal to my colleagues (cheers), and to see fair play to the Army, I have felt it my duty to ask the Prime Minister to accept my resignation of my office. (Cries of "No," "No.")

Speech by Mr. Balfour.

AN OBSCURE SITUATION.

Mr Balfour (City of London).—My right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, naturally, and I think rightly, desires to reserve his right of intervening in this debate until the course of this discussion has developed somewhat further, and he asked me, therefore, to say a few words upon the statement just made by the Secretary for War. I will not pretend that after that statement that I understand clearly the exact sequence of events, nor that I understand how it happened that this extraordinary misapprehension occurred in Ireland on the part both of the generals and of the officers concerned. Nor do I even understand exactly what occurred between the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues in the Cabinet. (Cheers.) Others who have listened to the right hon. gentleman's statement may be more fortunate than myself, but I confess that I am left still in some obscurity as to the vital points of this most difficult case. Everybody must listen with sympathy to a statement from any member of this House, and perhaps most of all from a Minister of the Crown, who, gets up to say that innocently, and indeed with the best intentions he has yet made what is in his own judgment a great error, and that sympathy must be redoubled when the speech ends, as the speech of the right hon. gentleman did end, in the statement that he had handed in his resignation to the Prime Minister. I do not know whether that does mean that the right hon. gentleman is no longer, or will shortly cease to be, a member of the Cabinet and a Secretary of State, or whether it only means that he has let the Prime Minister understand that since, owing to what he deems to be an error of his, the Government has been placed in a difficulty, he puts his resignation in the hands of the Prime Minister, to be accepted or not, as the right hon. gentleman and the general feeling of the country, as the right hon. gentleman sees it, may consider proper.

Colonel Seely.—The words I used with respect to the right hon. gentleman were that I asked the Prime Minister to accept my resignation.

Mr. Balfour.—I am left in doubt, and I think that the House is still left in doubt, as to whether the right hon. gentleman is still for all practical purposes a Minister of the Crown at this moment or not.

The Prime Minister.—He is. (Cheers and laughter.)

Mr. Balfour.—In that event my sympathy with the right hon. gentleman, so far as his admission of error is concerned, remains quite undiminished. Of course, I need waste no sympathy on his resignation if it has not been accepted.

AN INCREDIBLE STATEMENT.

I suppose that I shall be followed by the Prime Minister. May I ask just one or two questions, though they are not all the questions which, I think, can be asked about the matter, which seems to me to be extraordinarily obscure, even after all the explanations, the papers and the redoubled explanations which have been given to us from the Front Bench. We are asked to believe to-day, as we were asked to believe on Monday, that there were no military operations in the proper sense of the word at all, that it was simply a question of increasing the guard at certain places where there are stores, either of guns or ammunition or whatever it may be, and that that was absolutely all that the War Office contemplated when they sent for General Paget to this country, and when they sent General Paget back to Ireland, and that out of that innocent and natural action all this trouble has arisen. We are asked to believe that the movements of the Fleet, countermanded when these important military operations could not be carried out without provoking a great conflagration, were merely a part of the routine that had to be observed. That really is a statement which is almost incredible. (Cheers.) Has there been any case where the soldiers of the Crown have not been welcomed in the ordinary course of their duty in Ulster? (Loud cheers.) Has there been any case where there has been any friction between the forces of the Crown and the population of Ulster, and unless the operations were going to be so carried out as to be of a provocative character, what possible ground was there for supposing that these friendly relations would be more interrupted in the course of these reinforcements, than they had been when troops had been moved from that barrack to this barrack, or in the daily intercourse between the forces of the Crown and the population of Ulster? That is not all. The right hon. gentleman has seen General Paget several times; he saw him before the difficulties arose, and he saw him afterwards, and he had telegraphic communication with him between those two periods. The words used by the officer, as reported by General Paget himself, talk of "duty as ordered and active operations." On the words "active operations" the officers asked for explanation from the man who used those words, or from the man who, they thought, used those words. If General Paget did not use those words all he need have said was, "No active operations are contemplated. The words 'active operations' are wholly uncalled for. Nothing is going to be done except to strengthen a guard here and there. If you took my speech to you as meaning anything more than that, you are under a complete misapprehension, or I expressed myself badly. I did not refer to active operations in Ulster. If I used those words, I used them mistakenly." Sir Arthur Paget never suggests that. (Cheers.) He does not tell the officers concerned that they misunderstood him. He sends their documents without note or comment to the War Office, and if there was a blunder I cannot conceive why it was not put right in a moment. Indeed, it is impossible, even after the right hon. gentleman's statements and after all the facts known to the public and the Press at this moment—nothing would ever make the historian believe that something more was not in contemplation. (Cheers.) In view of the operations of which the right hon. gentleman speaks, why on earth should he send for General Paget in order to consult with that officer as to how he would add to a garrison here and there? Was that a military operation beyond General Paget's competence without consulting the high military authorities at the War Office and without going to the right hon. gentleman himself for instruction and advice?

(To be continued.)

of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (13s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parkees necessary.

The Army Crisis.

London, April 17.

The Committee of the Ulster Unionist Council, with the approval of Sir Edward Carson, has issued a statement, declaring that General Sir Arthur Paget, acting on the instruction of Colonel Seely, informed the Generals on March 20th that Government had decided to undertake active operations against Ulster and also gave details of the plan of operations, whereby the 3rd Cavalry Brigade was to seize strategic points along the Boyne. A force of ten thousand was to come from Lichfield Aldershot, making a total of twenty-five thousand. The statement alleges that General Paget explained that the object was the blockade of Ulster by land and sea. It was not intended that the Army should begin fighting, but troops, aided by Naval forces, were to be held in readiness to support the Police searching depots.

Sir Edward Carson yesterday opened the Drill-hall at Limerick. He said that he firmly believed that Government meant a few weeks ago to provoke a quarrel in order to invoke the forces of the Crown to shoot down Ulstermen. He stated with all his responsibility as Privy Councillor that if it was true a more wicked and more damnable plot against the liberties of the people had never been conceived. Sir Edward Carson proceeded to charge Government with cowardice and infamy and challenged it to arrest him. In conclusion he bade volunteers to ready for any eventuality.

London April 18.

The Liberal papers describe the statement issued by the Ulster Council as a ludicrous effort to pervert truth which will fail to impress the country. The Conservative press says it is a grave indictment of Government which calls for strict judicial investigation. The papers express the hope that meetings will be organised throughout the country to protest against the threatened outrage on civil liberties.

London April, 21.

One of the stormiest scenes between party leaders in the history of the House of Commons occurred to-day when Mr. Bonar Law renewed his request for a judicial enquiry into the allegations regarding the Ulster question. Mr. Asquith and Mr. Bonar Law were alternately at the table, challenging one another amid most angry cries. Mr. Asquith demanded that Mr. Bonar Law should make accusations in the House itself and refused the enquiry but would give an earliest date for a discussion if he would make a charge that Government devised an organised plot with the object of provoking and promoting a rising in Ulster. Mr. Bonar Law replied that the Premier and his colleagues had already made false statements. (Cheers and uproar). Mr. Asquith re-challenged the Opposition to discuss the matter in the House.

Mr. Bonar Law: "If there is nothing to be ashamed of, why no enquiry?"

Mr. Asquith: "The allegation is against the honour of the Ministers." (Cheers and counter-cheers). "It should be made in the House of Commons" (Cries of "Marconi").

Mr. Asquith retorted that Members wanted a roving enquiry to discover whether there was material for a charge. (Uproar).

Mr. Bonar Law said that he would await the publication of the revised White Paper before deciding on the course of action.

Sir Arthur Paget had a Conference with Mr. Asquith at Downing Street yesterday. Messrs. Birrell, Churchill, Colonel Seely, Lord Crewe and McKenna attended.

In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Asquith stated that Sir Arthur Paget had denied that he had told officers that the police would seize Volunteers' arms and the Old Town Hall at Belfast.

The revised White Paper promised by Mr. Asquith was published to-day. It says that on March 17th Sir Arthur Paget was of opinion that the precautionary movement of troops would cause intense excitement in Ulster and would possibly precipitate a crisis. On March 23rd, the War Office informed General Paget that it had been decided to appoint a General Officer Commanding Belfast District who would be invested with control of the local Constabulary. Sir C. F. N. Macready was selected. On March 22nd, Sir Arthur Paget telegraphed on the War Office that he considered that it would be injudicious to announce the appointment until an outbreak occurred as it would be a source of irritation. Colonel Seely agreed.

The White Paper includes Admiralty orders as to the movements of warships to Ireland. On March 19th, the Admiralty directed the Captain of H. M. Scout "Attentive" to proceed to Carrickfergus and land in plain clothes to confer with the Commander of Holyrood barracks regarding the eventual co-operation of the Army and Navy. Stores at Carrickfergus should be defended by every means, even by Naval guns and searchlights. In a written statement dated April 2nd, Sir A. Paget gives an account of his meeting with subordinate Generals at which he explained the orders of Government and accepts responsibility for their misapprehension.

Six Liberal Members of the House of Commons have given notice of a motion demanding that Mr. Bonar Law shall substantiate or withdraw the charges of falsehood he made against Mr. Asquith.

Hindu Immigration.

Victoria (B. C.) April 17.

It is reported that "Komagata Maru" has sailed from Shanghai for Victoria with 400 Hindus on board, seeking entry into British Columbia. All will be refused landing under Order in Council, excluding Asiatic artisans and labourers. The vessel is said to be under charter to a wealthy East Indian, Gurdit Singh.

London, April 18.

In the House of Commons yesterday Mr. Stevens, Member for Vancouver, interrogated Government on the subject of the press despatch, stating that 400 Hindus had left Shanghai for Vancouver. Mr. Roche, Minister of the Interior, replied that instructions had been sent to Immigration Officers to prevent the landing of Hindus.

Rev. Andrews' Arrival.

Bombay, April 17.

Rew C. F. Andrews who had been to South Africa in connection with the Indian question arrived in Bombay this morning by P. & O. Company's mail steamer "Caledonia" from England. He was incapacitated on the voyage owing to an accident. While in London he found Mr. Gokhale very weak indeed. But he was slightly better when he left him last. Mr. Andrews regards the situation in South Africa now as hopeful but is anxious about the redressing of minor grievances, some of which, specially the matter of licences are very important. Mr. Andrews expressed high admiration for Mr. Gandhi's conduct throughout. He had upheld the honour of India under the most difficult and trying circumstances and it was owing to Mr. Gandhi himself, Mr. Andrews remarked that the present favourable situation had been reached. The Indian community in South Africa had acted under his leadership with great courage and endurance. Hindus and Mohammedans alike had shared the sufferings together and worked under Mr. Gandhi for common cause. There was one united body of Indian opinion in South Africa and this followed Mr. Gandhi. Only very small number stood outside, but they were of no account in the counsels of South African Indians. Mr. Andrews left to-day for Calcutta by the Nagpur Mail. Thence he will proceed to Delhi.

The Amir.

Allahabad, April 16.

A Frontier correspondent reports that the Amir has sent an urgent Farman to the Governor of Khost, instructing him to send to Kabul Jirgahs from Jagi Mangal and Katawas tribes to sign an agreement that they will not engage in any rebellion against the Amir and intimating that in the event of their refusal they will be severely punished. The Amir has also issued orders to the Hakams on the border to the effect that Jirgahs of independent tribes intending to enter Afghan Illaka are not to be allowed to take their rifles with them, but must deposit them with the Hakams of the Illaka receiving them back on their return.

Mir Said Jan, successor of Hada Mulla, called upon Jirgah of one hundred and twenty Mohammedans to return all ornaments, cash, etc., which they had looted during the past month in Kunar Illaka from the houses of Ram Singh and others. The Jirgah was granted Rs. 2 per man per day during their stay and they also undertook not to commit any dacoity in future.

In the Amir's Illaka Mohammedans have complained to the Amir that Sardar Khan of Girdos never paid them the allowance granted to them by the Amir through him whereupon the Jirgah issued orders, suspending Sardar Khan and instructing the Governor of Jellalabad to send him to Kabul under escort.

Allahabad, April 17.

The Amir has ordered a palace to be built at Darai Nur near Jellalabad for the next cold weather.

The Amir has written to Mir Said Jan intimating that Mohammed Malaks will be granted a yearly allowance on condition that they send some of their men to remain at Kabul as security.

Our London Letter.

London, April 2.

THE CRISIS.

SINCE I wrote my last letter, as your readers are, of course, already informed by Reuter, Colonel Seely has definitely resigned the War Secretaryship and Sir John French together with Sir J. S. Ewart have also severed their connection with the Army Council. As a matter of fact, the late War Minister had no other course left open to him but to insist on Mr. Asquith accepting his resignation, when it was announced officially that the Chief of the Imperial General Staff and the Adjutant-General had tendered their resignation and that they had refused to reconsider their decision. The Tories tried their utmost to bring about the resignation of Lord Morley as well, which would, of course, have altogether wrecked the entire Cabinet and thus the downfall of the present Government—the sole aim and object of the Opposition—would have, of course, followed as a natural sequel. But the veteran Liberal statesman, on whom, owing to the regrettable absence of Lord Crewe due to indisposition the Leadership of the House of Lords had devolved, and but for whose splendid power as a debator the Treasury Bench in the Upper House would have put up a tame show against the solid body of Unionist peers, is made of a different stuff to that of which the average politician is composed, and not only he has not resigned, but he has actually improved the position of the Government.

vernment to an unparalleled degree. Lord Lansdowne, Lord Midleton, Lord Curzon and a host of other Tory peers, it is an open secret, fought hard to create an impossible position for Viscount Morley. As I have said before, even in spite of some help from the Lord Chancellor, the brunt of the work fell on Lord Morley's shoulders and, though his powers as a debator are rapidly diminishing owing to advancing age, still, on this occasion at any rate, he reminded one of "honest John" of the by-gone days, when his personality and his assistance used to be of such an extraordinary effect to the Liberal Party.

Lord Crewe, I am glad to notice, is back again, and his speech in the House of Lords the other day was delivered in his own characteristic style, full of dignity yet pregnant with sound argument and solid reasoning. The Secretary of State for India did not conceal the fact that he is of opinion that a Press Act, which could prevent the multitude of leading articles in the Tory Press, that have been written during the recent Army Crisis, from seeing the light of publication, would have been an excellent thing for the country. The noble Marquis would do a great service to his own party, the Empire at large, and the millions of India entrusted to his care for the time being, if he would prevent the publication of the scores of leading and special articles, that are being daily written in the Anglo-Indian Press with the basest of motives, by putting the Anglo-Indian Press Act into operation against the editors of such journals, who are to-day enjoying an unmistakable immunity from the existing Act.

The Prime Minister's acceptance of the War Secretaryship has saved the situation, at least as far as the Ministry is concerned. Nothing but his great sense of duty and patriotism could have induced Mr. Asquith to take upon himself the onerous duties of the War Minister, and his action is cordially appreciated by the Liberal as well as the Conservative Parties. He is seeking re-election in East Fife and it is unlikely that the Tories would contest the seat. That is at least their present plan, but one can never safely prophesise as to the Tory movements. Mr. Asquith's connection with his constituency extends over a period of 27 years, during which he has uninterruptedly sat in the House. The magnificent send-off given to him this morning at King's Cross station on his journey to the North is one of the most enthusiastic demonstrations I have ever seen, and whether the seat is contested or not by the Unionists, Mr. Asquith will deliver a series of important speeches to his constituents, which declarations will be heard and read, under the circumstances, by the whole country, as the issues involved are undoubtedly of vital consequences to the nation at large.

The Army Crisis is for the moment over, and it is admitted on all hands that the Tory plot to wreck the Government by using the Army as its medium has miserably failed. Mr. Asquith's parliamentary abilities have survived the most trying ordeal they could undergo, and it is no exaggeration to say that the Liberal Party would have been shattered altogether had its leadership been in any other hands. It is useless to deny that at the beginning of the Army Crisis the Liberals were fully expecting to meet with a catastrophe, the awful consequences of which they were unable to fathom. The issue—army versus the people—critical as it undoubtedly was, has forthwith rallied the entire coalition to a man under Mr. Asquith's banner. He has led them through the crisis and the victory is entirely due to his efforts. The unwavering loyalty of the coalition, no doubt, has proved itself of enormous value to the Prime Minister and he is personally fully aware of that fact. The House of Commons has made it perfectly plain that it could never allow the participation of the Army officers in party politics. The Army must and will obey orders issued through the legally constituted authorities. If military officers are allowed to choose for themselves the occasions on which they would or would not obey orders, that would at once put an end to anything like parliamentary government and military dictatorship would be the obvious outcome of it.

The recent Army Orders, issued on the unanimous authority of the Army Council, including Sir John French and Sir J. S. Ewart (just before their resignation was announced), set forth the duties of officers and men in no unmistakable language. These two distinguished officers' resignation, of course, is not due to any difference of policy, but, as your readers are aware, is due to an entirely personal matter, viz., the fact of their having initialed the War Office memorandum, which included the so-called "Seely-clauses." This they did on the genuine understanding (as far as they were concerned) that the whole memorandum was approved of by the entire Cabinet. It is very necessary that this point should be made perfectly clear, as the Tories are trying their utmost to misrepresent the whole situation. The Government's attitude throughout the Army Crisis had met with the hearty co-operation and approval of the entire Army Council. There is no reason at all to suspect that there is a widespread dissatisfaction in the higher ranks of the Army with the methods adopted by the Government. Such dissensions are merely a handful and of the most irresponsible character. A few young hot-headed Brigadier-Generals may have fallen victims to the treachery of the Conservative leaders, who are at the bottom of all this mischief and scandal, but the overwhelming bulk of officers and men are determined to follow the traditions of their profession and to keep politics rigidly outside their sphere. The Crisis is for the moment over, but the issue involved is certain to be the foremost question before the electorate at the coming General Election.

THE HOME RULE DEBATE.

The debate on the second reading of the Home Rule Bill, in its third and final journey in the House of Commons, now going on in Parliament, has not been a very lively proceeding by any means. The Prime Minister's absence from the House, owing to his seeking re-election in East Fife, is no doubt mainly responsible for this, but the recent Army Crisis has also had a great deal to do with the dullness of the present debate. Mr. Balfour was speaking truthfully yesterday when he said that "you, Mr. Speaker, in all your long experience in the chair, must have seldom listened to a debate whose main essentials were more remote from the subject under discussion than the debate to which we listened yesterday and the day before." On the whole, thanks to Sir Edward Grey's moderate lead, a conciliatory change has become visible in the tone and temper of speakers on all sides of the House. Even the "noble lord, the member for the University of Oxford"—Lord Hugh Cecil—has curiously enough been infected with the new atmosphere, and his carefully prepared speech in the House on Wednesday, in which he earnestly and passionately appealed for some give-and-take on both sides, is one of the most hopeful signs of the times. The final words rest with Sir Edward Carson, who is speaking on Monday night, and the Chancellor's speech likewise on that occasion will no doubt give us a clue as to the Government's attitude. In the meantime, the rank and file of both the Parties are endeavouring to bring their united influence to bear on their respective leaders in favour of some peaceful solution of the thorny question.

M. P.'S JEEP AT PEERS IN GALLERY.

An extraordinary scene was witnessed in the House of Commons last week, when the Army Crisis was at its height. I cannot recall to my mind having seen anything approaching it before.

Lieutenant-General Sir Reginald Pole-Carew, the Unionist member for Bodmin, with quiet restraint, asked for information as to the reported resignation of Generals French and Ewart.

Hundreds of eyes were focussed on the bearded figure of Mr. Gulland, the Scottish Whip, who stepped to the table. "In answer to that I am to say that the Cabinet is still sitting, and that they will not be able to make a statement till five o'clock."

The Unionists, packed shoulder to shoulder in over-flowing rows, set up a long shout of irony.

Up sprang Mr. Bonar Law, his face white as paper. He strove to move the adjournment of the House there and then.

But the Speaker pointed out that this could only be done by a member of the Government on a Friday.

Then came an amazing demonstration. The peers, including Lord Lansdowne, the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Midleton, Lord Curzon and Field-Marshal Lord Grenfell, were seen slowly fling out of the peer's gallery.

Somebody raised an ironical shout. The effect was electrical. In a flash dozens of Liberals, Nationalists and Labour members were on their feet hailing the departure of noble lords, spiritual and temporal, with a scalding torrent of mocking cheers.

THE HOSPITALITY COMMITTEE.

An unofficial committee has been recently formed of English people who desire to show hospitality to Indian students visiting this country. Lord Haldane has consented to act as president, and a number of ladies and gentlemen, representing educational interests in England, the Bar, the Medical Profession, and other aspects of English life, have expressed a wish to join.

It is felt that there are many English people in London who would like to have opportunities of meeting Indian visitors and of making them welcome in English homes, and many residents at holiday centres who would willingly co-operate in offering to Indian students opportunities of joining in English society there. There are also many Indians in this country who would gladly avail themselves of opportunities of coming into more intimate touch with the better sides of English life, and it is especially on behalf of these, who desire to reciprocate the friendliness that the English people wish to show, that the efforts of the Committee will be directed. It is hoped that entertainments given for larger or for smaller numbers may lead to personal acquaintanceships of a more enduring kind, and to the forming of friendships valuable to Indians and to Englishmen alike.

This scheme, if worked on absolutely unofficial lines, as we are told it would be, will certainly go far towards the creation and the promotion of that harmony and mutual understanding which are so desirable from the point of view of both the English people and ourselves. If that excellent motive is conscientiously carried out, the Hospitality Committee would have rendered no little service to the Empire at large. British hospitality in any shape or form would be immensely appreciated by the Indian students in this country, but it is essential that such hospitality should be altogether divorced from even the least spirit of "officialdom," which has done so much harm in the past. Generally, when a scheme of this sort is set on foot, under the innocent garb of pure "friendship and affection," the average Indian student does not fail to "scout a rat" in the plan, as past experience has unhappily only too vividly demonstrated to him the truth of the significant fact that, in spite of such movements originally starting with the best of intentions, they automatically become, in due course of time, transformed into nothing more nor less than what could be only described as semi-official concerns in every respect. The Northbrook Society would serve as an excellent example of what I mean. It was founded, as is well-known, with objects and aims almost similar to those of the Hospitality Committee, and it is only fair to admit that until a few years ago it was most popular with the bulk of Indian students. The Society's old premises in Piccadilly, though perhaps not so spacious and comfortable as the present rooms in Cromwell Road are, used to be the happy rendezvous of scores of young Indians every day, and the genial atmosphere of the then Club-House, absolutely devoid of any (red-tapism or official patronage, exercised a most healthy and invigorating influence on the social aspect of the students' lives. Since the incorporation of the Northbrook Society into the other Indian or Anglo-Indian shows at 21, Cromwell Road in South Kensington, though even to-day I believe theoretically and practically all these Associations that are thus housed under a common roof, are independent and separate, the whole thing has lost its charms. A mysterious and suspicious air of "patronage" enshrouds the entire building, and one looks in vain for that homelike and fellowship which were the typical features of all those who were connected with the "Northbrook" of the good old days.

However, there is no reason why one should not cordially welcome the establishment of the Hospitality Committee. As I have already said, if conducted properly, it is certain to produce the happiest results. The Committee contains the names of some of the most distinguished men and women of this country, though I am bound to say that there are a few names on the Committee which might perhaps seriously handicap the organisers of the movement to render the scheme very popular amongst the Indian students and which might have been with advantage excluded.

The Lord Chancellor, as previously mentioned, is the President and Sir Frederick Robertson Chairman. The following, amongst others, are members of the General Committee:— Lord Reading (the Lord Chief Justice); Lord Incheape; Lord Sandhurst; the Lord Justice Vaughan Williams; Lord Kinnaird, Sir Thomas Barlow; Bart. (President of the Royal College of Physicians); Mr. E. R. Boyan. Sir John Rose Bradford M. D. F. R. C. S., (Physician, University College Hospital); Mr. R. Montagu Burrows (Principal of King's College, London); Sir Henry Craik, K. C. B., M. P.; Sir James Dunlop-Smith K. C. S. I.; Mr. T. Gregory Foster (Provost of University College, London); Mr. J. C. M. Garnett (Principal of the Manchester School of Technology); Sir Archibald Geikie, K. C. B., O. M., (Lately President of the Royal Society); Sir Rickman Godler, Bart. (President of the Royal College of Surgeons); Sir Alfred Pearce-Gould, K. O. V. O., F. R. C. S., (Senior Surgeon, Middlesex Hospital); the Rev. Canon Scott Holland, D. D. (Ryins Professor of Divinity, Oxford); Mr. Montagu R. James (Vice Chancellor, Cambridge University); Sir Alfred Keogh, K. O. B. (Rector of the Imperial College of Science and Technology, London); Sir Henry Seymour King, K. C. I. E.; Mr. E. F. V. Knox, K. C. (Lately Treasurer of Gray's Inn); Sir Robert Laidlaw; Mr. O. E. Mallet; Sir Henry Miers, F. R. S. (Principal of the London University); Sir Theodore Morison, K. C. I. E.; Mr. W. Blake Odgers K. O.; Sir Fredrick Pollock, Bart.; Sir Herbert Roberts, Bart., M. P.; Sir Henry Roscoe, F. R. S.; Mr. A. E. Shipley, F. R. S. (Master of Christ's College, Cambridge); Sir Richard Stapley; Mr. J. L. Strachan-Davidson (Master of Balliol College Oxford); The very Rev. T. B. Strong (Vice-chancellor of Oxford University); Sir Adolphus Ward (Master of Peterhouse College, Cambridge); Sir William Wedderburn, Bart.; Mr. H. G. Wells; Viscount Churchill; Lady Finney; Lady Hyes; Lady Procter; Lady Robertson; Lady Scott; Lady Scott-Moncrieff; the Lady Emily Lutjens; the Hon. Emily Kinnaird; Muriel; Countess De La Warr; Miss A. O. Allen; Miss Isabel Fey; Mrs. Henry Hart; Mrs. Sasson; the Hon. Katharine Thelwig; Mrs. Herbert Whyte.

The President and members of the Hospitality Committee are entertaining Indian students to an "At Home" to-morrow afternoon at 25, Park Lane, which has been kindly placed at their disposal by Sir Phillip Sassoon, M. P.

THE NAWAB SAHIB OF JUNAGADH.

The young Nawab of Junagadh, accompanied by Mr. Abbas Ali Baig, who is an ex-Dewan of the State, attended the Jooma-Namaz this morning, held at Lindsey Hall under the auspices of the Islamic Society. His Highness is sailing for India to-day.

A Warning to the "Zamindar."

THE following is the text of the letter sent to the Editor of the Zamindar by the District Magistrate of Lahore:—

SIR,

From certain articles which have recently appeared in the Zamindar it is quite clear that you are not, what you have represented yourself to me on more than one occasion as being, actuated by a desire to improve the administration by bonafide and honest criticism, but that you are doing your best to stir up agitation among the ignorant masses by misrepresentation and misquotation which might have mischievous results.

I would take first of all your leading article published under a heading which may be translated:—"The Form of Government—what do the people want?" in the issues of the 25th, 26th and 27th February last. The obvious inference from this article is that the British Government belongs to the class which you describe as class 4 and you contrast it unfavourably with Russian rule over Mohamedans, and with the Balkan States, Bosnia, Herzegovina and the Philippine islands. Instances of repressive measures adopted by the British Government are then quoted to illustrate this point.

Further on, with reference to the conduct of officials in India you quote from a speech of Lord Morley's as follows:—"If the details of Indian administration were laid before this house for supervision and criticism, the Indian Government would be exposed (italics are mine) and there would be done more harm than good." The meaning of the word "exposed" as here used is "brought to light" or "given away" in a depreciatory sense. But the quotation is mischievously incorrect and what Lord Morley really said was—"In subjecting details of Indian administration to the supervision and criticism of this House, the Indian Government would be exposed to the kind of criticism (italics mine) which could do no good but harm." Here the word "exposed" is used in quite a different sense and the suppression of the word following it has lent the passage quite a different significance.

I now pass on to an article similarly headed in your issue of the 28th February 1914, and a second article dated the 3rd March 1914, the heading of which may be translated "The cry of the poor—Oh destroyer of the garden root and branch, throw something to this side also." In the former article I wish to call your attention to the following statement. "During the whole of the Mohamedan rule in India the law of levying land revenue (literally tribute) was the same. Government claimed 1/10 of the produce of the land leaving 9/10 for the cultivators." You contrast this with what is done under British rule unfavourably to the latter and in your article of the 3rd March you proceed to contrast the people of India heaven-stricken by famine or plague with the Englishmen enriched by the wealth of India who annually spend 50 millions of pounds on sport and amusement alone. The clear intention of these articles is to show that the Indians were better off under Mohamedan rule than they are at present. Your statement that under Mohamedan rule more than 1/10 of the produce was never taken is an untruth and I am now desired to forward an extract in original Persian from Abul-Fazal's Ain-i-Akbari which shows that the Mughal system at its best under Akbar following the system of Nowsherwan took one third of the produce, and to arrive at 1/3 assumed very high rates of out-turn, and commuted into cash at current rates. I am to call upon you to publish the quotation from the Ain-Akbari after translating it into Urdu in an early issue of your paper and at the same time to publish in your paper the fact that your previous statement was inaccurate.

A refusal by you to publish the correct facts, after having published what was intended to mislead people and arouse feeling against Government, will be taken as evidence of your attitude towards Government and Government will then proceed on that understanding.

Yours truly

Lahore, 7th April 1914.

H. P. Tollitor, Dist. Magistrate.

TETE À TETE

"THERE never was a time," says Mr. Elwin, "when India stands (sic) more in need of some kindly person at her side to tell her what to do." Whereupon, the benevolent author, says the Nation, constitutes himself the "guide, philosopher, and friend" of a misguided people. Being a missionary in India, he naturally devotes much space to expounding and interpreting the tenets of Hinduism. On the perusal of his polemics, we fail to understand how any intelligent person, even though he were only a black man, could have adopted a religion so egregiously debased and shoddy. "But Mr. Elwin is careful to clear himself of the reproach of partisanship"; says the Nation, "he is quite amenable to discussing the 'deep philosophic thoughts,' which a few sympathizers presume to underlie 'the idolatry and folly and indecency which we know exists in the religion.' Alas! on dissection, 'practically nothing at all would be left.' He advances evidence. A certain Hindu poetess—Sarojini Naidu, though there is a 'distinct charm in the rhythm of her verses,' displays 'an utter emptiness' of insight and concept. Hey presto! My contention justified, says our zealous iconoclast." On the same analogy might an Indian critic, on examining the religious thought-structure of Mrs. Hemans, have pricked the bubble of Christianity. Mr. Elwin's area of observation, we are told, is by no means confined to theology. He is equally emphatic upon Indian customs, temperament, literature, and racial characteristics. After Mr. Elwin's verdict, the wonder is that these dusky millions "sneaked on a creed out worn" contrive somehow to live lives that are not wholly miserable and forlorn. There is hope, faith and charity in the land; and the social contrivances that admit of kind, neighbourly offices, fellow-feeling, personal sacrifice, unselfishness, self-surrender, and even innocent little joys and free human laughter, are not mere blunders. Mr. Elwin's loyalty to his creed may be perfect, but even after his missionary experiences in India he has not apparently learnt the simple fact that men can live tolerably clean, pure and purposeful lives even without the help of Christianity. His delving into ancient Hindu lore has convinced him that Hinduism is a structure without solid foundations. And he is amazed that the structure does not fall to the ground. Let us hope this miracle would teach the self-complacent Christian missionary the meaning of true humility and the supreme lesson that God fulfils his purposes on this earth in many ways. We do not, of course, mean that Hinduism is a perfect system of beliefs and social doctrines any more than we can accept the absurd conclusion that without Christianity there is no salvation for mankind. Christian critics of Hinduism and Islam should, however, cultivate a sense of proportion and exercise some degree of tolerance in their hasty judgments on the great creeds that satisfy the spiritual needs of millions.

Mrs. ANNIE BESANT recently delivered a public lecture in Bombay on "national education." She emphasised the fact that education of a nation, when handled by the people themselves, produces the best results. She instanced America whose millionaires had built up her own educational fabric with remarkable results. She expressed her opinion that under Indian conditions it is all the more necessary that the country's education should be taken up by the people themselves. The Government should be looked upon only for expansion and elaboration. Coming down to different systems of education she deprecated the present system of literary education and admired the great store of Indian literature which, she said, was very much neglected. She emphasised the importance of educating the people in their own history and ridiculed the present mode of teaching history where, to quote one instance, Southey's "Life of Nelson" was thrust upon Indian students. Laying stress on technical education she deplored the present condition when Indian chiefs and others were equipping their own technical departments with European heads even when well-qualified Indians could be had. This, she said, was one source of promoting discontent among England-retained youths. Finally, referring to women's education, she bitterly complained of the shameful neglect of the educated Indian males and exhorted them to wake up be-time. Referring to the great, educative influence of the old village 'panchayat' system, she advocated its revival in its fullness and said that it had the potentiality of raising the great edifice of self-government on Colonial lines which was rightly the aspiration and ideal of every educated Indian. Mrs. Besant's estimate of the educational requirements of India is based on insight and judgment. She has laid her finger with deep discernment on the heart of the problem. It is absurd to look forward with confidence to any real intellectual and moral advance as long as the education of the Indian people is not placed in their own hands. We have repeatedly discussed the broad aspects of the problem and have shown how every minor question relating to our educational progress takes its origin in the one fundamental need—the organisation of Indian education on truly national lines. India may need Western teachers for some time to come. She cannot shut herself from Western thought and sit down to evolve a new culture out of her inner consciousness. But the Indian people are the best judges of their own needs and they should be free to lay down the lines of their future development. The Government policy, however, seems to be to emphasise still further the State control over Indian education. The system of education now in vogue is the result of the British Rule, and it is plain that the educational policy of the Indian Government cannot entirely be divorced from what are called "reasons of State." Those who have no sympathy with the political aspirations of the people would like to "reform" Indian education root and branch. In other words, they would have no education that taught people to love freer institutions and claim an effective and responsible share in the government of the country. This is, however, an abject confession of failure. The Government of India has, we are happy to believe, no such qualms of conscience. Its aim is to organise an educational system that would be the surest instrument for the people of India to attain a new social synthesis. This end can be achieved only by allowing the people to build the system themselves according to their own requirements.

MANY devout Mussalmans in India who are now fully satisfied that it was the Hamidian regime in Turkey that had brought the Ottoman Empire tottering to the ground still mistrusted its young saviours—and not unnaturally—when they heard so much of "Ottomanisation" and "Patriotism" and all about وطن بزم جاني and so little about Islam, its Allah and His Prophet. The attitude of the Egyptian Nationalist too, who often talks as if he believed the Pharaohs to be his spiritual as well as ethnic ancestors, and as if he sought inspiration from the Pyramids instead of the Ka'ba and the long line of prophets of the Lord of the Ka'ba, including Moses whom one of the Pharaohs had pursued across the Nile with disastrous results, lent colour to the suspicion that the Young Turks had exchanged the faith of their ancestors for the culture of Parisian boulevards, and the religious fervour that had induced Ayyoub of the Anvar to bequeath his bones to those who live along the Bosphorus for the latitudinarianism of Turkish freemasonry. If this were really true of all the Turks, or even of a great majority of them, including the Anatolian soldier who has borne the brunt of Christian Europe's attacks on the Ottoman Empire for five or six centuries, then, indeed, one who knows a diun Mussalmans would not expect to see even a hundredth portion of the enthusiasm in response to Turkish appeals for relief of war sufferers that the world witnessed among them during the last two years. Indian Mussalmans, or, strictly speaking, such of them as are sufficiently interested in world politics and keep themselves acquainted with current affairs, would have grieved over the fate of Turkey as they do over the fate of Poland, and would have contributed towards the relief of Turkey's sufferings something like the proportion of their wealth remitted, say, by the English or the French. It is clear that what moved Indian Mussalmans to assist the Turks was not merely their humanity or the feeling that actuates the Subject Races and Nationalities Conference, but the fact that they and the Turks share the common heritage of Islam. Non-Moslems often refer to the feeling as Pan-Islamism, but the Mussalmans are quite satisfied with the name that their Maker gave to it when He told them: "Verily all Moslems are brothers."

It is, therefore, obvious that Indian Mussalmans should have been much concerned about the intensity or otherwise of the religious beliefs of the Young Turks; and the stories, unfortunately not unfrequently only too true, of the defiance of, or rather ignoring, the rites and observances of Islam on the part of the upper classes of the Turks, chiefly in the capital and in European Turkey, have done not a little to cool down their affection and esteem for their Turkish brethren. The non-Moslem Turcophobes, who dread the solidarity of Islam and always try to show the worst side of the Turk to Indian Mussalmans, when they fail in everything else, tell them that he is not even half as good a Moslem as they are. This is so telling an argument that it becomes difficult to justify one's regard for the Turk as a brother Moslem after it. Indian Mussalmans are therefore always on the look-out for any indication of the Turks' reversion to the religious fervour of earlier days and pounce upon it like one who loves his mistress dearly, yet doubts her, and clings to the remnants of his shattered faith in her constancy. We wonder whether many Young Turks know that few thoughtful Indian Mussalmans found half as much consolation in the triumphant re-entry of the Ottoman troops in Adrianople as in the silent prayer that lasted an hour after the news of this great event had reached the people. The Irâdî for the establishment of the Medina University and the gift of four carpets to Indian Mosques has meant far more to Indian Mussalmans than the purchase of the Rio de Janeiro and the payment of the last instalment of the price of the Roshadigga. These are things which the Young Turks must take to heart, and we hope our friends Kemal Omar Bey and Adnan Bey, who were lately among us, have not forgotten the demands of their shaggy friend "Hodja Effendi," nor has Khalil Khalid Bey failed to give the message of Indian Mussalmans to the Government of a sovereign whom millions of Mussalmans regard as the Caliph of their Prophet.

In this connection it is a pleasure to note that there is one Young Turk at least who knows the value of religion, and he is perhaps the best product of the Young Turk Movement. Of course, we refer to Enver Pasha whom we heartily congratulate on his marriage with Princess Nijé, the niece of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan. Soon after learning of his elevation to the office of War Minister, an enthusiastic young Aligarhian who had gone to Turkey as a member of the All-India Medical Mission under the Directorship of Dr. Ansari, wrote to Enver Pasha, congratulating him on his appointment and expressing the hope that the new War Minister would try to infuse into the Ottoman Army Islamic fervour and the belief that they are Moslems first and Ottomans afterwards. Curiously enough, just a day or two before this letter reached Enver Pasha, His Excellency had issued an Army Order addressed to the Ottoman forces on the same subject, and S. Feyzollah Bey, Chief of the Bureau of Foreign Correspondence in the Turkish Ministry of War, has now sent him on the instruction of Enver Pasha a cutting from the Tanin giving the full text of that Order. In the course of that Order Enver Pasha states his firm belief that an army without religion can never succeed. It is religion and full faith which are the strongest and most stimulating factors in encouraging soldiers to do their duty and in inducing them to make every kind of sacrifice. A religion, says Enver, which improves morals and purifies the heart, is, for military service, a great spiritual factor for the maintenance of the ideal of unity and discipline. The War Minister therefore earnestly requests every soldier, be he Moslem or Christian, to be strongly attached to the precepts and practices of his faith, and strongly advises all commanders to make every effort so that no one in the Army may remain indifferent to religion. Those who have realized this aspect of the great Ottoman hero's character during the war in Tripoli and who have taken a true measure of the faith which this splendid Moslem inspired in the Arabs of Libya, cannot be surprised at learning that it should have been one of the first Army Orders issued by him. Feyzollah Bey enclosed a card of Enver Pasha as a token of His Excellency's regard for our correspondent, and assured him that the infusion of religious spirit into the Ottoman Army and into Ottoman life generally was the principal ideal of Enver Pasha. Long may he live and long may Islam remain his highest ideal and aspiration! We are thankful to our correspondent for sending us the correspondence in the original, and it would no doubt be a source of gratification to him that his own thoughts and those of the great Moslem there ran in the same groove in this matter.

SIR MICHAEL O'DWYER, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Panjab, has often deplored the existence of bitter racial feelings in his province. He has sought on more than one occasion to bring home by wholesome advice to both the Hindu and the Moslem leaders their grave responsibility in the matter. There is, however, something malign in the atmosphere of the province which keeps the two communities in perpetual wrangle and discord. The spirit of the peace-maker has not yet been allowed to permeate this atmosphere. Petty points of tension continue to arise with astonishing suddenness, which feed the communal rivalry and set the communal amour propre on edge. Little incidents in the public life of the province succeed some time in generating an amount of heat that strikes one at some distance from the fray as little short of scandalous. We have no patience for the sanctimonious Pharisee who lurks behind every incident that gives rise to angry snarls on either side. He talks of unity and peace and is all the while promoting with silent persistence the actual conditions that tend to communal self-seeking, aggressiveness and hate. An apt illustration of this method is furnished by the noisy tamasha that recently attended the appointment of Assistant Secretary to the Lahore Municipality. When the post was to be filled, a Mussalman municipal commissioner pointed out that the number of the Hindus in the service of the Municipality was already excessive, and pleaded that the vacant post should in fairness be given to a competent Mussalman. He also referred to the standing order of a former president of the Municipal Committee to the effect that efforts should be made to restore the communal balance in the municipal service. He reminded his Hindu colleagues that it was a case where he expected them to deal fairly with the claims of the sister community, and he hoped that they would have the courage of their professions. When the vote was taken the Hindus voted solidly against the Moslem candidate and pressed the claims of a Hindu subordinate in the Municipality. No decision could be taken at the meeting, and the President suggested that the rival parties should, after informal consultation amongst themselves, come to some agreement before the matter was settled in a formal way. The informal consultation accordingly took place at the President's house, but it proved an abortive effort. The Mussalman members felt that they were pressing for bare justice and could not give way without trampling the legitimate claims of their community under foot. The Hindus maintained a solid front and would not budge. The ideals of communal patriotism and of national unity alike were satisfied when it was decided at last to end the growing scandal and mischief of the situation by giving the post to—a Christian! Truly a heroic decision, and one that would live as a monument of glory to the "Nationalism" as practised in the Panjab. Even this desperate decision—the child of a fearful travail of the spirit that animates the unity-mongers in Lahore—was not, it would seem, finally adhered to. Some secret manipulation and bungling have gone on behind the scenes, with the ultimate result that the Hindu Members' nominee has been installed in the office of Assistant Secretary.

We have set forth these facts in bare outline without the least desire to offer any comment thereon. They represent the pronounced local version of a melodrama that periodically repeats itself in various places. Its tones and tints may be a shade less lurid and loud here and there, but there is hardly any change in the spirit of the tale as it changes local colours and takes on different local settings. The Hindu papers usually ignore such "deplorable incidents" about which, we are sagely assured, "the less said, the better." For our part, we, too, are not particularly enamoured of dragging such sorry transactions into the light of public print,—perhaps for wholly different reasons. We would not have said a word about this affair of the Lahore Municipality but for the speech of Rai Bahadur Ram Saran Das in the Panjab Legislative Council, who, according to the Panjabee, "pleaded earnestly" and eloquently for the adoption of measures for improving the "relations between the two principal communities in the province." He is stated to have said that "the relations between the two communities are getting so strained and their feeling so bitter in some places in this province that unless some prompt and speedy measures are adopted things may grow from bad to worse." The Rai Bahadur would have conciliation boards constituted by officials, and he referred to the Hindu-Moslem conference recently called by Sir James Montagu as an example worthy of imitation. These amiable platitudes may be useful in themselves, and as an expression of individual good-will they have certainly been served out in rooms of glittering phrases from a thousand and one platforms in the country. The Rai Bahadur is only one of the hundreds of the patriots of the platform and the council chamber who have caught the popular trick and are well aware of its uses. When he says that the relations between the two communities in the Panjab are strained, he states what is known to every body, but when he assumes a tone of distress and "pleads eloquently" for the adoption of remedial measures, we are amazed at his audacity. After his performances in the Lahore municipal affair relating to the appointment of Assistant Secretary it required a particularly tough and hardened nerve indeed to stand up and preach unity and goodwill in the Council. The Rai Bahadur was one of the prominent Hindu municipal commissioners who opposed the efforts of his Muslim colleagues for fair dealing. The Hindu candidate was his special protégé, and he has after all got his way by methods which are still a mystery. Did he imagine that by his narrow sectarian pose he was promoting Hindu-Moslem entente? Was he not aware that by setting an example of partisan self-seeking he was increasing the existing "strain" which he now affects to deplore aloud in the Council? Was "the conciliation board," which met under the roof of the Deputy Commissioner of Lahore to arrive at some solution of the impasse that he himself had helped to create, such a thrilling success that he should have rushed to the Council primed with this hollow device? Did it not occur to him that in making the suggestion he was adding neither to his dignity as a councillor nor to his reputation as a public man? It is really sad to think that peevishness such as these can masquerade as patriotism. The Panjabee pronounces its Amen with usual solemnity on the "eloquent" plea of the Rai Bahadur for Hindu-Moslem unity and in another place delivers a particularly silly attack on the Hon. Khan Bahadur Mian Mohamed Shafi, whose useful work in the recent session of the Panjab Legislative Council would earn him the praise of all fair-minded men.

MR. O'DONNELL OF O'DONNELL, writing to us from London, makes the following valuable suggestion for creating greater and more intelligent interest about Indian affairs in England. Mr. Polak in his letter to us had referred to Mr. O'Donnell's idea about an "India House" in London and had written in enthusiastic support of it. Mr. O'Donnell now explains his view of the matter and shows how urgent the need has grown for an Indian centre of information. We are in entire sympathy with his view and will be glad to render all help that lies in our power if efforts are made to materialise it in some suitable form. He writes:—

"I must renew the expression of my pleasure and satisfaction at the perusal of your most valuable paper, which I have shewn and explained to friends in London and Paris. I must at the same time renew my declaration that the peoples of India without distinction, and the nations of Asia generally, commit a tremendous error, full of disastrous consequences, in not having in London a properly organised centre of information and influence localised in a mansion worthy of India. Here in London all the policy of Asia can be studied and influenced. Here in London there are hundreds of friends of the East, both Englishmen and Irishmen, including many members of Parliament who are prevented from bringing your just grievances before public opinion by the total want of adequate means of information, and cultured and capable representatives of India who could direct Englishmen upon the leading subjects which India has at heart. There are no suppressions of opinion or closure of the Press possible here. It is in the highest degree deplorable that the Indian princes and leaders of opinion neglect the absolutely indispensable object of providing a centre of information on Indian affairs for the benefit of the British public. At present, if a group of friendly members of Parliament desire to study an Indian question, they must do it at great difficulty and with no assistance from Indian culture and knowledge. There ought to be three or four high-class and highly educated representatives of the Indian nations and religions, living permanently in London, or carefully replaced, in case of retirement, by other representatives of India equally cultivated and equally distinguished. India ought in fact to have what the far less important Dominions of Canada, Australia and New Zealand possess, namely, an Agent-General with a proper staff of assistants and a proper centre of information. I feel bound to lay these views before you, dear Sir, both because I have always been a warm friend and comrade of Indian patriots and their statesmanlike leaders, and because I feel that it is not fair to the British friends of India, who are here in London, to have no centre of Indian information within their reach, and who very rarely can find Indian speakers and scholars to help them to place Indian grievances before the British public. There ought to be a great deal more co-operation than now exists between the great communities of Mohamedans and Hindus in India, who could be so influential and powerful if they only followed the broad road of civic courage and educated commonsense."

The Comrade.

Charitable Endowments.

I

CONSIDERABLE dissatisfaction has been continually expressed as regards the administration of charitable endowments, and, following the lines of the resolutions passed every year by the All-India Muslim League on the subject, the Hon. Nawab Shams-ul-Huda, now member of His Excellency the Governor of Bengal's Executive Council, asked in the Viceroy's Council on the 24th of January, 1911, the following question:—

- (1) Are the Government aware that there exists a great deal of dissatisfaction in the country as regards the manner of administration of Hindu and Mohamedan endowments?
- (2) Do the Government intend to direct an enquiry regarding endowments which contain provisions for public purposes of a religious or charitable nature, with special reference to the following particulars:
 - (a) Annual profits of such endowments.
 - (b) Amount available out of such profits for public purposes.
 - (c) Institutions of a public nature actually maintained out of such profits.
- (3) Do the Government intend to undertake legislation:
 - (a) for the maintenance in every district of a public record containing particulars of all endowments containing provisions for public purposes of a religious or charitable nature;
 - (b) to compel trustees of such endowments to exhibit periodical accounts either before the Collector or the Judge of each district.

To this interpellation, the late Hon. Sir John Jenkins, Home Member, replied on behalf of Government as follows:—

The subject of the administration of Hindu and Mohamedan endowments of a religious and charitable character, as the Hon. Member is doubtless aware, last came before Government in 1909 in connection with the Private Bill on the subject of Public Charities Accounts, which the Government of the day permitted Dr. Rashbehari Ghose to introduce, reserving to themselves freedom to accept or oppose it as soon as it had been circulated for opinion. The result of the general references made after the introduction of the Bill was to show that, while a considerable body of opinion existed which held that the administration of such endowments was not satisfactory, and which was therefore in favour of the measure, yet there was little or no evidence that these views were shared by the mass of the persons interested, from whose offerings many of the institutions in question had been largely maintained. Since that time the Government have had reason to believe that dissatisfaction exists in certain communities in respect of the management of particular endowments, but they have no reason to suppose that the general attitude of the mass of the persons interested is different from what it was in 1909. So far as the Government are aware, practically no attempt has been made to utilize the remedies which the law already provides by invoking the powers which the Courts possess to enforce the proper administration of such endowments, and they are not prepared to agree to so material a departure from the policy of non-interference in religious matters, consistently followed since 1863, as that which is involved in the proposals made under head (2) of the question, nor are they prepared to undertake, as a Government measure, legislation on the lines indicated in head (3) of the question.

In this disappointing reply the Government alluded to the Private Bill introduced by Dr. Rashbehari Ghose, which aimed at conferring on any Court, having jurisdiction to try a suit under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, in respect of such a trust, the power to order a trustee, on the application of two or more beneficiaries, to cause to be prepared and filed in the Court a detailed account of receipt and disbursements for a period not exceeding three years next preceding the date of the application. These accounts were to be open to the inspection of the public, and failure without sufficient reason to comply with the Court's order was to be made punishable with the removal of the trustee. As we wrote on the occasion of the Hon. Nawab Shams-ul-Huda's interpellation, it will be readily seen that no new duty was to be imposed by Dr. Ghose or Nawab Shams-ul-Huda on the trustees of public charities. Dr. Ghose confined himself to the enforcement of a clear duty of all such trustees, viz., to keep proper accounts, by allowing members of the public interested in the charity concerned the means of calling for and inspecting its accounts without having to undertake the burden of a law-suit. But the Hon. Nawab Shams-ul-Huda, following the Muslim League resolutions, would not wait for an application of two or more beneficiaries, but would prefer that the trustees should submit such accounts periodically as a matter of ordinary routine.

While the Government of India were giving such a disappointing reply to the Hon. Nawab Shams-ul-Huda early in 1911, the Government of Bombay were giving permission to the Hon. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoolla to introduce a Private Bill for the registration of charitable endowments. Sir Ibrahim's Bill aimed at compelling every trustee of property held in trust for a charitable purpose to submit for registration to a Registrar of Charitable Trusts, to be appointed by the Local Government, (a) the instrument of trust or a necessary certified extract therefrom and (b) a statement of the trust property together with the terms and conditions of the trust. The Bill also provided for making out and annually filing with the Registrar of such trusts a statement of accounts, which were to be audited by paid auditors indicated by the Government either by name or by qualifications. These accounts were to be open to inspection by any person on payment of a fee of Rs. 1, and copies were to be permitted to be taken on payment of fees to be prescribed by the Local Government. Wilful default was to be punished with a fine not exceeding Rs. 50, and a daily fine within the same limits for every subsequent default. Offences under the proposed Act were to be made cognisable by a Presidency Magistrate in Bombay and a District Magistrate in the Mofussil, and the Registrar or any other person residing within the jurisdiction of such a Magistrate was to be entitled to make a complaint.

This Bill was obviously framed on the lines suggested in the Hon. Nawab Shams-ul-Huda's interpellation. But two important departures are noteworthy. The term "charitable purpose" was to include relief of the poor, education, medical relief, and the advancement of any other object of general utility, but did not include a purpose which related exclusively to religious teaching, observances or worship. In the second place, the provisions of the Bill were made inapplicable to endowments in which the property affected did not amount in aggregate value to Rs. 10,000, or which yielded an annual income short of Rs. 500.

The Bill of Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah was, therefore, more limited in application than that of Dr. Ghose, inasmuch as exclusively religious endowments and smaller trusts were excluded. At the same time it had a wider scope, for it aimed at enlightening the public with regard to the terms and conditions of charitable endowment from which it may benefit even more than at merely checking malpractices.

Dr. Ghose's Bill is evidently dead, for he is no longer a member of the Imperial Council, and nobody else has yet come forward to adopt it. The Hon. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah's Bill, however, is still in a way before the country, though it has had a suspended animation for more than three years. It seems that the Local Government of Bombay was willing to proceed with the measure although the Government of India had informed Nawab Shams-ul-Huda of their unwillingness to depart from their absurd policy of so-called non-interference in religious matters in relation to charitable endowments which they had followed, with a consistency hardly praiseworthy, since 1863. We understand that the matter was referred to the Secretary of State for India and that he was not quite unwilling to permit steps to be taken for safeguarding the interests of beneficiaries in the manner suggested by enlightened Indian public opinion.

This belief is strengthened by the fact that a little more than a month ago the Government of India held a conference on the subject during an extremely busy fortnight crowded with Budget discussions in the Legislative Council. But if the matter was at all worthy of consideration, if the Government, after disappointing the hopes of educated Indians in 1911 by donating of their consistency since 1863, had felt some doubts about the wisdom of their policy and the applicability to this case of that excellent doctrine, non-interference in religious matters, of which many would like to be assured in a more practical fashion than has been the case at Cawnpore and Calcutta, —if indeed such was the case, then the proper course was the appointment of a Royal Commission to take evidence throughout India and report on the need and the practicability of reform. Instead of that, a hole-and-corner conference was held at a time when few could follow the proceedings, and, as a special feature, the Press was entirely excluded. And not the least surprising feature of the conference was the fact that what the Hon. the Home Member himself called an "exceedingly knotty and difficult" subject was discussed, and, for all practical purposes—at least, so far as the people were concerned,—settled, in the course of a few hours. Our columns were then, and have been since then, exceedingly crowded, as is always the case during India's very short "season for copy." We therefore considered it more advisable to postpone a detailed consideration of the whole question for a time, and now turn to the subject. We hope our readers will give to this important problem the earnest consideration that it deserves.

It will not be without interest to note that the question of Waqfs is regarded as of great importance in many Islamic countries. Waqf literally means "a stopping" or "a standing still", and, according to the Hanafi School, is defined as "the appropriation of a particular article, in such a manner as subjects it to the rules of divine property, whence the appropriator's right in it is extinguished, and it becomes a property of God by the advantage of it resulting to His creatures." The validity of Waqfs is said to be founded on the rule laid down by the Prophet himself under the following circumstances. 'Umar had acquired a piece of land in Khaiber, and proceeded to the Prophet and sought his counsel, to make the most pious use of it, whereupon the Prophet declared: "Tie up the property and devote the usufruct to human beings, and it is not to be sold or made the subject of gift or inheritance; devote its produce to your children, your kindred, and the poor in the way of God." In accordance with this rule, 'Umar is said to have dedicated the property in question and the Waqf is said to have continued in existence for several centuries until the land became waste. According to a similar Tradition reported in Bukhari, the "children and kindred" are not mentioned among the beneficiaries.

It is not our purpose here to give an exposition of the present Islamic Law of Waqfs and its evolution from the Waqf-i-Shar'i or, Khairi through the various interpretations of Muslim jurists to the Waqf-i-'Adi or-Ahli. It suffices to know that according to Young, the author of "Corps de Droit Ottoman," Waqf includes three-fourths of the building and agricultural land in Turkey. Clavel in "Le Wakf on Habous," quoting two other authorities, Bonnard, and Zey, states that the Waqf land in Tunis amounts to a third, and that when the French assumed the direction of Algeria, fifty per cent. of the immoveable property was subject to Waqf. Although no record of Waqf property is available for India, there is every indication that a considerable portion of immoveable property held by Mussalman even to-day must be subject to Waqf.

In 1591, the Sultans of Turkey placed the charitable Waqfs under the supervision of the Chief of the Eunuchs who was given the title of Administrator-General of the Waqfs of the Holy Places. Early in the nineteenth century an Imperial Administration of Waqfs was created, but it was not till 1840 that this was transformed into a Ministry. The Minister of Waqfs has since had a seat in the Council of Ministers, and has under his orders 2,000 officials whose salaries are paid out of the Waqf revenues.

In Egypt, in 1835, Mohamed Ali created an Administration of Waqfs. It is true that it was suppressed within three years, but by a decision of the Privy Council of 1851, approved by Khedive Abbas I, the Administration was re-organised and re-established. According to the decision of the Privy Council, every Nazir (as the Mutawalli of a Waqf is called in Egypt) was obliged to make an inventory of the Waqf property under his direction and render accounts of its revenues and expenditures, the Nazir being held responsible for any losses. Every failure on the part of a Nazir to carry out the wishes of the founder was to be brought before the Administration which had the power to dismiss him. It is noteworthy that all expenses of the Administration were to be paid by the Ministry of Finance, the Waqf property not being liable for any other expenses than those charged against it by the founder. In 1878, Khedive Ismail appointed his first Council of Ministers, and the Administration of Waqfs was raised to the dignity of a Ministry. In 1884, however, Tewfik Pasha took the Waqfs directly under his control in the form of an independent Administration. But only last year the Waqf Administration was once more transformed into a Ministry, though the motives of this change are far from certain. The Waqfs which were under the control of the Administration included all charitable Waqfs which had not been bestowed upon any particular individual; all Waqfs the beneficiaries of which were unknown; and any Waqf placed under the control of the Administration by an order of the Mahkama or by the consent of the Nazir and beneficiaries. The control of the Administration extended to the dismissal and appointment of the Nazir, the supervision of the accounts, the grant of leases, the making of sales or exchanges, and, in fact, to all questions of administration. The Ministry of Finance also possessed a certain power of control with reference to the Budget of the Administration. From 1905 to 1910 the Administration controlled 14,886 Waqfs, of which 8,339 were charitable, and 6,547 were private Waqfs. Obviously such extensive control over charitable endowments, many of them of a purely religious character, could only be conferred on an administration which was of the same faith as the founders and the beneficiaries, in a country and where, unlike Egypt, there could be no suspicion of the dependence of the State on a more powerful State holding other religious beliefs. Such control cannot for obvious reasons be given to an official administration in India. But short of it there are numerous methods of safeguarding the interests of the beneficiaries which we hope to discuss in our subsequent articles.

Young India.

I

Young India is rapidly becoming articulate under the stress of new social and political conditions, but it has not yet learnt the art of self-expression. The old scheme of life that nourished the roots of faith and purpose of the earlier generation is dissolving into its elements. The new order of things is only just beginning to be evolved. The younger generation, that has succeeded to the heritage of a vast social tangle, a medley of vague desires and moral uncertainties and doubts, has not under the circumstances reached the stage of perfect intellectual certitude, and lacks in some degree the clear-cut aim, the sure method and the power of self-articulation that distinguish the life of a well established society. It is dreaming dreams, most of which are vague and fleeting. The magic casements open for a while, and it sees visions of glorious loveliness and splendours of heavenly joy poised ethereally on wings of inexpressible desires, and the tense feeling of the moment shapes itself into some sort of speech. But the accents are strange, the words are incoherent, the emotion is halting and confused. The Utopia slips out of its mental grasp and is entombed in silence. Yet, in spite of failures, the quest goes on. Visions rise and die, but the hope endures. The unconquerable optimism of babes and sucklings of yesterday has not quailed before the vast burden of their race. The inner vitality of the life-force feeds the springs of their efforts, and they are convinced that there exist somewhere free and joyous states of thought and feeling from which Young India cannot long be disinherited. Only if they could utter all that they feel, and experience and suffer, and could mould their utterance into a coherent and beautiful speech, the misery of isolation would end and none of them would ever again feel that he is but

An infant crying in the night,
An infant crying for the light, and with no language but a cry.

As it is, the "infant" cry of Young India has never been heard in its full tragic pathos. Its enemies, devoid of understanding and of common human charity, call it hard names and think that it is full of the wine of insolence and the spirit of revolt. All those who know the innermost emotions of Young India know that it is a hateful and cruel lie. Never has a young generation of people set itself to bear the Titanic burden of a complete social reconstruction with deeper searching of the heart, greater earnestness and more reverent faith in the Power that shapes human ends than the "educated classes" of India. It is narrowness and perversity of the most malignant type that can blind one to the enormous difficulties and anguish of their situation. They stand in the midst of a vast process of change and destruction, in which ancient cultures and hoary institutions are silently crumbling away at the touch of the new iconoclastic forces. They look back into the past and are smitten with blank fear at the sight of the older generation—not yet wholly extinct—which stands dumb and paralysed as if with a sense of doom. The present stares at them as one huge note of interrogation. Only the horizons of the future are lit with hope and trail clouds of glory, but they recede as often as they come in sight. Is it strange, then, that the young Indian who loves his country and whom the Western education has brought into vital touch with the larger life of the world, should still be struggling manfully to construct a new life-purpose out of the debris of the old? His is the most difficult task known to history. He is only at the beginning of his gigantic labours. His path is strewn with frightful distractions. The world-forces of thought, desire, passion play around him. He is not yet firmly set on his course and the goal is not fully in his sight.

جاناھوں توڑی دور مراک تیز رو کی سانپہ
پہچاننا نہیں ہوں ابھی راہبر کو میں

(I swim with every rapid current for a space. I do not as yet know my guide.)

If Young India were not so artless, if it could pour forth its full heart into speech, the story of its inner struggle, of its fond hopes and gnawing fears would move the world. The young educated Indian is a tragic figure—he carries within his bosom the pathos of a great but fallen race. No poet has yet risen to reveal him to himself, no artist has yet caught the whisper of his soul and reproduced it. His romance of hope begins and ends in a circle of mute, individual experience. When he comes to take part in public affairs, in social movements and organised political effort, he has shed most of his enthusiasm. Only his sense of loyalty to his race and country prevents him from retiring tortoise-like within his shell and forget the sorry scheme of things entire. He meets others of his fellows, whose inner race, too, like him, has been run, and they sit together to rough-hew their destiny with an apparent energy of conviction, though each of them knows in his heart that his inner fires have burnt out to ashes. The hope of early days remains to them and they share it in common with some show of enthusiasm.

Without presuming to record the history of the inner struggles of the young educated Indian from the cradle to early manhood, we may take in rapid glance some of the significant phases of his intellectual life and moral tribulations. He is often the child of many prayers, and is born in a home of some material comfort. His parents have often more in common with the past than with the new order of things, which they dimly see beginning to evolve itself out of chaos. They had had their mental struggles, keen, tragic fights with the sense of impending change, which is devouring every familiar aspect of their old world. They have now resigned themselves to the inevitable. If one could lift their brain-caps, one would be amazed to find a host of shy intimations of embryo protests clinging desperately to a multitude of new sense-impressions. Their struggles are over, but there has been no decisive victory or defeat. It is a state of indefinite armistice, so to speak, which the weary mind of the older generation has been forced to accept for its own peace. It loves the past and cannot repudiate it. It does not fully understand the present and, therefore, views it with suspicion and veiled hostility. But the defiant challenges and the battle-cries of the early days have ceased to rend the air. The young educated Indian is born in this atmosphere.

As soon as the nascent consciousness begins to individualise, swarms of loose and unrelated impressions assail it from all sides, and the task of storing, sorting and cataloguing them becomes a crushing burden to the palpitating little mind. There is neither established authority to select and provide for the infant mind its early tools, nor the settled tradition to feed its instincts. Tradition is grown vague and decadent and authority is maimed with doubt. The mother throws out dry crumbs out of her starved and miscellaneous assortment of ideas as the child begins strenuously to construct its scheme of the universe. The father often meets the persistent questionings of the eager, little babbler with a conscience-stricken face. He is terrified at every new mental gesture, every fresh note of the inquiring voice. Sometimes he is afraid of giving sure and definite answers. For the bewildering mass of things he has no clue to offer. His halting, meagre replies suggest still more doubts and more distracting puzzles. His own key to the riddle of the universe has been lost, and he is reduced to blank despair as his son in mute insistent ways demands, in cries of pain and shrieks of joy and in pretty small talk, a key to the thousand riddles which daily grow in his mind and begin to appear in a broadening pucker of the brow. The young child soon begins to lose its zest, and things lose their virgin freshness. The world reproduces itself on its mental retina as some queer arrangement in which unnamable, irrelevant things keep a riotous company and are only related to one's personality by the extent of their power to increase or mitigate one's bodily hunger or pain. This is, of course, an extreme picture of the childhood of the young educated Indian. But it is neither an unfaithful nor an uncommon picture. There are cases in which parents are sure of their ground, and have tried to give confident direction to the growing mind and sensibilities of the child. They are mostly of the type known as "The Old School," that is to say, men who have clung passionately to the old symbols and the old ways of thought. They have provided a cast-iron mould for the younger generation, but the mould has either broken itself, or bent and irretrievably maimed the mind. In all cases the child, when he goes to the modern public school and begins to discover a new world through the text-book, carries with him a mentality which has very nearly lost its spring and in which the main channels of sensibility are beginning to find settled grooves. The home, the street, the school and all the other symbols of organised social life have no easily intelligible relation to one another and do not fall naturally into a picture of the whole. With the school the child is ushered into boyhood and begins his short period of romance.

Aligarh.

The Old Boys' Re-Union and Annual Dinner.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

THE Annual Re-Union of the old Aligharians was as usual held during the Easter holidays. Instead of two, three days were allotted to it this year. Early on the 10th April, in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Justice Rafique, one of the most senior and popular Old Boys, whom every body missed, the new palatial building of the Old Boys' Lodge was opened in the presence of the Honorary Secretary, staff, and a large number of Old Boys and present students by Mr. Syed Zainuddin, the president of this year's meeting. Mr. A. M. Khawaja recited a "Surah" from the Koran Sharif, after which Mr. Shaukat Ali, the Secretary in a short, neat speech explained why the Old Boys were building such a fine two-storied building at a cost of about Rs. 40,000. The position of Aligarh was unique amongst the Colleges in India. Its sons were very staunch in their love and affection for their Alma mater. Not only that they wanted a place where they could stop while paying visits to the dear old College to revive old memories or when coming with their wives who insisted on seeing the place of which their husbands always spoke so enthusiastically and where their own younger sons were being educated but also that they had felt the want of a place where when necessary some distinguished guest to the College could be accommodated. It was "another contribution from the sons to their mother 'Aligarh.'" The "Old Boys' Lodge would also be a sort of pictorial History or Directory of the College. Efforts are being made to collect photos of all those who were connected with it. There would be the great Sir Syed and the group of his devoted friends who founded Aligarh; all those who helped the College financially; all the officials who extended a helping hand to us from the days of Lord Lytton, and Sir John Strachey; all the members of the staff both Indian and English from Siddons, Theodore Beck, Horst, Harold Cox, Shibli Nomani, Walter Raleigh, William Wallace, J. C. Chakraborti, Theodore Morison, Thomas Arnold, Moulvi Abbas Hossain, Pundit Shoo Shanker down to the present day staff. Popular and old College servants and vendors would have a corner to themselves. All the Trustees and the Old Boys would be there, both singly and in their groups. This would in time become a most unique and valuable collection. The building would also have about 1200 stone tablets like those in the Strachey Hall, on which the Old Boys would have either their own names or those of their friends inscribed. All the rooms would be called after the Old Boy Donors and those ready have already been taken up. Nawab Ahmad Said Khan, of Chhitari Messrs. Hifaz Rasul, Sultanbhai Hajibhai Lalji of Bombay, Syed Raza Ali, Ahmed Mozalullah Khan Sherwani and Habiburrahman Khan are the donors. The president before opening the "lock" in an earnest speech appealed to all the Old Boys to stand and work together in harmony and requested the Hony. Secretary of the College to kindly assure the Trustees that they could always count on the loyal co-operation of the Old Boys, who were themselves very jealous of the honour of their Alma mater. Amidst the cheers of all the Lodge was opened. All the rooms have been most tastefully fitted up and furnished and every one congratulated Messrs Shaukat Ali, and Sarfraz Khan, the Secretaries of the Association. After this ceremony all adjourned to the Siddons Union Club, where the Secretaries' Report was read and after discussion, confirmed. There was an increase both in memberships and in the 1 per cent. contribution i.e., the 1210 members against 1087 of last year paid Rs. 12,135 against 12,638 of last year. The realizations were bad and there was a large amount of arrears, which it is hoped would be recovered within this year. The Association besides contributing for the Old Boy Science Chair in the College, paid for the education of four of its wards, sons of deceased Old Boys, and gave two scholarships for Roorkee. It spent about 15,000 on the Old Boy's Lodge this year. It passed unanimously a resolution warmly appreciating the services of the 10 Old Boys who worked for Dr. Ansari's Great Red Crescent Mission to Turkey, sanctioned Rs. 10,000 more for the Lodge; decided to offer two scholarships each of Rs. 2,000 to the Old Boy members of the College and school staff to go to England, France and Germany to study the system of College and School management there and to report thereon to the Association. It passed a resolution strongly condemning the mischievous article appearing over the signature of "Asiatians" casting aspersions on the loyalty of the Aligarh Old Boys and categorically denying the baseless allegations contained therein. Besides other resolutions a vote of confidence was passed for Mr. Shaukat Ali, they requesting him not to resign before the expiry of his term of office as he had wished to do but to spare some time from the Khoddam-i-Kaaba Society and give it to the work of the Association. The Annual Dinner was held on the evening of the 11th and was a great success. The Strachey Hall has become too small for it and so it was held on the Cricket Lawn which was beautifully lighted and decorated for the occasion. Over 1,000 people sat down to Dinner, including besides the College authorities such distinguished guests as Mr. Justice Hasan Imam and Dr. Ansari, Dr. Ikbal could not come but sent a characteristic message in verse, which was warmly appreciated by all.

After the King Emperor's toast which was loyally drunk Mr. Ross Masud in a magnificent speech proposed the toast of the "Dear Old College." It was one of the best things heard in Aligarh and clearly put before all the ideal for the completion of which the Old Boys were to work. It was apparent to all who were present that Mr. Ross Masud was not going to live on the reputation of his great father and greater grand-father and that he was destined to do great things himself. Every one hoped that he would one day be the Provost of the coming Moslem University.

The Honorary Secretary Nawab Mahomed Ishaq Khan and Mr. Justice Hasan Imam on behalf of the Trustees spoke in very high terms of the services of the Old Boys to their Alma mater. The Honorary Secretary of the College assured the Old Boys that the Trustees had full confidence in them and in their love and affection for their Alma-mater and the time was not far distant when all the Trustees would be Old Boys. Let the Old Boys keep on working as they had been doing for the good of their College, which needed greater support and they could always count on him and may rest assured that they would find him sympathetic and helpful. Mr. Justice Imam in his remarkable speech laid great stress on the formation of character and on the cultivating of the habit for serious studies. He made an eloquent appeal on behalf of the education of Moslem Girls. After the toast of the Old Boys, the health of the staff, the guests and the chairman were enthusiastically drunk. Nawab Mahomed Ishaq Khan, performed during the Dinner a very pretty little ceremony. This was the giving away of medals with Red enamelled Crescent in the centres to all the Old Boys who had worked under Dr. Ansari and to Dr. Ansari himself on behalf of those who had worked under him. Those present were Messrs. Abdul Rahman Siddiqi, (General Manager) Mr. Shooeb Kureshy, Mr. Bashiruddin, Mr. Khaliquzzaman, Mr. Abdul Aziz Ansari Mr. Mohamed Ali (the Organizer) and Dr. Ansari (the Director.) All received tremendous ovations.

Besides business and serious functions, there was plenty of sport and each afternoon the Old Boys in spite of their growing years and girths, took in the present students at Tennis, Hockey, Cricket and Football. Ross Masud and Ehsan-ul-Haq easily disposed of the College pair Asad and Anwar in Tennis. In Hockey and Football, there were great struggles and the matches were watched by an enthusiastic and appreciative crowd, who admired all the niceties of the games displayed by the Old Boys.

If weight was to be taken as the proof of the strength of the teams, the Old Boys were easy firsts. They really played well especially Mr. Zamiruddin, the sporting and resourceful Referee. Not only that he saved numerous violent cowardly attacks by the slim Collegians on the Old Boys' goal but he managed to score for them also. I have heard that the "All round" editor of the Comrade who figured very prominently in all the games, has proposed with his characteristic boldness to raise a statue for this Referee—a real upholder of Discipline. He could not allow the "bunches" of the College to forget their position and have the impertinence to beat their elders. We all painfully noticed the vile habit in the present Hockey team of being off-side so often. At least 30 off-sides must have been given against them. In fact the poor Referee instead of playing, was constantly whistling. The Old Boys won in Hockey by 3 goals to 2 ! ! ! ! In Football, the back line was remarkably heavy, the goal alone had four such wide people as Sarfraz, Bashir Mirza, Mohamed Ali and Shaukat. No wonder the Collegians could not score in spite of frantic efforts; with such custodians in the goal, there was no room left for the poor ball to pass through. In the forward line, Messrs. Zafar Omar, Shervani brothers, Haji Hasan and Ansari were doing good work. Shamshad and Ross Masud as half backs were magnificent. Both sides were so well matched that upto the last moment, no goals were scored by either sides. When only few minutes were left, the resourceful "Heavy Brigade" suddenly left the goal and went as Forwards. In a few seconds Shaukat (goal-keeper) picked up the ball in his hands and though surrounded by a host of nimble opponents, by a clever combination of "Soccer and Rugby football, and with a twist of his wrist, sent the Ball into the net amidst the deafening cheers of the on-lookers. This brilliant player was chaired by the crowd, though owing to his weight, they had to drop him pretty quick. It was a pleasing feature that unlike last years, the son were cheering and encouraging their "daddies" all along. I am told the stoppage of pocket monies in the interest of "Discipline" has had most salutary effect. Mr. Justice Hasan Imam who was one of the amused crowds, summed up well. "It was really difficult to pronounce who were the greater babies, the fathers or the sons." A Daniel come to judgment ! ! In Cricket the Collegians were handicapped owing to the absence of their brilliant and popular Captain Prince Hameed-ullah Khan of Bhopal who, however, very thoughtfully had sent besides messages of love, a maund of delicious "Kalakand" for the Veterans. We all missed his genial and sporting personality. Cricket was a drawn game; Ehsan, Shaukat, Mahomed Ali and Ross Masud batting well. Salam and Shaukat were too good as bowlers. The Lodge was gay day and night and Masud (Tommy) fully deserved the affections and thanks of all. All sorrowfully departed after spending three happy days. Au revoir "dear old Aligarh" more next year.

The Army Crisis. Debate in the Commons.

PREPARATIONS AND OBJECT.

REMEMBER, there was no question of secrecy in this matter. It is the idea that there is this manœuvring to compel the Ulstermen to take the offensive (cheers) that so deeply stirs, as I think, the heart and conscience of the country. (Cheers.) If you are only going to relieve a garrison here and there, why was a brigade of cavalry brought into question at all? I do not profess to know anything about these things from a technical point of view, but merely to add a certain number of infantry to certain guards over stores in a country, mark you, where, grave as the tension is, there has never been anything unfriendly passed between his Majesty's troops and the population—to say that you must have all these generals coming over here, that they must make speeches to their officers, that you must call in cavalry brigades and horse artillery (An hon. member.—“And battleships.”)—yes, and a battle squadron—with all these things there can be no comparison between the preparations and the avowed object. Though the right hon. gentleman I know quite sincerely told us he desired to leave no corner of this dreadful question unexplored, in the light of his speech he has left that history utterly untouched.

Colonel Seely dissented.

THE GOVERNMENT AND GUARANTEE.

Mr. Balfour.—I do not now understand the position of the right hon. gentleman or of the Government in regard to the last two paragraphs of the White Paper about which all the difficulty seems to have occurred. The right hon. gentleman, I gather, says that he adheres to those two paragraphs, and I imagine from his explanation that his gloss of these paragraphs was assented to by Sir John French. Did the Government agree to those last two paragraphs before they were put in? I suppose not. I suppose that no colleague of the right hon. gentleman saw them.

Mr. Asquith.—No.

Mr. Balfour.—Very well, I ask no further questions as to that. Does the Government agree to those two paragraphs? I suppose they do. (Ministerial cries of “No” and Opposition laughter.) Then why have we still the pleasure of dealing with the right hon. gentleman as Secretary of State for War? These two paragraphs may or may not represent the considered opinion of the Government. They represent the considered opinion of the Secretary of State for War. They presumably do not represent the opinions of the Government, or at least if they do, they are not the opinions which the Government at this stage of the proceedings desire to avow. (Cheers.) But in truth they represent the facts. It is the Secretary of State for War who was brought up by personal contact and by his own direct opportunities of information with the real circumstances of the case, and it was he who saw that to compel the Army to take any part in its turn in compelling Ulster to accept the Home Rule Bill would be absolutely to destroy our whole system. (Cheers.)

THE LABOUR POSITION.

I gathered from the speech of the hon. gentleman the member for Leicester, the Leader of the Labour Party, which he made on Monday last in answer to me, and from some speeches made by other hon. gentlemen below the gangway, that they think for the moment, apparently that there is a difference of principle dividing this House upon these doubtful and difficult questions. I do not believe that there is any difference. There may be very great and vital differences among us as to how in certain cases principles shall be applied. (Ministerial laughter.) I do not believe myself that there is any fundamental difference of principle. I believe that everybody agrees with the Prime Minister that the Army may be called in, and ought to be called in, in cases of necessity to support the civil power in preserving order, in preventing anarchy, and in stopping mob rule. I do not believe that there is a member of the Labour Party, below the gangway who denies that.

Mr. J. Ward—Hear, hear—as long as the order is applied indiscriminately.

Mr. Balfour.—I believe we all agree with the Prime Minister that the necessity has sometimes occurred, though more rarely in this country, I think, than in any other country in the world. It has occurred in this country and in two successive Administrations in which the Prime Minister was a responsible Minister. It may occur again, and, lamentable as it is, when that necessity occurs it may be, and it is, the duty of the military in power to give such assistance as may be required to the civil power, to prevent all society sinking into anarchy. But also, are not we all agreed that there is a point at which, in connexion with great political issues, those principles break down? Can any one doubt that?

THE AMERICAN COLONIES.

I was very much interested in something that fell from the hon. member for Leicester on Monday. I think it was my right hon. friend near me who mentioned the case of the British officers and the American colonies and pointed out what we all know, that at that time many officers of all ranks, and men, I have no doubt, too, did not think that they ought to be asked to enforce the law in the American colonies. The hon. gentleman said:—“Oh, yes. Everybody admits now that the American colonies were right.” What has that got to do with it? And they were not thought right at the time. (Renewed Opposition cheers.) How does he know that when history comes to be written Ulster will not be thought to be right? (Cheers.) For my own part, if the question before the House was whether there was greater justification for the American colonies or for Ulster, I should not hesitate to say that—and I do not think it is arguable—that the provocation which you are giving to Ulster is incomparably greater—(Ministerial cries of “Oh” and Opposition cheers.)

An Hon. Member.—What provocation?

ULSTER'S PROVOCATION.

Mr. Balfour.—What provocation? I do not want to discuss the whole of the Home Rule Bill, but I will mention two things you are going to do. You are going, apparently by force, if you can, to compel this relatively homogeneous population of the North-East of Ireland—are you not going to pass the Bill? (cheers)—you are going to compel them to leave the Assembly under which they are to go under the heel of another Assembly. You are going to do the greatest of all wrongs, which is to transfer by force a population from a Government which they like to a Government which they abhor. Nobody who looks into the American case—and I am not going to discuss it in detail—can pretend for a moment that any claim made by Great Britain in 1774 practically interfered with the liberties of those colonies at all. There were no practical wrongs. The practical wrong you are going to do to these people is of the most vital description and touches every hour of their lives and interferes with all their self-government. You are not only going to transfer these people by force and put them under another Parliament, but you are going to deprive them of their proper representation in this Parliament.

AN ENORMOUS DIFFICULTY.

It is quite clear to the House that you have now, and, as I think, by your most criminal policy, forced upon people who never wished to be troubled about politics the necessity of deciding which way their higher duty goes. The difficulty of this problem must always be enormous, it has proved enormous in our own history. It troubled men's consciences for generations. There was a whole school of politicians, the extreme Tory school of those days, a Tory and High Church school at the end of the 17th century and the beginning of the 18th century, who took the full doctrine of the hon. member for Stoke, who is their true lineal descendant (laughter), and they preached what is called the doctrine of non-resistance. They said that whatever the Government of the day decides must be carried out, and the Army are necessarily bound to obey in all causes the rulers of the day, and it is always inconsistent with the subject's duty to resist the forces of the law. That was the accurate doctrine of non-resistance, violently repudiated, of course, by the Whig party of that day and never accepted by the moderate Tories.

Mr. John Ward—There was no franchise then. The difference is plain. Only a very small aristocratic section of the community had any right or voice in the government of the country.

Mr. Balfour.—I do not see that that makes any difference. The point is, may not a Government in their folly raise questions on which soldiers, as well as civilians, have to ask themselves, Does not this go outside, drive us outside those ordinary canons of conduct in ordinary moments to be guided in obedience to the civil magistrate? The question has cropped up in every country of the world at different times, and has always found a solution in different cases, and the wisdom of every wise Government is not to compel that question to be discussed. Of all the great sins against the community which I as a partisan may think by partisan feeling the Government have been guilty of, the greatest is that they have forced this question; and at this moment, putting the Army on one side, and not touching the immediate problem on which the right hon. gentleman has sent in his resignation, but talking merely of the civil population, can anybody doubt who knows anything about them, that the population of Ulster are loyal to the Crown and to the Constitution of this country, that they have been brought up under it, and that they have the same ideals of liberty as you have (Ministerial cries of “No, no” and Opposition cheers), that their doctrines are those all lovers of liberty preach (Ministerial cries of “No, no”) and upon which you have specially prided yourself?

“AN ARISTOCRATIC INTRIGUE.”

It is on men like that and not merely upon men and officers of the Army you compel attention to these tremendous and difficult problems. The Government in their folly have compelled this attention to be concentrated upon these great questions, and the Secretary of State for War has come, in my opinion, to the only conclusion which any man acquainted with the facts can come—namely, that you are attempting in this House legislation which the conscience of this country will not stand. It is really pitiable to hear gentlemen say, I daresay quite honestly, that this is an aristocratic intrigue (An hon. member.—It is true all the same), and I know not what besides. They really should open their eyes to the fact. Is it so incredible to them that any man of British birth should hate firing upon other men of British birth in Ulster, because they want to preserve the liberties which you have given them? Is that an incredible proposition? Are those who hold it to be accused of necessarily and consistently therefore saying that if a town is in the hands of a mob the soldiers are to stand idly by and look on? Such statesmanship never was tolerated in this House before, and never will be tolerated, I believe, in the future. This is not a new question. The Prime Minister is a historian and has studied these things; he has studied the opinion of statesmen like Burke and of great jurists of the past. Who has ever before confounded these two things, who has ever said that the rules applicable to one are applicable to the other? There is no comparison between them and you have only got to look into your own hearts to know that there is no comparison between them.

COLONEL SEELY'S POSITION.

I do not know what the fate of these pendent paragraphs may be. Apparently they were never seen by the Cabinet, and they are the pure creation of the genius of the right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He has resigned on them, but he has resumed office in spite of them, and let me say at once I think he was right to resign, and I think the Government were right to have him back, because he has told the truth to the country in words which are unmistakable. Behind him and behind the Army Council the whole Army will take them as their charter. After those words have once been written, printed, and published, after the Minister who wrote them declares he still holds by them, the idea that after that you are really going to attempt at the point of the bayonet to force your disruptive legislation on the population of Ulster is utterly and hopelessly incredible. My right hon. friend begged me to move the rejection of the Bill, and I desire to do so in the ordinary form. (Loud cheers.)

The Prime Minister's Statement.

ATTITUDE OF THE KING.

Mr. Asquith, who was received with prolonged cheers, said:—There is one preliminary observation which I should like to make before I deal with the substance of the speech of the right hon. gentleman, and that is to associate myself with what was said by my right hon. friend who sits beside me (Colonel Seely) in regard to what I think are the most unfair and inconsiderate attempts to bring the name of the King into these discussions. (Loud Opposition cheers and counter Ministerial cheers.) They are not made upon one side only. They proceed, I regret to say, in different senses from different quarters. I am entitled, as chief responsible Minister of the Crown, to say, and I say it with the fullest conviction and assurance, that from first to last in regard to all these matters his Majesty has observed every rule that comports with the dignity of the position of a constitutional Sovereign. (General cheers.) However strenuous, however exciting our debates may be, I hope we shall continue in all quarters to recognize that the Crown in a constitutional country is beyond and above the range of party controversy. (Renewed cheers.)

THE COERCION OF ULSTER.

The right hon. gentleman drew a parallel in the course of his speech, and emphasized it by much argument, some illustration, and a good deal of rhetoric (laughter), between the position of the American Colonies and what he called the coercion of Ulster. I think it is quite time that we got to close quarters with this so-called coercion of Ulster (cheers), because it affects not merely the military but the political aspects of the situation. The right hon. gentleman spoke with horror of men of British birth firing on other men of British birth who were simply rising in defence of their ancient and traditional rights and privileges. (Opposition cheers.) What is the actual situation? We have offered to every country in Ulster which chooses to go to the ballot-box the opportunity of excluding itself from the operation of our Bill—(Opposition members.—“Six years.”)—during such time as will admit of two opportunities for the country to pronounce upon it. (Cheers.) What is the alternative offer made by the Leader of the Opposition? That you should have a referendum here and now, one single consultation of the electors of the United Kingdom, and if that goes adversely to his party and in favour of our Bill he will admit on the part of the party opposite that we are morally justified in coercing Ulster. (Cheers.) Let us deal not with phrases, but with facts. The coercion of Ulster—if he meant by that the interposition of the operation of military and naval force—is a thing which will never happen and can never happen if Ulster takes advantage of the opportunity that we have offered. (Cheers.)

Lord Hugh Cecil.—Not six years hence?

Mr. Asquith.—Why should the verdict of the electors of the United Kingdom be of less weight six years hence than it is now? After all, we are not dealing with things that are going to happen six years hence; we are dealing with things as they are.

THE MILITARY MOVEMENTS.

I was very much struck, in listening to the right hon. gentleman, with the extraordinary disparity in scale and in temperature of the presentation which he has made of the supposed shortcomings and evil designs of the Government with that which is offered to us every day by the organs of his party outside. (Cheers.) What is the case he presents? That there was a plot (Opposition Cheers), an intrigue (Opposition Cheers), a conspiracy (Opposition Cheers), engineered behind my back and behind the backs of most of my right hon. friends sitting beside me, by two or three dark and sinister spirits (laughter), who managed to secure the guilty connivance of the Secretary of State for War, a plot to undertake aggressive and provocative operations in Ulster. Is that really believed? (Opposition members.—“Yes,” and “It is true.”) Let us see what the evidence is. Here we have in these papers an official letter from the War Office, dated March 14—that is before the Bradford speech was made—I think it was the same day—in which there is set out with perfect explicitness and in detail the operations which in the opinion of the Army Council were necessary in order to protect from possible disorder and rioting certain military positions in Ulster. Is the plot supposed to have been there engineered? Is it really believed that that letter, written on behalf of the Army Council, was the first step in these provocative operations? I want to know. (Cheers.) Is there anything there which goes in the least degree beyond what I have told the House repeatedly was the sole and undivided object of his Majesty's Government in making these comparatively small movements of troops in Ulster to occupy places which I pointed out before were of no strategic value and which no general in his senses would have occupied if he had thought of aggressive operations? (Cheers.) These movements were intended, as this letter shows, solely and entirely for the purpose of protection not, as I believe, against organized or concerted operations on the part of the Ulster Volunteers, but against possible risks to which, with an excited population, places and property of this kind are always exposed.

Mr. Bonar Law.—Cavalry and horse artillery, (Cheers.)

Mr. Asquith.—There were no cavalry or horse artillery engaged in the operation at all. (Cheers.)

Lord Charles Beresford.—Battleships (Cheers.)

Mr. Asquith. Nor were any battleships engaged in the operation at all. (Cheers.) The utmost assistance which the Navy afforded in this very moderate and modest military operation was to send two small cruisers to assist in the movement of troops from one point to another. That operation was ordered, as I have said, as far back as March 14. It is quite true that in the following week General Paget was summoned to this country and held a consultation with his military superiors at the War Office.

CONSULTATION WITH GENERAL PAGET.

It is a most extraordinary illustration of the kind of constitutional topsy-turvydom of the times in which we live that the right hon. gentleman the member for the University of Dublin (Sir E. Carson) and his friends have been allowed to organize, equip, and parade a force, which we are told amounts to something like 100,000 men, no one saying nay, no one as far as we are concerned taking any offensive notice; but if we send for our General and take him into consultation here, at once it is said that this is an intrigue and an outrage. (Cheers.) Could absurdity be carried further? (Cheers.) We were perfectly entitled to summon General Paget. We were perfectly entitled to consult with him and with the Naval authorities also having regard to all these possible sources of danger and combustion as to what steps might be necessary to be taken to preserve the public peace in the North of Ireland. I do not apologize for doing it. (Cheers.) I say it was a natural and perfectly proper step, and if the same circumstances occurred I should certainly do it again. (Cheers.) Then General Paget went back. He had been instructed to do nothing, absolutely nothing, beyond carrying out these modest and necessary operations described in the letter of March 14. He took his brigadiers and divisional generals into consultation apparently upon the question whether these movements might be attended with excitement and possible resistance, and in that case what steps it would be necessary to take. Was that provocative? Was that anything but a precaution which every reasonable general in similar conditions ought to and would take? The right hon. gentleman mentioned just now the Cavalry and Horse Artillery. Certainly there was no necessity to us either the one or the other for the purpose of these limited operations, but if they had been met, as it is possible they might have been, with resistance or opposition, and if anything like a state of public disorder had arisen in any part of the province of Ulster, or in the South or West, it applies to every part of Ireland, it might of course have been necessary to move the Cavalry regiments.

NOR AGGRESSIVE OR PROVOCATIVE ACTION.

General Paget did what every prudent general would have done under these circumstances. (Cheers.) To treat that as an act of provocation or an invitation to these gentlemen in Ulster to rebel, as luring them out of their attitude of, shall I say, belligerent quiescence into one of active warfare, seems to me one of the most grotesque propositions I have ever heard. (Cheers.) So far the matter seems to me hardly to admit of argument at all. How can any rational man whose mind is governed by the ordinary rules of evidence in the face of these facts assume or even pretend to assume that there was anything in the nature of provocative or aggressive action? (Cheers.) Now I come to what took place after General Paget had addressed his generals. There is undoubtedly, it would be unfair to deny it, a discrepancy of evidence as to what on that occasion was actually said, and I think it is extremely probable, in fact I am sure it is true, that there was on the part of some of those at any rate whom General Paget addressed an honest misunderstanding of what he said. It is quite clear from the perfectly fair and reasonable letter which was written by General Gough on March 20 that there was a notion among them that what was described, or what they thought they had heard described, as active operations might mean, in the language of the fourth paragraph of their letter, the initiation of active military operations against Ulster. They were uneasy upon that point. The word "initiation," the House will observe, is underlined. That is a point which really is very important—"the initiation of active military operation"; they felt uneasiness upon that point. They did not get what they regarded as adequate reassurance; and thereupon they took a step which I think very much to be regretted—namely, the sending in of their resignations. They were summoned to London. I want to bring home for a moment to the House what took place after these officers came to London. It is here really that the serious question of to-day's debate arises. They came to London; they were interviewed by—at least, they presented their case to the Adjutant-General at the War Office, as did General Gough to my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for War. I think I am not going too far when I say that they realized, and everybody realized, that there had been a misconception of what the General had said to them, and what the General required them to do.

THE CABINET AND THE DRAFT LETTER.

On Monday last, two days ago, after these interviews had taken place, the matter was considered by the Cabinet, and in the course of our deliberations we received from the War Office—from the Adjutant-General, because my right hon. friend has told us he was for the moment away, as he had to attend his Majesty—we received from the War Office a draft of the letter which it was proposed on behalf of the Army Council to hand to General Gough on his return to Ireland to resume his duties. That draft was carefully considered by the Cabinet, and as it left their hands it is contained in substance, and I think textually, in the first three paragraphs of the last of the documents in this paper. Let me point out—I want to make this perfectly clear, because it lies at the very root of the matter—that when that letter was submitted to the Cabinet and settled by them, they had no knowledge whatsoever that General Gough had sent to the Adjutant-General, on the same morning, the letter which immediately precedes it in this White Paper. That is all important, as the House will see, and for a reason which I will make perfectly plain before I sit down. We had not seen the letter, nor had my right hon. friend received it, for it only reached him, I think it was, after the termination of the proceedings of the Cabinet, and we had no notion of any sort or kind that any such letter had been addressed by General Gough to the Adjutant-General. (Cheers.) In dealing with the matter as it then presented itself to us, we authorized the Army Council to supply General Gough with a written statement such as is contained in the first three paragraphs of this communication, which, as the House will observe, carefully abstains from giving any kind of assurance of any sort (cheers), and states in the plainest and most explicit terms, and I think in language to which no exception can be taken by anybody who realizes what is the constitutional position of the Army in relation to the civil power, what the duties of these officers would be. So far as we were concerned, we thought that was an end of the matter.

COLONEL SUELY'S ADDITIONS.

My right hon. friend has stated most candidly, and most manfully that he had the letter of General Gough handed to him, but I think he said that he did not pay much attention to it. That was not what influenced his mind; but, having regard to the statement he himself had made to the officers in the course of the morning, he added to the document, as settled by the Cabinet, the two concluding paragraphs. I am not going to criticize with any minuteness or any severity the language of those paragraphs. The first one is quite innocuous; the second might be read in a number of different senses. I am not going to criticize; what I am going to say is this. First of all, however, I should complete the narrative by saying that when I spoke to the House as I did on Monday—and I am sure the House will believe, after some experience, that I do not, at any rate in matters of fact, mislead them—when I spoke to the House on Monday, and said, either expressly or perhaps by implication—I forget which—in answer to an interruption, that those officers had returned to Ireland without any condition. I was speaking what I believed to be the truth. (Hear, hear.) What was the truth so far as the document was concerned, as settled by the Cabinet? I want to make my position—and that of my colleagues perfectly clear on this point. Later on in the day, after the debate, or at least that part of the debate, was over, and when I had gone back to my room, I received a type-written copy of this document as it now appears. I read it, and of course I was at once struck by the addition of these two paragraphs. I sent for my right hon. friend the Secretary of State, and said to him, "How is it this which was never approved by the Cabinet has been inserted in the letter?" Then he told me in very much the same terms in which he has to-day told the House how it had happened. I began to argue the matter, when he said, "It is too late; the letter has been handed to General Gough, and he has taken it away with him to Ireland." I must add this to my own personal narrative, and even then I was not aware, nor were any of my colleagues in the Cabinet aware, of this letter of General Gough written on the Monday, which appears in the White Paper, in which General Gough expressly asks the question—a very different question, let the House observe, from that which he had raised in his letter of March 20. (Cheers.) Let me point out in what the difference consists. It is very vital. On March 20 General Gough and the officers on whose behalf he spoke were under the impression, which had been created in their minds by the address of the Commander-in-Chief, that they were about to be called upon to take part in some form of military duty. The expression, the House will see, is "Duty as ordered." The words are put in inverted commas. "Active operations in Ulster." They were therefore under the impression that they were or might be, immediately or within a very short time, called upon to undertake duty of that kind. Thereupon they said: "If such duty consist in the maintenance of order and the preservation of property, all the officers will be quite prepared to undertake it; but if the duty involves the 'initiation'—the word which is underlined as showing the emphasis and importance which they attached to it—"if it involves the initiation of active military operations against Ulster, then the officers named would respectfully prefer to be dismissed." That is a very different demand from the demand preferred in General Gough's letter of March 23. Let the House observe how the position has shifted in the meantime.

THE REQUEST FOR AN ASSURANCE.

It is no longer a question of "What is the character of the duty or the operation in which we are to be immediately ordered to take part?" It is purely a prospective question, which deals with a future and, to some extent everybody must admit, a more or less remote contingency. The question is this:—"In the event of the present Home Rule Bill becoming law, can we be called upon to enforce it in Ulster under the expression of maintaining law and order?"

Mr. W. Guinness (Bury St. Edmunds, Opp.).—May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether the two paragraphs put in were substantially the same as the matter struck out of the original draft?

Mr. Asquith.—No, Sir; they were quite different. It is not really a very material point, but the hon. member may assume that what was struck out by the Cabinet went, in some respects, further than what was actually put in.

Mr. W. Guinness.—Did they deal with the same subject?

Mr. Asquith.—It dealt with the same subject matter, but that is not really material to my argument. What I am pointing out to the House is that in this letter of General Gough, brought for the first time to my knowledge and to the knowledge of my colleagues as lately as yesterday afternoon, we found a request, or, indeed, a demand—(hear, hear)—made by an officer in a responsible position in the Army for an assurance to be given to him as to what will or will not be required of him by the Government in a hypothetical contingency. I do not think it is right to ask of officers what they will do—(Opposition cheers)—in an event which has not arisen and which may never arise; and I do not believe that General Sir Arthur Paget did that. He may have been so misunderstood; but I do not gather from General Gough's letter of March 20 that it was that sort of question he was contemplating. It looks to me as if he were contemplating immediate operations; but I am strongly of opinion, and I hope I shall have the general assent of the House when I say this, that it is not right to ask an officer in advance what he may or may not do in a contingency which has not arisen and in circumstances and surroundings which are left entirely to the imagination. If that is true, still less can it be right for an officer to ask a Government to give him any assurance. (Prolonged cheers.)

Mr. Amery rose, but amid angry cries of "Order," "Order" immediately resumed his seat.

Mr. Asquith.—Circumstances may arise to all of us, officers of the State, in whatever position we hold, as to what our duty is. We must decide according to our consciences.

Mr. Amery.—Will you deny that there was——(Renewed cries of "Order.")

Mr. Asquith.—And so far as my colleagues and I are concerned, so long as we are responsible for the government of this country, we will never assent to a claim——

Mr. Amery.—You have assented to it. (Cries of "Order" and interruptions.)

The Speaker.—I must ask the hon. member for South Birmingham not to keep interrupting. He made a speech yesterday and he had a good opportunity, and the least he can do now is to listen to the reply.

Mr. Asquith.—So long as we are responsible for the Government of this country, whatever the consequences may be, we shall not assent to the claim of any body of men in the service of the Crown, be they officers or men—it makes no difference for this purpose—to demand from the Government in advance assurances of what they will or will not be required to do in circumstances which have not arisen. Such a claim, once admitted, would put the Government and the House of Commons, upon whose confidence the Government depend, at the mercy of the military and Navy. (Prolonged cheers, Ministerial members waving handkerchiefs and other papers.) If that issue is once raised I myself have very little doubt as to what the verdict of this country will be. (Loud cheers.)

WAR SECRETARY'S RESIGNATION REFUSED.

I want to say one word, and one only, in conclusion, as to the position of my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for War. He made a statement to-day which I am sure must have enlisted the sympathy of members in all quarters of the House, whatever their political feelings. He told the House and told it with perfect sincerity and truth, that recognizing as he did that he had committed an error of judgment in the conditions under which he supplemented the agreed decision of the Cabinet, he felt it his duty to tender his resignation. My right hon. friend did that, as I and everybody who knows him fully understand, with perfect sincerity. I am not going to accept his resignation (some cheers), not because I do not think the step which he took did not involve an error of judgment—I agree with him that it did—but because errors of that kind in times of great stress and anxiety, when a man is oppressed, as my right hon. friend has been oppressed, with responsibility more arduous and anxious than really occurred to any of us—when we value, as we all do, his strenuous and effective co-operation in all great causes in our common work, I think it would not only be ungenerous, but unjust, to take any such action. My hon. friend retains the confidence and the affection of his colleagues and his political friends. He acquiesces loyally and fully in the judgment which, on behalf of the Government, I have announced to the House. If there be any criticism to be passed on what has taken place in regard to this transaction, I beg the House to bring back its attention to the point from which we originally started, that in all these matters the real question is whether or not the considered will, judgment and authority of the representatives of the people shall prevail. (Cheers.)

Mr. Bonar Law's Criticisms.

Mr. Bonar Law.—This Government has set in its time many precedents, but I do not think in the whole history of this House there has ever been a resignation of a Minister which has not been received not only with sympathy, but with seriousness in all parts of the House. That is not the case to-day. We have heard of people being thrown to the wolves; but never before have we heard of them being thrown to the wolves with a bargain on the part of the wolves that they would not eat him. (Laughter.) The Prime Minister has shown, as he always does, what an accomplished Parliamentarian he is (cheers) and how accurately he gauges the strength and sincerity of the hostility which from time to time is directed against his Government. I ask the House to contrast the statement made by the Secretary for War on Monday with the information contained in the White Paper which we have to-day.

Mr. Bonar Law then read what Colonel Seely said on Monday, and proceeded:—

Not a word about dismissal, and the Prime Minister—and here I must at once assume that he knew nothing about the facts—was asked the question, "Will the officers be reinstated because they have never been dismissed."

Mr. Asquith.—They were not dismissed.

Mr. Bonar Law.—The War Office sent a telegram to General Sir Arthur Paget that they should be relieved of their commands, which I understand means dismissal. ("No, no.") Take another example of the way in which the country is treated. In his statement issued on Sunday the Prime Minister said there is a widespread impression that there is to be an inquisition of what the officers' views are in certain eventualities, and he says there was to be nothing of the kind. How does he explain the resignations of the officers of the Cavalry Brigade in the Curragh on any other understanding than that this question was put to them and that it was their answer which caused all the trouble? Again he makes a statement which the facts prove to be absolutely inaccurate. That is not all. In the same communication the right hon. gentleman says this:—"As for the so-called naval movements they simply consisted in the use of two small cruisers," and he said that when the First Lord of the Admiralty tells us this afternoon that a battle squadron had been ordered to Belfast.

Mr. Asquith.—The First Lord never said anything of the kind. The only two ships that were moved were the two cruisers. The movement of the battle squadron to Lamlash could not take place for a very long time.

Mr. Bonar Law.—The First Lord of the Admiralty said, and boasted of it, that these ships had been ordered to Lamlash in order to be ready for Belfast if the emergency arose. The right hon. gentleman told us there was no movement of ships except these two vessels.

Mr. Asquith.—I said there were no movements of ships in connexion with these movements of troops into Ulster, and my communication was entirely confined to that.

Mr. Bonar Law.—The right hon. gentleman is quite wrong. Now we have got what was in his mind. He did not include orders in his communication to the country. It was only actual movements. We have a wonderful Government (Ministerial cheers and laughter), and we may be sure of this, that when the facts come out in connexion with to-day's statement, we shall probably find that the memories of right hon. gentlemen have deceived them precisely as they did on Monday. (Cheers.) The case of the right hon. gentleman again to-day is, that there were only movements of troops necessary to protect the stores, and all the rest of it.

The real truth is, and no other explanation fits the facts, that the Government decided on a great demonstration, military, certainly, and naval, as we find out to-day, in order to make an impression upon the people of Ulster. (Cheers.)

GENERAL PAGET'S ORDERS.

This whole dispute as to what was really intended turns upon General Paget. I read out in this House a note taken down by an officer who heard him (hon. members:—"Oh, oh," and "Name"), and it is corroborated. If they deny it, I am quite ready to give the right hon. gentleman the source of my information. It was taken down by this one officer and corroborated by three others who heard it. I asked the right hon. gentleman to give us what Sir A. Paget himself said, and he has absolutely declined to do so. We must therefore assume that the statement which I read is correct until they give us an alternative version to set against it. How does Sir Arthur Paget's statement agree with their story? First of all, both the Prime Minister and the Secretary for War tell us it was all a misunderstanding and that the officers did not understand General Paget. That is not possible. This was the misunderstanding as they tell us, that the officers thought that General Paget wanted them to do something more than the ordinary duties of preserving law and order; but they had to come to London to find that out, and then it was all put right. Here is the fact. These officers in the letter which the Prime Minister says is a highly proper one, referring to Sir Arthur Paget's speech, used these words:—"If such duty consists of the maintenance of order and the preservation of property, all the officers in the brigade, including myself, would be prepared to carry out this duty." It goes on:—"If the duty involves the initiation of active operations," and so on. What follows? One of two things. Either that the whole statement of the intention of the War Office is inaccurate, or that General Paget did not know what the intentions of the War Office were. (Cheers.) There is no getting away from that. If General Paget knew the moment he got that letter he would have said:—"It is all right. I am asking nothing more," and he would have wired to the War Office that the whole incident was at an end. That proves that, whether he was right or wrong, General Paget believed that he had received orders which meant an outburst in Ulster the moment he carried these orders into effect. (Cheers.) What about the Cavalry and the Horse Artillery? The Prime Minister says it is only for subsequent operations. But even that will not do, for what did General Paget telegraph to the War Office? This Cavalry Brigade was to be sent to Ulster to deal, not with the Volunteers, but with small bodies whom Sir Edward Carson was trying to prevent engaging in the kind of operations suggested. That has been said, but even that explanation will not do, because Sir A. Paget, in telling of the resignation of these officers, actually uses these words:—"Prefer to accept dismissal if ordered north." How does that coincide with the statement they had given that they were only thinking about it as a possible necessity in the far distant future, when Sir A. Paget himself wires that officers have in substance resigned rather than be ordered north to fulfill a duty which he tells us they did not wish to fulfill? I do not believe that the Prime Minister knew all that was going on.

AN OFFICER'S LETTER.

Now I am going to read an extract from the letter of a "young officer (Ministerial cries of "Oh," "Name," and "Anonymous again") connected with the Infantry Brigade. This officer wrote it as an account of what Sir Charles Fergusson said to him. It is very important, and I ask the Prime Minister to send to Sir Charles Fergusson and find out whether or not he did use language like this in addressing his officers. "The idea of provoking Ulster is hellish." (Ministerial protests.) It is quite in order to use the word when applying it to an idea, not to an individual. This is what Sir Charles Fergusson is reported to have said on advice which presumably he got from the War Office:—"Steps have been taken in Ulster so that any aggression must come from the Ulsterites, and they will have to shed first blood" (Ministerial cheer.) Have hon. members ever heard of agents provocateurs? Was there ever anything in the world more wicked, if it is true, than to provoke these people in Ulster so as to be able to deal with them? The words do not admit of any doubt of it. (Opposition cries of "Read.") I say that I have given my authority for them and the Prime Minister can verify them, but so far as the words go they admit of no doubt. (Cries of "Read the whole.")

Sir T. Whittaker (Yorks, W., R., Spen Valley, Min.).—They mean the opposite of what you say.

Mr. Bonar Law.—Then I will read them, and the right hon. gentleman will see how they mean the opposite of what I say. "Steps have been taken in Ulster so that any aggression must come from Ulsterites." The right hon. gentleman means that the Ulster people themselves have taken these steps.

Sir T. Whittaker.—What I mean is that that obviously means that nothing would be done by us until Ulster—(Interruption.)

Mr. Bonar Law.—The right hon. gentleman is quite right. It obviously means that nothing will be done by us until we have provoked Ulster. (Ministerial cries of "No.")

TREATMENT OF GENERAL GOUCH.

This whole subject has raised many wide questions, but there is one point which formed the end of the right hon. gentleman's speech to which I must allude, and that was his treatment of General Gough. I had always found the right hon. gentleman live up to the traditions of the position which he occupies in regard to the treatment of the servants of the Crown. I do not think that he has been fair to General Gough in this incident. (Ministerial cries of "oh.") I will explain why General Gough did not raise this question at all. (Cheers.) The right hon. gentleman himself admits that they had not a right to do what the War Office did, and I do not think there is a man in this House who believes that that was started by General Paget without instructions from the War Office. I at least do not believe it. The right hon. gentleman himself has admitted that that was a question which they had no right to put to General Gough—a question as to what he would do in certain eventualities. They did put the question. (Cheers.) He himself has said in these documents that if he had been ordered to Ulster he would have gone without any hesitation. They put the question to him about the future—General Paget nominally, but the War Office really. He gives an answer, the only answer which on his conscience he could give, and, having given it not on his own initiative at all, not by his own desire but the issue having been raised in plain terms. "Will you or will you not fight against Ulster?"—not to keep order, but to fight against Ulster (Cheers)—I put it to any hon. member in this House who thinks as General Gough does that they have no right to engage in civil war against Ulster, what else could he do, if he goes back to the Army after it has been raised, but make it perfectly plain that his position on this question is not in doubt and that the War Office must know that it is not in doubt. No other course was open to him. (Cheers.)

SERIOUS RESPONSIBILITY.

I would like to leave this specific question and say a little about the broad issues raised. I have never for a moment under-estimated the seriousness of all that was being done in Ulster and by us in assisting her. I have never under-estimated it and perhaps some members of the House may remember that quite lately I pointed out the seriousness of it and felt sure that the bench opposite would agree with me. It was only a question of responsibility and upon whom that responsibility rests.

My right hon. friend said to-day that there was not a difference of principle among us on this matter. There is a difference which comes almost to that, but it is not a difference of principle. The right hon. gentleman never for a moment will argue that resistance is justified. It is always that the constituted authority must be obeyed. I put to him this question. Is there such a thing as civil war at all? His speeches would lead us to suppose that there was no such thing, and that it could not be contemplated. If he admits that there is such a thing as civil war then ask him, and perhaps the next time he speaks on this subject he will do it, to give a definition of what civil war means, which would not include what is happening in Ulster to-day. (Hear, hear.) He will find it utterly impossible to give such a definition. Let us get rid therefore, of the preliminary ground. Every one must admit that there are circumstances when all the ordinary laws of society are broken down, and nobody can contemplate such a position without a degree of horror, which I think is not realized by a great many members in this House and out of it. There the question is not whether obedience to constituted authority is a duty under all circumstances. Nobody maintains that. Let us therefore look at the question whether or not it is justifiable under existing circumstances.

ULSTER AND THE ELECTORATE.

I wish to put my position in regard to Ulster clearly because I feel that I have a certain amount of responsibility in regard to it. Before I occupied my present position, and when I could speak without thinking as carefully as I do now (laughter)—I do not pretend to speak very well, but I do my best (loud Opposition cheers)—I said this in this House:—

"I do not think I am disloyal, and I do not want to be shot, but I say this with absolute deliberation"—this was after my argument that Ulster was justified in resisting under present conditions—"If the people of this country decide that they will make the experiment of Home Rule, then—and here I must part company with some of my hon. friends in this House and I must certainly part company with some of those who supported me in the constituency I represent—I should say that I believe in representative government, and however much you may dislike it you cannot compel the United Kingdom to keep up the present arrangement against their will." From that view I have never wavered, and over and over again in this House and out of it I have said so and by a definite offer only a week ago or less I said to the Prime Minister, "make certain"—and surely in face of this trouble it is worthwhile making certain—"that you have the will of the country behind you, and, so far as the Unionist Party are concerned, we will absolutely cease all unconstitutional opposition to the carrying of your measure," (Ministerial cries of "Oh! oh!"). Well, what more do you ask?

THE DEMOCRACY OF ULSTER.

Yesterday I was only able to listen to part of the speeches of the hon. gentleman below the gangway, but I found them very interesting, for I liked the idea of a new French Revolution led by an hon. gentleman whom we know so well and who sits on the Labour benches. I heard some of these speeches and what was the substance of them all? It was that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor. Now examine it. Who are the people who would be shot down by our soldiers if this civil war broke out? There is no more democratic community in the world, and that these Volunteers are a more democratic army than has ever existed in the world, not excepting Cromwell's own New Model in the time of the Civil War, and that when you say, "You are afraid to shoot down the rich," I say that there is no case in which soldiers could be employed where it would be more certain to be shooting down the working classes than it would be if you sent such an expedition into Belfast. And they say, I think I heard the hon. member for Stoke say, or somebody, "Tom Mann, look what he got." Sir Edward Carson, my right hon. friend the member for Trinity College, "Look how he gets off."

But is it the fault of my right hon. friend the member for Trinity College? Over and over again he has, and rightly, challenged the Government to take action against him, and he has done it rightly for this reason. I would never say for a moment that this Government, if they believed in their consciences that this country was behind them, have not the right to enforce this with horse, foot, and artillery. I do not deny it, if they think they have the right, but I say that anything more criminal than to allow this organization to go on for two years and then threaten it I cannot imagine.

THE ARMY AND THE ARISTOCRACY.

I have only one other aspect of this to look at, and that is the question as it affects the Army. All through in thinking about this the effect on the Army is what has alarmed me most, and I think I am right in saying that in the many scores of speeches which I have made on Home Rule in the last three years I have only referred in any way to the Army twice. Nothing could be really further from the truth than the idea that the Army officers represent the aristocracy.

Mr. John Ward.—Of course they do.

Mr. Bonar Law.—There are some regiments where it is true, but it is not true of the Army as a whole. I think this whole trouble has arisen from two causes. All politicians—men who make politics their life and their profession—gradually get into a habit of looking upon it as a game more or less, and they do not probably have as strong convictions as they did when they entered on a political career as a rule. I think that general human weakness applies with unusual force to members of the present Government, and I really believe that all this trouble has arisen because through that human weakness to which I have referred they did not believe it possible that the men of Ulster had convictions as strong as they have shown themselves to possess. They never did believe it, and now it has come upon them they do not know what to do. It is the same thing as regards the Army.

The whole feeling is that the Government, without the consent of the country (Opposition cheers, and Ministerial cries of "No")—that is my feeling, and if I am wrong they can set it right to-morrow—are trying to do something which the Army will not be their tool in doing. (Opposition cheers.) A great deal of analogy has been made about strikes. The member for Derby said it was too thin—the distinction between civil war and putting down strikes. I cannot see the connection, and I will tell the House why. Soldiers are never used to put down strikers because they are striking. They never would be used for that purpose by any Government.

Soldiers I have met have been men interested in their career, and so far as my experience goes they care nothing about politics; they, from the nature of their duties, know that they have to serve both parties, and until they give up the Army or go on half-pay it is unwise to come into active politics. Put yourselves in the position of an officer. He believes in his heart and conscience, as I do, that the Government are doing this thing without the consent of the country, that in pressing this forward without the clear approval of the country they are really as much a revolutionary committee as President Huerta, who is governing Mexico to-day. (Ministerial laughter.) If I were in his place, holding the views I do, and if I were asked to take part in an expedition against Ulster I would resign my commission if I were permitted to do so. If that permission were refused, and I was told that I should be Court-martialled, then I do not know whether I should have the courage to do it, but I feel that in that case it would be my duty to say, "Very well, if you choose to do it, I prefer to be shot rather than shoot innocent men." (Cheers.) That is the position in which the soldier stands.

Ministerial Members.—The private soldier?

Mr. Bonar Law.—I said "soldier." That includes both.

Mr. J. H. Thomas (Derby, Lab.)—During a strike? (Labour cheers.)

Mr. Bonar Law. I have tried to point out the difference (Labour laughter, and a voice "Conscience" and at all events I was not interrupted when I was making the statement. I say that is the position in which you are placed. In my belief the Government know as well as I do that the position in which this matter is left is fatal either to the Army or the country. (Cheers.) They have not told us all about their manœuvres as Ministers; they have not told us what is the position of General Gough and his brother officers to-day. (Cheers.) I would say this to the Government. This whole difficulty is really due to the political situation to which we have come throughout the clash of parties in this country. I say, therefore, that a duty rests on any responsible Government, much more than on the Opposition though we feel the responsibility also—and I say that a duty such as has never rested on any Government before now rests on this Government and the Prime Minister to find some way of saving the nation from an impossible position. (Cheers.)

LABOUR PARTY VIEW.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who was greeted with Labour cheers, said:—If what the right hon. gentleman has said about Ulster means anything at all to the soldier, it was an encouragement to the soldier to mutiny. (Labour and Ministerial cheers.) What is the use of the right hon. gentleman telling us that he was surprised when certain things happened in the Army? If he was surprised he was the only member in the House who was surprised. He has told us that a soldier can have a conscience when he is asked to put down riotousness in Ulster, but he was very careful to say that a soldier's conscience ought to permit him to put down riotousness which it is associated with strikes. (Labour and Ministerial cheers.)

Mr. Bonar Law.—I said that conscience would make it my duty to put down the same sort of thing in Ulster as I would put down in connection with a strike. (Cheers.)

Mr. Macdonald.—If the right hon. gentleman says that, I accept it; but he did say there was a distinction between strikes and civil war in Ulster. An extract from Hansard of what the right hon. gentleman said, if circulated, without a word of comment, as an electioneering leaflet, would certainly be responsible for hundreds of working-class votes being taken from the Unionist Party. As regards the extract the right hon. gentleman read from an anonymous letter, I maintain that, as the writer remained anonymous, the name of the general ought also to have anonymous (cheers), and a good soldier ought not to have his name in the newspapers as being charged by an anonymous writer. (Labour and Ministerial cheers.) The writer said, in effect "Steps have been taken by the Government to provide that if blood is to be shed at all, Ulster shall do it first." Surely that meant that the Government had taken precautions that the Army should not be used to initiate any offensive operations against Ulster. (Labour and Ministerial cheers.) The sentence is capable of a double meaning, and what does the House think of a responsible member who, knowing that, insists that it is only capable of one meaning. (Labour and Ministerial cheers.)

OFFICERS IMPOSING CONDITIONS.

There are two issues before the House. One is that the Government, or some members of the Government, or Sir Arthur Paget have been making some mistakes; but the main issue is whether generals, as in the case of General Gough, are going to be allowed to assume that they are going to impose conditions upon the Government before they do their duty as soldiers. (Loud Labour and Ministerial cheers.) I say nothing whatever against their resignations; they ought to resign if they like, but that is another question altogether. I say nothing against their asking their superior officers what is meant in certain circumstances, but they are not entitled to go to the Government, to their Department, or to their superior officers and to say, "If the Home Rule Bill is carried we want you to say that you are not going to ask us to enforce the Home Rule Bill." We are told that this was merely a mis-understanding, and that they were willing to do their duty, I say they are not and that the whole intention of this move is to make that impossible. (Hear, hear.) What was the use of the right hon. gentleman the member for the city of London talking about soldiers refusing to shoot men who simply objected to being turned out of the constitutional ambit of this country? What does he imagine is going to happen? There is not a single man of commonsense but knows that the only way in which a collision could happen is that the Ulstermen themselves will take the initiative and begin to break the law. Hon. members opposite ask, "When did any Government ask soldiers to shoot strikers as strikers?" Are those hon. members telling their friends in the Army with whom they were in communication (cheers) that it was the intention of any section of this House to shoot Ulstermen simply because they were Ulstermen?

Mr. Page Croft (Christchurch, Opp.)—May I ask whether members of the Coalition also have been receiving letters from officers?

Mr. Ramsay Mac Donald—I regret to say that I have not, or I would be able to give more accurate information than hon. gentlemen opposite do. I do not belong to the political party which receives the allegiance of these devoted officers. (Cheers.) I believe we have neglected the Army too much. If we had been more careful to increase the pay of officers so that men of more democratic minds could have entered the Service, we would not have been in the unfortunate position in which we are to-day. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lawson (Mile-end, Opp.)—May I suggest to the hon. member, with great respect, that the great majority of the officers are much poorer than the Labour members. (Cheers.)

Mr. Ramsay Mac Donald.—I am not going to enter into that. I know what a heavy struggle some deserving men have to go through; but that does not affect the remarks which I have made as to the general mental attitude of these men. The fact remains that they look down upon us.

OFFICERS AND POLITICS.

The point to remember is that these officers, who have given trouble in Ireland, have done so not on any ground of conscience. They have given trouble because they do not agree with the political opinions of the majority in this House. (Cheers.) In one of those naïve confessions which the Leader of the Opposition is constantly making he said that Army officers know no politics. (Ministerial laughter.) I was very much surprised, but I said nothing, because I was sure that before he went very far he would reply to his own statement. Within two minutes of having laid down that innocent dictum he said that the reason why those officers were opposing the Government was that they knew that Ministers had no mandate from the country. (Laughter.)

Mr. Bonar Law.—What I said was that they are not party politicians, but that did not imply that they took no interest in what was going on in the country.

Mr. Ramsay Mac Donald.—I do not mind the right hon. gentleman contradicting himself; but he has not got out of the difficulty. The statement is one made by party politicians for party purposes. These gentlemen are acting, not as soldiers, and not as conscientious objectors, with whom the party opposite certainly had no sympathy in days gone by. They are acting as party politicians—as a sort of standing military committee of the National Union of Conservative Associations. (Prolonged cheers.)

SOME REFLECTIONS ON GENERAL GOUGH.

General Gough acts, I think, as a Unionist. He is a very brave and good soldier, but, like all of us, he has got his human weaknesses, and I believe he holds very strong opinions regarding Home Rule, and he acted—I think the proof is in the papers—as a politician and not as a soldier in this case. If General Gough came over as a soldier to receive assurances from the Government, how was it that those assurances hardly reached General Gough's hands when they appeared in the Conservative Press of the country? I cannot help thinking that General Gough came over for scalps, and, having got them, he exhibited them in public in places where he knew the fact would be advertised for the purposes of the party to which he owes his political allegiance. I have heard it said, on what I think is fairly good authority, that he immediately resorted to a well-known Conservative club and exhibited the paper to anybody who cared to see it. I wish to know if that is so. Whether that is true or not, it is a curious thing that this document was published, and pretty accurately published, and the terms in which it was published indicates that it was shown to somebody for the purpose of being published. The hon. member for South Birmingham (Mr. Amery) made a speech yesterday which showed that he knows more about all these communications than anybody ought to know outside the Government. Then there was the circumstantial statement, which appeared in the Times this morning from its Special Correspondent in Dublin. How do these things get out? I am perfectly certain that hon. members on all sides of the House must unite in condemning these leakages and the methods taken to make them public.

"WHERE DO WE STAND NOW?"

As I understand it, the Government now repudiates the last two paragraphs of the statement that was handed to General Gough. It does not hold itself responsible for them. It says it did not sanction them. It is perfectly true that the War Minister says he agrees with them, but, nevertheless, so far as the Government is concerned, it does not associate itself with them, and so far as this document is an undertaking, the Government say it is an undertaking minus the two paragraphs, but, minus the two paragraphs, it is no undertaking at all; it is simply a statement handed to General Gough of what his duties are as a soldier, so that the effect of the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon is to tell General Gough that the document must be docked of these two final paragraphs. That puts him exactly where he was immediately before he wrote the letter on March 20. He has received no reply to that letter and he has received no guarantee which he can hitch on to that letter. General Gough has been told therefore, that he is a soldier and must do the duties of a soldier or resign his office. (Cheers.) If I am wrong, having made that statement, it surely calls for a reply on behalf of the Government.

A CHALLENGING NOTE.

But, as I said at the beginning, we must not allow our minds to be diverted by what Sir Arthur Paget or anybody else did, in reference to this unfortunate blunder and misunderstanding. The thing this House has got to settle now is—Is it going to submit to the interference of soldiers or is it not? If it is not, then we have got to go on with our business and our business is to pass the Home Rule Bill as quickly as we possibly can and get it inscribed on the Statute-book under the provisions of the Parliament Act (loud Ministerial cheers), and then we will take the consequences whatever they may be. (Renewed cheers.) I am bound to say that I sympathize with the Government in its position this afternoon. In the position, revealed in the White Paper, had been the Government's position, the Government could now have lived for 24 hours. I am delighted that that is not the Government's position. The discussion this afternoon makes it clear once more that we have got to brush aside these superficial accidents, and that we are going to take our stand again against the agitation which has been manufactured by hon. gentlemen opposite. They lost the support of the House of Lords and they fell back on the support of Army officers who share their political opinions.

Lord C. Beresford (Portsmouth, Opp.) followed.

Sir E. Grey's Speech.

Sir E. Grey (Northumberland, Berwick):—The noble lord has enunciated a good deal of exceedingly sound doctrine both as to the separation of the military and naval services from all politics and as to the way in which orders ought to be received. But I cannot agree that it follows from what he said that the Secretary for War should take his advice and insist on resigning. What ought to be the motive that should guide my right hon. friend in his present position? One motive only—namely, a consideration of the public interest, and by that consideration I trust he will be ruled. The questions involved in this debate are larger than was realized when this subject was first raised. Surely after the debate of yesterday and after such speeches as we have heard from the hon. member for Leicester this afternoon, no one in the House and most of all, no one on the opposite side can doubt how large this question is, and also that it will become larger and graver and more serious, and more dangerous the longer it is kept up. (Cheers.) In what shall say, I shall endeavour by again restating the position of the Government, and clearing up the facts as far as we can clear them up, not to lead to contention or keep the question open, but to bring it to a close.

INTENTION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The right hon. gentleman the Leader of the Opposition made a point which the right hon. gentleman the member for the City of London also made when he said, "What did the Government really intend in this matter? What we intended was expressed in the written instructions of March 11, which is contained in the White Paper and for which the whole Cabinet is responsible, not in its actual terms, but the Secretary of State for War put it perfectly accurately, as the instructions for which the whole Cabinet is responsible. It is assumed—and I believe with all sorts of imputations and motives—that Government really intended to go beyond that, and that they had much more in their mind. That is absolutely untrue. I will say no word which puts any responsibility or blame whatever upon General Paget. If there was a misunderstanding on his part it was an honest misunderstanding.

I take next as indication of the Government what the right hon. gentleman opposite quoted as being the words of Sir Charles Ferguson, the officer: "Steps have been taken in Ulster so that any aggression must come from Ulster." On those words the right hon. gentleman puts the construction that Sir Charles Ferguson deliberately conveyed to a subordinate officer not merely that steps had been taken in Ulster, but that these are the actual words: "Steps had been taken to provoke Ulster." To the words taken literally in their meaning I have no objection to make. They are very much in accordance with things I have said continually in my speeches in this House—that if violence was offered it would be met by force. The meaning of that is not to provoke Ireland; that is absolutely untrue. I am told that the belief is firmly rooted in Ulster that warrants had been issued for the arrest of certain persons. For that there is not an atom of a foundation of truth. If there be provocation, and if provocation arises in that way, is the Government to be held responsible for provocation because of statements of that kind?

We had apprehensions that any movement, however purely defensive on our part, might lead to disturbances. Hon. members have expressed sometimes incredulity that there should have been really such an apprehension on our part. But have we not reason for it? (Cheers.) It is urged opposite too large a force and too many precautions were taken for the object we had in view. I have heard in this House sometimes reproaches addressed to the Government for doing something with too weak a force when the object was simple and when their object was protective and defensive, and that the very weakness of the force might be an incentive to some other responsible persons. That is the real dimension and extent of the intention, the real policy, with which the Government undertook the operations which have attracted so much notice.

GENERAL GOUGH'S LETTER.

Now I come to this serious question which is raised by the letter of General Gough dated March 20, which contains the terms "duty as ordered," to which I can see no possible objection whatever, and "active operations." We cannot judge of the words without the context before us. In any event, the mere movements of troops is an active operation. (Opposition cries of "No, no.") Then you must have the context. These are mere quotations in General Gough's letter from what he heard said. General Gough goes on in the next sentence to show that he is in doubt as to what is meant. He says:—

"If such duty consists of the maintenance of order and the preservation of property, all the officers in this Brigade, including myself, would be prepared to carry out their duty."

I agree with the noble lord opposite that the proper and efficient way of answering General Gough's statement would have been to say at once:—"That is the proper construction of the orders given to you. We have nothing more to do with those who are prepared to perform that duty. Resume your command." Just remember what the Secretary of State said. He had not that letter before him when he sent his instructions that the officers who sent in their resignations should be relieved of their commands or their resignation should be refused. He had not that letter before him, when did he get it? It was brought over when the officers came over. I understand that the hon. member for Leicester differentiates that particular letter entirely from the subsequent letter. For an officer who receives instructions to ask what he is actually intended to do is a perfectly legitimate question. In General Gough's first letter there is no question about the future. It is a question as to the actual meaning and scope of the actual orders he had received orally. But the further letter which General Gough wrote on March 28 seems to me to make conditions not only about the future but about policy (cheers), and as such it is a letter to which no Government can possibly reply by making conditions or anything in the nature of them. (Cheers.) As to the particular responsibility for what appears in the paper as a reply to it, the Secretary for War has told the actual story. For the last two paragraphs of that reply, I believe, not technically the whole Army Council but the Secretary for War, Sir John French, and the Adjutant-General were responsible. The Cabinet are absolutely responsible for the first three paragraphs, which remain our considered opinion and which there is no reason for us to alter in any way now. When we were responsible for those three paragraphs we had not General Gough's letter before us, and when the first draft was made I believe that even the Secretary for War had not that letter. When you come to the question of the meaning of the last two paragraphs you must read them together. If they are to be construed, as I believe they are to be construed, so that, should the civil authority be unable to keep order in Ulster and a single policeman need help, there is nothing to relieve anyone in the Army of his obligation to give full assistance, then I do not see much fault to find with that meaning. When my right hon. friend said he stood by those paragraphs, that is the sense in which I understood him to do so.

"GENERAL GOUGH'S RETURN WAS UNCONDITIONAL."

Then why do we not accept responsibility for those two paragraphs? Because you have them, as they appear in this paper, apparently in answer to a letter of General Gough making conditions, though the Prime Minister stated originally that General Gough's return to his command was unconditional and because he said the same to-day. (Cheers.) He returned not as the result of any bargaining between himself and his Majesty's Government. We all know his reputation as that of a most gallant and courageous officer, who has the respect and admiration of all who know him and his public record. When the noble lord opposite asks what is his position in Ireland, of course his position is that which the Prime Minister has stated. (Opposition cries of "What is that?" and Ministerial cries of "He resigned.") No, he is in his command now. It is perfectly well known to General Gough what is the actual answer of the Government and what the position is. The first three paragraphs are the answer of the Government to General Gough. We stand by those and we are responsible for nothing else. (Cheers.)

If General Gough thinks that the last two paragraphs are an answer in the negative to his question—"In the event of the present Home Rule Bill becoming law, can we be called upon to enforce it on Ulster under the expression of maintaining law and order?"—I want to remove that impression, I say definitely he must understand that he is putting question in that letter to which no Government can give a negative answer (cheers), and to which even the Leader of the Opposition could not give a negative answer. I go further and I say that it is not question that an officer should put. (Cheers.)

THE PROSPECT OF COERCION.

When you come to the question of the coercion of Ulster, to compel her to submit to the operation of the Home Rule Bill, I would say this that it finally, under all conditions, it becomes impossible to make the will of the country as to the way in which the Irish question shall be settled prevail by agreement, then of course there will be nothing else for it but the use of force. (Hear, hear.) But I trust, and I still believe, that that time will not come. I look with the greatest reluctance—I would say with the greatest loathing—to the prospect of having to coerce even minority. Those of us in this House who in the old days consistently opposed the coercion of other part of Ireland cannot be expected to look forward with anything but the greatest dislike to landing ourselves in anything which means a policy of coercion in Ulster.

I still hope that may be avoided by some agreement. Now, I turn again to General Gough's letter in which he asks for conditions with regard to future policy. An officer ought not to ask such a question and if he does he must be told that no Government can give an answer. I think it is not in the interests of the discipline of the Army that officers should ask such questions. It is quite true that if a conflict on the question of policy arose as regards orders between the Government of the day and the Army it might bring us very near a revolution; but there is one thing which would certainly bring us to a revolution, and that is if any British Government ever allowed itself to be put in a position where it could be imputed to it that it had taken its policy from or allowed its policy to be influenced by the politics of officers in the Army. (Cheers.) That is why I say I believe that this has arisen originally out of perfectly honest misunderstandings, and I doubt whether General Gough himself could have realized the fire that he was kindling—perhaps he does now after the debate in the House—by putting what I dare say appeared to him a perfect innocent question. Because we consider that this incident is to be closed, as I trust it may be closed, it must be closed on the note that there is no question raised by the Army in respect to the orders given them and, as regards policy, the policy is that of the Government which is not influenced by the Army or attempted to be influenced by the Army, it is because we believe on that note the incident is to be closed that we have laid these papers before the House, and my right hon. friend, the Secretary of State for War, has given the very frank explanation that he has of his own part in the matter and the Prime Minister has given an equally frank and authoritative statement of the position of the Government. (Cheers.)

Mr. Holt and the Opposition.

A SCENE.

Mr. Holt (Northumberland, Hexham, Min.) said they were going to have an Army which should obey equally the orders of Liberal and Conservative Governments. (Ministerial and Opposition cheers.) Otherwise they would have no Army at all. Hon. gentlemen opposite used to rely on the House of Lords, but the House of Lords had been crushed. Then they thought that possibly the Army might be a second string to their bow. (Loud Opposition cries of "Never" and "Withdraw.")

Major Archer-shoe (Finsbury, Central Opp.) Is the hon. member in order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in grossly insulting the armed forces of his Majesty in the way?

The Deputy Speaker.—I do not gather that there was anything of that kind.

Mr. Holt.—Hon. gentlemen opposite have been thinking they could use the army as a substitute for the Lords. (Opposition cries of "Untrue" and "Withdraw.")

The Deputy Speaker.—The hon. member is entitled to state his opinion. We are here to listen to different opinions.

Sir F. Baubury said the hon. member made his statement as a statement of fact, and the Deputy Speaker remarked that members often expressed opinions without saying that they were opinions, but Mr. Holt again raised a storm by explaining that after listening to Opposition speeches during the last few years he had been unable to come to any other conclusion that it was their intention to use the Army as a means of preventing the decisions of this—

The hon. member got no further owing to loud cries of "Untrue." The Deputy Speaker once more appealed to the House to listen to opinions with which they might not agree, and Sir W. Byles (Salford N., Min.) remarked—It is after dinner, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Holt again rose, but was unable to make himself heard amid the cries of "Withdraw."

Mr. Butcher called attention to the "offensive remark" of the hon. member for North Salford, and

The Deputy Speaker said he had rebuked him at the moment without rising from the Chair.

Mr. Holt, resuming his speech, said that the House of Lords had failed the party opposite, and he thought they would find the second string to their bow would fail them too.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S DENIAL.

Mr. A. Chamberlain (Worcestershire, E.).—The hon. member contend that once we are returned here we are to be masters without check or control. No member on the opposition side had even claimed such right as that. (Ministerial cries of "You exercised it.") You say that when we are in power the check does not exist, but you never said that it ought not to exist. Now we have the hon. member, with the approval of his party, claiming that that is the true interpretation of our constitutional system. That is the claim for Single-Chamber government carried to its extreme; and Single-Chamber government, the Foreign Secretary declared, is "death damnation, and destruction." The hon. member said it was the determination of every section of his party "not to tolerate an Army which will not act for our side as it will for the other." We have never asked, expected, or desired that the Army should act for a party. (Cheers.) Our earnest object in all these anxious months has been to prevent any party question affecting the discipline of the Army.

I welcome the intervention this evening of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, but does the right hon. gentleman mean to suggest that there is anything comparable between the coercion, which he admits that he contemplates in certain eventualities, of the great mass of the people of all classes in the north east of Ulster and what was called the coercion practised by my right hon. friend as Chief Secretary. (A Ministerialist.—"Why not?") I will tell the hon. member why not. You may quote the example of my right hon. friend when the Ulstermen fire into the houses of those who disagree with them (cheers), when they tar and feather women who disagree with them (Ministerial cries of "Oh" and Opposition cheers), when they maim cattle (Ministerial interruptions and Opposition cheers)—until you accuse Ulstermen of those crimes (Mr. Dillon.—"I do accuse them" and Ministerial cries of "What about the shipyards?"), and prove that they have committed them, because some men sling accusations about very lightly (cheers and counter-cheers), you cannot cite the action of my right hon. friend as any precedent to the coercion you are contemplating. (Cheers.)

of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (13s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

The Week.

Ulster.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain has given notice of a Resolution, moving that in view of the seriousness of Government's contemplated naval and military movements in Ulster, the incompleteness and inaccuracy of the Ministers' statements and the failure of the Government to deal frankly with the situation there should be a full and impartial enquiry into all circumstances.

London, April 25.

Volunteers were mobilised throughout Ulster yesterday evening with the utmost secrecy. It is estimated that 27,000 turned out.

London, April 25.

Seventy thousand rifles were landed in Ulster last night for volunteers. They were conveyed inland in two hundred motor cars. Mobilisation last night was in Belfast district only. This diverted the attention while the steamer "Fanny" transferred rifles to a small craft.

Later.

Most of the rifles were landed at Larne and the remainder at Bangor and Donaghadee. Many volunteers were on duty at Larne and police were helpless being unable even to communicate with Belfast. The first consignment reached Tyrone at four o'clock in the morning and others were distributed in nearer counties. The plan succeeded without a hitch.

London, April 27.

Estimates as to the number of arms imported into Ireland now vary between 24,600 and 40,000 with from one million to three and half a million cartridges

London, April 27.

Newspapers state that troop trains have been ordered for conveyance northwards of West Kent Regiment and Yorkshire Regiment from Dublin and Manchester Regiment from Currah. It is believed that proclamation of martial law is imminent.

London, April 27.

The Daily Mail says that the above named Regiments arrived in Dublin to day.

The Daily News states that Friday night's crimes are no longer preparations for rebellion. They were rebellion with every circumstance of rebellion. The paper demand an immediate change in the Government's policy towards Ulster and the punishment of every participant in Friday night's incident.

The Daily Chronicle demands that Sir Edward Carson and his colleagues shall no longer be allowed to play with fire. It says Government's immediate duty is to punish Friday's crimes and to draft in troops to confiscate imported arms. It says that a resolute policy may meet the trouble but otherwise worse trouble will meet us.

London, April 27.

Mr. Asquith, Mr. Churchill and Sir John Simon to-day conferred at 10 Downing Street with regard to the Ulster question. Hitherto there have been no movements of troops in Ireland. Volunteers are watching the Police in case they attempt to seize arms.

London, April 27.

Last night there was renewed activity in Ulster between Bangor and Newtownards. Fifty motor cars were engaged in transporting rifles and ammunition. Special volunteers worked unimpeded, the Police expecting warrants which did not arrive.

London, April 27.

Some ninety questions regarding Ulster were asked at question time in the House of Commons to-day. They were answered in silence, the position being regarded as too grave for the continuance of recent angry retorts. Sir Edward Carson and Captain Craig sat among the Opposition benches. Replying to Mr. Lough on the subject of recent importation of arms into Ulster Mr. Asquith said that in view of this grave and unprecedented outrage the House may rest assured that Government will take without delay proper steps to vindicate the authority of law and to protect officers and servants of the King (loud cheers) and His Majesty's subjects in the exercise of their duties and enjoyment of their legal right.

London, April 28.

Unionist papers continue to publish columns of description regarding gunrunning in Ulster. They declare that not another rifle is now required by volunteers. The work of distribution in the province is nearly accomplished and arms have been securely hidden in small lots. Hundreds of motors were employed. As an instance of secrecy observed, it is stated that in a procession of sixty-four cars, the only man aware of the destination was the leading driver.

London, April 28.

The steamer "Roma" has been detained at Ayr, on a charge of illegal carriage of arms. It is alleged that the "Roma" was about to sail for Ayr on Friday night when she was seized by Ulster volunteers. Volunteers employed her in taking arms from the gunrunner to Belfast. The crew were powerless.

London, April 28.

Thrilling description is given of the adventures of the gunrunner Norwegian hooker "Fanny." She tramped the seas for three weeks in gales without papers. She was three times repainted and re-christened. She eventually anchored in Yarmouth Roads to provision and repair. A man went thence to London got in touch with Ulster and then went to Lundy Island where he met "Mountjoy" which was chartered and manned by the Volunteers. Arms were transhipped in the first place one hundred miles South of Tasker Rack and in the second place to Cardigan Bay whence "Mountjoy," in the guise of a collier leisurely proceeded to Ulster, a member of the Ulster Unionist Council boarding her at sunset on Friday and directing the run to Larne.

London, April 28.

Telegrams from Belfast state that it is rumoured that certain troops, ordered north during the week-end, asked for conditions of service. They were prepared to mobilise, but refused to wage war against Ulster and to shoot those under the flag. Consequently the orders were cancelled.

London, April 28.

In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Austen Chamberlain submitted his motion for an impartial inquiry into the movement of troops in Ulster. He emphasised that Government had refused information and had refused to publish the instructions given to Lieutenant-General Sir Arthur Paget or what Sir Arthur Paget had told the Officers. He proceeded to accuse Ministers of making grossly and flagrantly inaccurate statements. They seemed as regards the Naval movement to be unable to distinguish between truth and untruth. Indeed the whole story of the Government was incredible while the talk about atrocities was a mere pretence to cover the movement of an overwhelming force with a view to coercing Ulster. He demanded a full and impartial inquiry amid cheers.

MR. CHURCHILL'S REPLY

Mr. Churchill said this was a most audacious vote of censure and a most impudent demand for a judicial inquiry on record. Complainant should come to a court with clean hands; but there were Sir Edward Carson and Captain Craig fresh from gun-running exploits. He asserted that subsequent events had proved fatal to the motion. It looked like criminal classes moving a vote of censure on the Police. (Opposition:—"You have not arrested the criminals") Mr. Churchill declared that the Conservatives were committed to tampering with the Army and the Navy and smuggling arms by moon-light. He asked them to think how these doctrines would apply in India and Egypt.

Mr. Churchill prefaced the peroration to his speech by appealing to Sir Edward Carson who was running risk in the strife to run risk for peace, adding:—"I am running some little risk in what I now say." He accused those who were preparing for a civil war of having other purposes than that of wanting to subvert the regular system of parliamentary Government. Government would not use force till force was used against the representatives of law and order. He defended the right of Government to throw troops into Ulster to arrest leaders and to take other drastic measures, but considered them inadvisable in the circumstances with which they had to deal. He asked the House even in that last period to seek a better solution than a civil war and alluded to the anxiety felt by every friendly country owing to the belief that the balance of power would presently be changed. Foreign countries did not realise that external difficulties would dispel internal dissensions. If that was feasible at a higher call of patriotism, why not at a call of internal amity.

Great importance is attached in the lobby to Mr. Churchill's peroration. It is considered that the suggestion, however vague is a great advance on Government's original proposals and indicates that Government is feeling its way towards a Federal solution.

Berlin, April 29.

The National Zeitung says that "Fanny's" consignment of arms for Ulster consisted of 80,000 American small-calibre rifles and three million cartridges.

The Ulster Crisis.

London, 30th April.

The majority in the censure motion included 70 Nationalists and 80 Labourites.

The Commons was deeply moved by Mr. Balfour's peroration in which he eloquently described his whole life's work to make the United Kingdom one nation under one Parliament and to make Ireland content under that Parliament by removing all her grievances. This life work had been shattered by the establishment of a Parliament in Dublin. Even if Ulster were excluded therefrom, so far from that being a triumph, the passage of Home Rule with exclusion would be regarded by Mr. Balfour as a disaster.

Mr. Asquith made a speech thereafter in which he said that the debate would be remembered not so much for the exposure of the myth of a plot which never existed as for the speeches of Sir Edward Carson and Mr. Balfour, which might prove to be landmarks in the history of this controversy. It was impossible to listen to Mr. Balfour's speech without lively emotion. He had never heard in the Commons a more remarkable, more touching, more appealing avowal, but it amounted to this that Mr. Balfour was constrained to admit that uncontrollable forces had been too strong for him, making him recognise that Home Rule in some shape was inevitable.

The opinion is strengthening that the time limit for the exclusion of Ulster will be abandoned. It is expected that Sir Edward Carson and Mr. Redmond will take part in the next conferences between the party leaders. Yesterday's debate was also remarkable for its varying tone. It opened in warlike manner but ended pacifically. Mr. Churchill's offer of an olive branch proved to be the text of the pacific utterances of Mr. Balfour, Sir E. Carson and Mr. Bonar Law. The last named invited Mr. Asquith to renew conversations and offered to stand aside and let Lord Lansdowne or Sir E. Carson negotiate. Mr. Asquith expressed his opinion that the road to settlement was not through bargaining on the floor of the Commons. He said there must be no settlement behind the backs of Ulstermen or other Irishmen.

The fifth Cabinet of this week met to-day. It was also the most prolonged of the five. It is understood that time was devoted to considering the Irish settlement. The brighter outlook of yesterday evening was maintained to-day, and there are great hopes that a round table conference will be arranged.

Advices from Belfast report that a general optimistic tone prevails there since the latest events at Westminster, but distrust of the Government's bona fides is sporadically expressed.

Three cruisers were observed patrolling off Lough Foyle this morning. It was believed in Londonderry that their presence was due to the report which has since proved unfounded of the landing of arms at Innishowen from America for the Nationalist.

The Greek Church.

The Oecumenical Patriarch has appealed to the Czar for the protection of members of the Orthodox Church. It is stated in Athens that the Czar has given £1,000 towards the fund to assist refugees and has instructed the Russian Minister to confer with his British and French colleagues with a view to securing a cessation of the ill-treatment of members of the Orthodox Church.

Austria and the Balkans.

The statement of Count Berchtold, Austro-Hungarian Minister for Foreign Affairs, to the Delegations affirmed Austria-Hungary's desire to see Turkey, who despite the losses of the war remained a strong element in the East, consolidate her possessions. He declared that Austria-Hungary attached great importance to a continuance of the Ottoman factor in undiminished strength on both political and economic grounds. He praised Great Britain's conciliatoriness in the Balkan crisis, which he declared largely contributed to the peaceful settlement, and emphasised the friendship binding the Dual Monarchy and Great Britain.

The Minister announced that so many thousands of Christian refugees continued to arrive in Salonika that it was difficult to provide shelter for them.

The Turkish Navy.

Constantinople May 1st.

The Committee which has been entrusted with the expenditure of the public subscription to increase the Navy, which now amounts to £450,000, announces that the Porte has ordered another Dreadnought from Messrs. Armstrong, making three. Six destroyers and two submarines have also been ordered in France. The Porte deems these measures necessary owing to the Greek orders of last March.

University of Cambridge.

London, April 25.

In a few weeks, the University of Cambridge will publish documents consisting of important variants of the text of the Koran contained in Palimpsest purchased from Mrs. Agnes Lewis in 1895 Doctor Mingana of Syro-Chaldean Seminary House, only deciphered the Koranic text under the upper patriotic text in November. Some of the pages were apparently written before Mohamed's amanuensis Zaid ibn Thabit compiled of the Textus Receptus of Koran.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

THE second reading of the Home Rule Bill has been carried in the House of Commons with the handsome majority of 80. The Parliamentary debate on Monday last, before the division took place, was not of any particular significance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was unfortunately unable to be present, owing to indisposition, but Mr. Birrell, who wound up for the Government, impressed the House with a speech that was full of lucid expressions and convincing arguments. The Chief Secretary for Ireland made it abundantly clear that Mr. Asquith's offer of temporary exclusion for Ulster is still open, but the Conservative Leader's attitude, which was hardly conciliatory, does not at present render the situation very hopeful, though it is only fair to mention that Sir Edward Carson has at last thoroughly realised the gravity of the problem and his speech on Monday night plainly indicated that he would be willing to negotiate with a view to a peaceful solution. There is also a distinct sign of willingness for reconciliation and peace visible amongst the back benches on both sides and, for the present at any rate, the House has adjourned for the brief Easter recess full of hopes. Everybody, from the serious politician to the man in the street, seems for the moment infected with the holiday mood and, unless any particularly vital developments occur, which are not likely, the prospects for the subsequent progress of the Home Rule Bill and its eventual enactment are very favourable indeed.

The Prime Minister, as Reuter has, of course already informed you, has been returned for East Fife unopposed on his acceptance of the Secretaryship of State for War. His triumphal progress overland to Scotland last week was the highest tribute the country has ever paid to Liberalism. Mr. Asquith's speech to his constituents at Ladybank, in which he mainly dealt with the questions of Home Rule and the Army, has found an echo throughout the Kingdom. His significant words in reference to the Army's participation in politics—"the Army will hear nothing of politics from me and I in turn expect to hear nothing of politics from the Army"—have put the whole case in a nutshell and people of all shades of opinion are in full agreement with him on that important point. It is the sacred duty of the Army to unhesitatingly obey the orders of its legally constituted authorities. The Conservative party has tried its utmost to use the Army as a pawn in the political game but has signally failed in this trick, the meanest possible trick that could ever be imagined. The Opposition had an excellent opportunity before them in East Fife to vindicate their honour and to justify their recent action both inside and outside Parliament. Even a substantial fall in Mr. Asquith's majority would have certainly been rightly interpreted by the country as a strong condemnation of the Government's policy. There were no side issues before the electorate in East Fife and nobody was more anxious than Mr. Asquith himself to put the question of the Army to the forefront in the constituency. As a matter of fact he did so in no unmistakable language at Ladybank and yet the Conservatives, who are never tired of declaring that the country has lost its confidence in the present Government, have refused to avail themselves of such a splendid chance. They knew that it would be suicidal to appeal to the East Fife electors on the vital issue that has been so recklessly raised by them in the House of Commons. They were perfectly aware that no sane constituency is prepared to proclaim that in future the regimental mess-house is to be the legislative chamber of the nation. They were absolutely convinced of the fact that no elector could or would vote for the party that has done its best to convert the people's army into that of the Conservative party. Hence their decision not to oppose Mr. Asquith's candidature. All their talk about their "patriotism," etc., which, they say, has prompted them to adopt this course, must, of course, be at once dismissed as useless and ridiculous. It is nothing of the kind. Only certain knowledge of a crushing defeat at the polls has prevented them from putting their candidate in the field and their refusal to have anything to do with the "sour grapes" deceives no one but themselves. The sum and substance of all this rather farcical drama on the part of the Opposition is the fact that the hands of the Government have been enormously strengthened and the Liberal party's position in the House of Commons with the aid of the Irish Nationalists and the Labour Party has never been more secure than it is to-day.

MR. BALFOUR AS A HYDE PARK AGITATOR.

"Sub Rosa" writes a most interesting article in the Daily News and Leader on the rather unexpected appearance of Mr. Balfour in Hyde Park last Saturday on the occasion of the Unionist demonstration against Home Rule. The "gentlemanly" party has always treated public demonstrations by the Labour and Liberal parties and other associations with contempt and has hitherto considered such movements as "infra dig" for themselves to undertake. Eight long and weary years, during which they have been ploughing the sands of Opposition, have at last rendered the Conservative party desperate and on Saturday last London was freely treated to a most extraordinary sight of witnessing noble lords, ex Cabinet Ministers and even an ex-Prime Minister in the unique role of Hyde Park agitators. The present wicked Government is solely responsible for the deep depth of humility to which the "aristocratic" party has sunk or rather been forcibly reduced to. "I may say," proceeds the writer, "that if I had been asked a week ago if the appearance of Mr. Balfour as an agitator in Hyde Park could be regarded as a probability, I should have said at once that the answer was in the negative. I should have given that answer as a result of the study of his habits derived from looking at the past. He has hitherto regarded Hyde Park demonstrations with serene contempt. Some years ago there was a tremendous meeting there to oppose his Church Education Bill, and when he was asked some question in the House about the demonstration he turned to those sitting near him and said in his well-known style of polite bewilderment, 'Let me see—where did this gathering take place?' Hyde Park demonstrations then appeared to be beneath his notice—but he has now discovered that if a man would avoid being forgotten he must keep 'in the movement.' Of course, we all know that Mr. Balfour has on occasion announced that he is a democrat—but this has been regarded as 'only his fun.' Times, however, change, and men have to change with them, and so the Rt. Hon. gentleman no longer dismisses tub-thumping in Hyde Park as belonging to his newly-discovered 'category of negligibility.' I wonder whether, owing to the seriousness of the political situation, he will take to smoking a short clay pipe, and addressing his fellow men as 'old mateys.' And I should like to know what Mr. Bonar Law thinks about this amusing incident. Mr. Balfour may next appear on a perch in Trafalgar square, or speak a few words of encouragement to a crowd of strikers on Tower Hill. If so, the official Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons will find his predecessor quite a dangerous rival. Mr. Balfour has shown by his prowess at golf, and tennis, at theology, and, I am told, at the grand piano, what can be done by pluck and persistence, so that if he is now about to come out as a street-corner orator he may be called back to the leadership after all. Up to now that recall, which was confidently expected by some, has not been heard. But this Hyde Park experiment is a bold one. It shows that Mr. Balfour means business, and he must have taken great trouble over the affair, as it is said that he asked several people 'Where is Hyde Park?' in order to get there in time to do his turn. Did he stand on an upturned tub, or was he in the cart, or up a tree? It is to be hoped that someone has noted down all details and particulars for the sake of historians in the future, and in order that one of the most picturesque incidents in the history of the Park may be fittingly preserved. Some say that he took his coat off, and others contradict this. What is wanted is an official and authoritative version or record of the whole affair.

"And where was Lord Lansdowne—that other sturdy non-party democrat? It seems to me that he missed the chance of his life, and in consequence the public missed a treat. To have seen Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne appealing to the great heart of the people, and bawling to a record gathering of nurse-girls from the suburbs, would have given the crowd an unrivalled opportunity of enjoying some competitive and genteel tub-thumping. Mr. Balfour has long since proved his versatility, and last Saturday's show gave him an opportunity of at last playing the part of an open-air agitator. Is it true, I wonder, that he carried his umbrella 'at the trial'—to use Mr. Garvin's phrase, meaning, perhaps, 'trial' that he waved a little flag and saluted Sir Edward Carson in the best military style? All this is being proudly related by his admirers. It is whispered that he has enlisted in the Ulster Volunteers, and will shortly appear in uniform, having already been given high rank in the band. When such a man takes up the business of an agitator there is no holding him back. He has lost much time to redeem, and so he is now prepared to rival the British Army in going anywhere and doing anything. Having resolved to undertake this democratic new departure, and seeing the necessity of doing the thing well, as becomes a belated convert, what was Mr. Balfour's main theme in the Park? It was an honest, manly, heart-to-heart appeal against anything of the nature of Coercion in Ireland! I am told that at first some of his hearers thought that he was joking, and that he had come to provide a little comic relief in the midst of dour and stern oratory. But no!—Mr. Balfour has become a 'very different man,' and he who covered Non-Conformists with ridicule when they offered passive resistance to his Education Act now pleads for the sacred rights of the Curragh conscience, and he who employed troops to help the landlords in evicting peasants in Ireland, troops who were told not to hesitate to shoot, is now shocked at the bare notion of coercion. He is one of the most interesting converts known to history.

"But his appearance as an open-air agitator in Hyde Park shows how quickly we have travelled and how far we have moved within a very few years. It seems but yesterday that when he wanted to strip up Liberal legislation, all he had to do was to call round at Lansdowne House, and there, in company with the noble Marquis, the trick could be played without any fuss or fluster. It is a long way, in one sense though not in another, from that famous house in a famous square to a perch in Hyde Park. He has managed to travel that journey—perhaps he could say with truth, 'I didn't want to do it'—but necessity hath no law. And he has had his reward, for has not Mr. Garvin likened him to Achilles (who is also represented in Hyde Park) returning to the fight before Troy? The simile may not be quite encouraging to some gentlemen on the Tory front bench, for Achilles came back only when myrmidons and others on his own side were in a hopeless mess. And directly he did come back he took the lead at once and beyond all question. Is this what is going to happen in regard to this later Achilles? I cannot say, but if the eloquent classical allusion has any appropriateness it may turn out that the Hyde Park perch was but a stepping-stone to the post of leader."

DISMISSAL OF MR. ARNOLD'S CASE.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, at which there were present on Monday Lord Shaw, Lord Moulton, Sir John Edge and Mr. Ameer Ali, as you are already aware, has dismissed the appeal of Mr. Channing Arnold, the editor and proprietor of the "Burma Critic," from a conviction of defamation and a sentence of one year's imprisonment by the Chief Court of Lower Burma. The proceedings were taken under the Indian Penal Code by a district magistrate, who alleged that Mr. Arnold defamed him in two articles headed "A Mockery of British Justice."

There is universal sympathy felt here for Mr. Arnold among the entire Indian colony on the failure of his appeal. Commenting on the result of his case, the Westminster Gazette proceeds as follows:—"At the same time it is only fair to Mr. Arnold to point out that he was moved to action by an honest view that there had been a miscarriage of justice. As to that, it is to be noted that the Privy Council expressly declares that 'they find themselves in entire agreement with the learned judge,' who (in the Burmese Court) said 'It is not surprising that there should be indignation and hot feeling on the part of the sympathisers with the mother of the child Aina, and good reason for feelings of indignation at some of the conduct—the admitted conduct—of Mr. McCormick. However strong his inclination for amateur doctoring may have been, there was no justification for that. It was a thing that no man with a proper sense of decency should have done.'"

Again a little later the Privy Council says:—"After investigating the facts and declining to commit, he (Mr. Andrew) went on to say that in his opinion Mr. McCormick's conduct was pure and philanthropic. Their Lordships cannot agree with such an opinion, and their views coincide with those of the Chief Justice on that subject."

It is only bare justice to Mr. Arnold that these passages should be borne in mind in connection with his appeal that has failed.

THE ISLAMIC SOCIETY.

At to-day's Juma Namaz at Lindsay Hall, held under the auspices of the Islamic Society, a Young Turkish lady, Miss Ataullah, was amongst the worshippers. This lady's brother, who was undergoing a course of instruction in aviation at Hendon about two years ago, had served the Society faithfully on the Committee for some time and consequently his sister's genial presence amongst us this morning at Lindsay Hall was particularly welcome and appreciated by the members of the Society present. Miss Ataullah's sister is a medical student at the Royal Free Hospital for Women in London, she is to be heartily congratulated on her enlistment as a worker in this noble branch of science and she will carry our good wishes for her success in her future medical work in Turkey. Yet another piece of evidence as to the advancement of Turkish women!

THE HOSPITALITY COMMITTEE.

This Committee, of whose aims and objects I have briefly acquainted your readers in my letter of last week, held their first reception last Saturday afternoon at 25, Park Lane, the palatial residence of Sir Phillip Sassoon, M. P. A very large gathering of Indian and English people was present and Lord Haldane delivered an informal address on the occasion. The Lord Chancellor referred to the fact that his interest in India, and particularly Indian philosophy, had been roused as long back as his student days at the Edinburgh University, when he happened to have had a very formidable rival in an Indian fellow student in almost all the examinations for which he had sat. Sometimes, according to Lord Haldane, the Indian beat him "hands down," while on other occasions, Lord Haldane, or Mr. R. B. Haldane as he then was, succeeded in bowling his Indian rival over. The keen competition and the healthy rivalry that had evidently existed between the two, we were told, had only cemented their friendship still closer and had created an unusual degree of mutual regard and admiration between them. After knowing all this, one wonders whether the present occupant of the Woolsack would not have really done better at the India Office.

Soon after the guests had assembled, we were unexpectedly afforded the unique experience of witnessing the hurried entry of Sir Edward Carson into the building, not as a guest but as a "deserter" from the adjoining Unionist demonstration in Hyde Park. Sir Edward had been "mobbed" by his sympathetic supporters, who were determined to "chair" him, after the demonstration was over. The Irish Unionist Leader was too exhausted to accept this further recognition of his services to the "cause" on the part of his followers and he literally ran away from them and sought shelter under the ever-hospitable roof of Sir Phillip Sassoon. We saw him enter the house gasping for breath and looking as pale as sheet. Even then the enthusiastic demonstrators did not give in. Crowds collected outside the mansion and Sir Edward was finally compelled to address them again from the balcony.

As to the ultimate success of the scheme that has been taken up by the Hospitality Committee, as I have said before, everything depends on themselves. It is much too premature to judge their work at this stage but they can succeed only if and when they could convince the Indian student of the honesty of their purpose. The least trace of Anglo-Indianisation in their plan is bound to bring nothing but ruin and disaster to the whole scheme.

THE LONDON MOSLEM LEAGUE.

I had mentioned, I think, in one of my previous weekly letters to the Comrade that the London Moslem League, with a view to rendering the organization more popular here among the young Indian Moslems, had decided to hold informal committee dinners from time to time. I am glad to say that the first function of the kind was held on Saturday last, the 4th inst. at the Westminster Palace Hotel and proved a complete success. The gathering was not large and was never intended to be, since the occasion was in no sense a public function. It was held almost exclusively for the benefit of the members of the League in London and the objects for which the dinner had been arranged, viz., the promotion of social intercourse, and the encouragement of informal exchange of views, between the members, were amply fulfilled. Practically all the members of the London League attended. The Right Hon. Syed Ameer Ali, the President, was in the chair, but, owing to indisposition, the vice-President, Mr. C. A. Latif, was unfortunately prevented from being present; while Mr. A. S. M. Anik, the Hon. Treasurer, who had been laid up with Bronchitis for the past three weeks, had heroically left his sick-bed to attend the dinner, though he was prevented by his doctor's orders from freely indulging into the luxuries of the table and had to merely contend himself with sparingly partaking of only the "digestible" courses on the menu.

The occasion being an informal one, there was, of course, no official toast-list. After the loyal toast was duly honoured, however, Colonel Yate, M. P., briefly proposed the toast of the London League. He is an honorary member of the Association. In responding to the toast, Mr. Ameer Ali expressed his gratification at the presence of the representative gathering that evening and hoped that the members present would realise their individual responsibility and that they would all work for the advancement of the aims and objects of the London League. Mr. Asaf Ali, in a short but eloquent speech, proposed the President's health, for which Mr. Ameer Ali briefly returned thanks.

The arrangements for the dinner, which left nothing to be desired, reflected very great credit on the organising abilities of Mr. Ghulam Rasul, the Acting Hon. Secretary.

TETE À TETE

As we go to press we learn by wire that the Aligarh College Hockey team won the Beighton Cup after at Calcutta a hard contest. We do not know the details of the recent tour of the team, but congratulate it most heartily on a success which promises to be the earnest of better things to come. Dr. Fyze referred in his recent letter to us to the bad luck which attended the hockey team in its Bombay visit some years ago, and in 1911 the team's Calcutta tour was not as successful as it had been expected to be. The present success is, therefore, all the more welcome, and we have every hope that the College hockey team would now build up a reputation no whit less great than that which many generations of Aligarh men have built up for Aligarh cricket. We congratulate the captain on the success of his endeavours, and look forward to his establishing a record as brilliant as that of Prince Hamidullah Khan in cricket this year.

We referred some weeks ago to a remark made by Mr. Asquith in the course of his Ladybank speech that the Tory doctrines about the Army "set a precedent, which was of an infinite number of applications, each more disastrous in its consequences than the one which went before it." Our contemporary, the Pioneer, evidently had discovered a way out of the difficulty and went on publishing its London letters exulting over the discomfiture of the Government and backing them up with editorial comments which were uttered in a still more triumphant tone. This led the Editor of the Comrade to write to the Pioneer and ask for the solution of some military conundrums in India. On a certain well-known occasion a gentleman who is now an esteemed Muslim member of the U. P. Legislative Council wrote to the Pioneer and sought its advice with regard to the future policy of the Indian Mussalmans. We confess we were somewhat surprised at the time at this procedure and had commented on it with some severity. Time, however, brings its own revenges, and the Hon. Syed Riza Ali can well exult over the editor of this journal for having been compelled to seek advice from the Pioneer. His exultation must be all the greater because, whereas the Pioneer readily offered to him the advice that he had sought, it has not condescended to assist the editor of the Comrade. The only reply it has vouchsafed to him is: "Returned with many thanks."

The letter addressed by the Editor of the Comrade to the Pioneer runs as follows:—

Ulster and India.

"Sir,—Not so long ago you were constantly thrusting me on the attention of your readers and it was a great strain on my eyes to stand the fierce light that beats on him who is pilloried in your columns. If to-day I venture to thrust myself on the attention of your readers it is because I desire to turn on that dazzling light not so much on myself as on a somewhat obscure problem of general interest to my countrymen.

"A year and a half ago the Hindu residents of Ajuddhiya objected to the sacrifice of cows by Mussalmans on the occasion of the Eid-i-Adha, or Bakr 'Id, in that sacred and historic locality. The Mussalmans, however, insisted on the exercise of a well-established right and the Local Government upheld their claim. However apprehending that there may be a breach of the peace, the civil authorities, I believe, asked for and obtained the promise of the assistance of troops which were thereupon quartered in the neighbourhood of the locality. More recently, a Mosque in Machhli Bazar at Cawnpore was surrounded one morning by the Armed Police, and a portion of it demolished in the presence of the District Magistrate at the instance, I believe, of the official Chairman of the Cawnpore Municipality. A month later the Mussalmans of the City held a mass meeting to protest against the sacrilege, and when it was over, some of them went and commenced to heap up the debris of loose bricks on the demolished site. On being asked by some policemen to desist and disperse, they are alleged to have handled the trespassers somewhat roughly. On this the District Magistrate is stated to have brought a force of Mounted and Armed Police and to have ordered it to open fire on the mob. I have been told, though I cannot vouch for it, that the District Magistrate telephoned to the highest military authority in the local garrison to send some troops also for assisting the Police, but that this officer treated the request as the result of the Magistrate excessive excitement, besides being not in proper legal form.

"Whatever the facts of the matter, I am anxious to know your view of the law and the equity in the following hypothetical cases. If the troops at Ajuddhiya had been ordered by the civil authorities to fire on a Hindu mob that forcibly resisted the sacrifice of cows by Mussalmans on the occasion of Bakr 'Id, and if the troops at Cawnpore had been similarly ordered to fire on the Mussalmans who resisted trespassers on the site of the demolished portion of their mosque, would the Hindu soldier at Ajuddhiya and the Mussalman soldiers at Cawnpore have been justified, either by law or by equity, to have refused to comply with the order to fire on their co-religionists on the ground that they were conscientiously satisfied that the civil authorities were in the wrong and those on whom they were ordered to fire were in the right?

"It is reported that in the course of a speech in the House of Commons, Mr. Bonar Law, the leader of the Unionist Party, with which you are generally in agreement, claimed that 'the least we in the twentieth century had a right to ask was that when we were threatened with civil commotion, officers conscientiously objecting to that service should be permitted to resign, retaining their pensions.' In your issue of the 29th April you say: 'Talk as one will about Constitutional theory and Army orders, the history both of our own and of other lands teaches us that on the outbreak of civil war all theories and legalisms fall to the ground and every citizen feels constrained to take sides according to his conscience. It is this which has always differentiated civil strife from a foreign war.'

"May I ask if in the two hypothetical cases, my Hindu and Moslem fellow-countrymen respectively would have been justified in claiming, with Mr. Bonar Law, the right to resign and retain their pensions on the ground of conscientiously objecting to such service as was demanded of them, and if, with you, they could claim the additional right of shooting down the District Magistrates by taking side against the civil authorities according to their conscience?

"It may also be that some more than usually enterprising fellow-countrymen of mine may organise a Saniti in Calcutta the members of which may take an oath to resist by force of arms a second Partition of Bengal when the Unionists come into power next July, and Lord Curzon, as His Majesty's Secretary of State for India, orders his agents in India, namely, the Governor-General in Council, to revert to the arrangements made by him in 1905, appointing Sir Banfyde Fuller as the Lieutenant-Governor at Dacca. In that case, would my fellow-countrymen, the Bengal Covenanters, be liable to arrest and imprisonment for conspiracy and waging war against His Majesty if they organised a "Volunteer Coup" and "outwitted the authorities" by landing a cargo of a million Automatic Browning Pistols and a few hundred million cartridges after surrounding the coastguards on the Hoogli with members of athwas armed with lathis?

"These are contingencies which may or may not happen; but you will agree, Sir, that it is best 'in these democratic days' to be armed with the sanctions of law—and fact."

Now, this is really very unkind of our Allahabad cotemporary.

Bankrupt!

Unasked it has given more advice to the Indians in general and the Mussalmans in particular than they could properly digest and many a leader of the Mussalmans has consequently suffered from a sort of political diarrhoea. On public platforms, in the Legislative Councils, and even in the columns of newspapers they have had a morbidly frequent evacuation of unsubstantial and loose views.

But when for once the editor of this journal was starving for want of advice this great almoner has thrown him nothing better than the crumb of "many thanks." We ask the world to judge whether good manners can be a substitute for good advice. One would not have thought that the Pioneer would so soon become bankrupt even in advice to Muslims. Not that we are ourselves wholly unacquainted with ordinary law as applicable to soldiers; but we were anxious to know the "Bonar Law" and the "Pioneer law." We wonder whether the Hon. Syed Riza Ali would meet with better luck than the editor of this journal, and we would humbly suggest to him to try.

آو نام جی سیر کریں کوہ طور کی

(Why need it be supposed that all would receive similar answers? Come, let us also climb Mount Sinai).

The District Magistrate of Lahore sent for the publisher of the Zamindar on the 8th April and in the presence of the Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi Khan Sahib Bashir Ali Khan, Nawab Mohamed Ali Khan Qazilbash and Sardar

Abdur Rahman Khan handed him a letter dealing with a number of articles which had appeared in some of the recent issues of the paper and which Government considered objectionable. This letter which was published in our last issue points out by a detailed reference to those articles that, in the opinion of Government, the editor is doing his best "to stir up agitation among the ignorant masses by misrepresentation and misquotation which might have 'mischievous results.'" Apart from the question whether the warning was at all justified, we take strong exception to the manner in which the warning was communicated to the publisher. This District Magistrate is not authorised by law to warn the editor of a newspaper the tone and spirit of which he considers to be mischievous or which in his opinion is trying to incite the ignorant masses by misrepresentation and misquotation. But if, instead of exercising the authority vested in a Local Government, it chooses to be lenient and gives such warning, we do not at all understand why the Magistrate should think it proper or necessary to call to his side a number of non-official gentlemen some of whom are regarded by the editor as his most determined opponents. Such men are not surely needed to stand sponsor to an act of grace and to bear witness to it afterwards if the warning goes unheeded. They are not the men who can influence the views and policy of the editor by persuasion or advice. What their presence is most likely to achieve is to give an added sting of humiliation to the warning conveyed. The Deputy Commissioner of Lahore could not probably be unaware of this, and his procedure would be resented as an insult by every journalist who is jealous of the honour and dignity of his profession. When a journalist is supposed to have offended against the law, he has to deal with those alone whose duty it is to see that the law is respected and obeyed. But he is not expected to expose himself to the mockery and ridicule of his enemies, or be treated to an official rebuke in the presence of men for whose public life and conduct he may have neither sympathy nor respect. We do not know how our Lahore contemporary regards this matter, but for our part we frankly say that if a Magistrate dared to subject us to such a humiliation, he would find that we might have a good deal to say to him on the subject of his own shortcomings and probably the public humiliation would be just the other way about. As we have said, there is no section of the Press Act or any other law in force in British India which can compel an editor to call at the house of a Magistrate and hear whatever he may please to say any more than it can compel a Magistrate to call at the house of an editor and hear whatever the latter may please to say. If, however, Government desire to give an editor a warning before punishing him under the law, the only justification of such a course would be the desire to convince the journalist of the error of his ways, and this can only be done in the course of a private conversation in which the official should forget that he is anything more than a fellow-subject. The conversation, to be effective, must be frank and ample opportunity should be afforded to the journalist to explain his point of view. There should be no dodging round corners, and good manners should be used as auxiliaries of good arguments. It may in certain cases be desirable to invoke the aid of others also; but these must naturally be those whom the person to be warned must regard as his well-wishers and for whom he must at least entertain respect. Otherwise the poet's complaint would be only too true:

جمع کرتی ہو کیوں دلیہوں تو ابک "تمہارے ہوا کہ ہوا"

(Why do you gather together my enemies? That would be an exhibition, not a grievance.)

In circumstances such as those attending Mr. Tollinton's warning to the publisher of the Zamindar, a high spirited person may be induced to do exactly that which the warning is designed to prevent.

The Agent Provocateur.

In such cases the person who warns only becomes an agent provocateur who, according to Sir Edward Carson, is a person despised even by the criminal classes. We are prepared to believe that Sir Michael O'Dwyer has no intention of provoking the Zamindar to incur the penalties of official displeasure under the Press Act. But His Honour has not chosen the best method of disproving the rumours current throughout Northern India that his aversion to the proprietor of the Zamindar does not date only from the commencement of his administration of the Punjab, but goes back to the days when, at his instance, as the British Resident at Hyderabad, Mr. Zular Ali Khan's services were dispensed with by the late Nizam, on the suspicion of having lampooned Mr. Walker, the Finance Minister of Hyderabad, in the columns of the "loyal" and staid Paisa Akhbar. At any rate, the Zamindar is not likely to thank His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor for his leniency any more than it thanked him for his unjustifiable order of last January which mulcted the Zamindar in a loss of some Rs. 20,000. If it was meant as an exhibition of His Honour's leniency it has failed to convince. It is nothing more or less than an indication that the Zamindar must be prepared for the worst so long as the Press Act is in force. Sir Michael O'Dwyer is the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab and the Zamindar continues its present policy. The Press Act is by this time notorious for the all-comprehensiveness of its scope and application, and until and unless the Zamindar ceases to be an independent critic of official acts and measures, it will provide every day a hundred excuses for the Punjab Government to punish it under that Act. The result would be the kind of impotent rage and despair which drives even those who appreciate to the full the blessings of British Rule in spite of its occasional shortcomings into the attitude of irreconcilable hostility. This is the genesis of three fourths of the anarchy one hears of in India, and when we read of a bomb being thrown or a pistol being fired at some official of Government, while we denounce the outrage we also curse the crass stupidity of those who drove an otherwise well-intentioned youth into an inhuman anarchist.

We have very carefully read the offending articles of the Zamindar, and before we say anything else, let us confess we frankly dislike them. This would have been a gratuitous insult to our contemporary if we were dealing with its opinions in the ordinary way. There are a hundred articles appearing in the Indian press every week which we do not like, and we are sure there must be many of our own articles which the Zamindar and our other contemporaries equally frankly dislike. Every paper has its own views, tone and taste, and frequently the tone and taste of one article differ from those of another in the same newspaper. In the articles of the Zamindar which have drawn upon our contemporary's head the warning of Mr. Tollinton, we find no clear argument, no sustained reasoning, no information systematically given, but a wild wilderness where tit-bits of facts and fancies run riot, and where the chief beauty lies in certain purple patches which are quotations from famous men and seem to have been stored away for journalistic use on the first available opportunity. These are all dished up with the garnish of a rhetoric, which, we are sorry to have to say, is becoming particularly associated with our Lahore contemporary, and which is repelling from it the sympathies of many men, who rightly admired it as the first Muslim paper in Urdu that created popular taste for newspaper reading, but who are now beginning to accuse it of vitiating that taste. However, when all this has been said and done, let us hasten to add that we have searched high and low in all these articles for anything which is seditious, and we have failed to chance upon anything suggestive of treason. In fact, it is a part of our complaint against the Zamindar that it has only warmed up the leavings of well-known Indian and European writers like Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji, Mr. R. C. Dutt and Mr. William Digby. For every sentence objected to in these articles we can quote a dozen from the writings and the speeches of these celebrities whom no one prosecuted and punished for sedition even in those days when the Congress was regarded by many officials as a seditious body and had not been honoured with receptions by Viceroy and enemies from provincial satraps. To day there are scores of papers conducted by men of other communities which use the same arguments and clothe them in language no less forcible which no official has yet had the courage to warn. We do not mean to cast any aspersions on the numerous Bengalee papers when we say that they subject official policies, measures and acts to a merciless fire of daily criticism, and yet altogether escape the attentions of officials clothed with the same authority as Mr. Tollinton. Are we then to understand that Government have come to recognise that they would be putting their hand into a hornets' nest if they worried the journalists of non-Muslim communities, and that the Local Government of Bengal is not made of as stern a stuff as the Local Government of the Punjab?

It may be that here and there language has been used by the Zamindar which is likely to inflame the passions of immature people. But no grievance can be clothed in language which is absolutely safe in the case of all such persons. The grievance is generally addressed to Government, but is overheard by the people. Every grievance must provoke dissatisfaction, and he who airs the grievance must use language sufficiently forcible to create the necessary amount of dissatisfaction. We have no doubt that the most well-meaning complaint is occasionally the cause of creating even disaffection against Government in people of a certain temperament. Take, for instance, the recently published opinion of Mr. Justice Beaman of the Bombay High Court in the matter of admitting confessions as evidence. Government have not acted on Mr. Beaman's advice, and it is quite possible that this may have led some people to entertain hatred against a Government that does not adopt what they consider, probably with Mr. Beaman, to be the only effective preventive of torture. But can Mr. Justice Beaman be reasonably saddled with the responsibility for inflaming the minds of such people? No more can we fasten on the Zamindar the guilt of inflaming the people against Government when the obvious desire of the paper seems to be reform in the directions which it suggests, and when we find everywhere expressions of good-will towards Government and acknowledgements of its essential beneficence.

And that the warning amounts to is that the articles in question have not been written as M. Tollinton, or rather as Sir Michael O'Dwyer would have written them had he been the editor of the Zamindar. This is precisely our complaint also. The editor of the Comrade would, we have no doubt, have also written them differently. But then the editor of the Zamindar can extend this argument, and take the battle into the enemy's own quarter. He may think that he could conduct the Comrade better than we do, and that he could administer the Punjab with less reliance on such tyrannical devices as the Press Act than Sir Michael O'Dwyer. On the whole, therefore, it would be just as well for all of us to keep in our proper stations, and not punish bad logic, bad rhetoric and bad taste in newspapers as high treason. These are no doubt grave defects in newspapers, but they can well be left to the competition of other newspapers that have better logic, better rhetoric and better taste. What is happening now is that a Lieutenant-Governor is stepping down from a high pedestal in order to show the way to a peccant journalist how he should conduct his paper, forgetful of the fact that some day a peccant journalist may also be tempted to make a bid for the vacant pedestal and teach some Lieutenant-Governor how to subordinate personal pique and personal caprice to the good of the country placed under his charge and the demands of a law to which Lieutenant-Governors and journalists are alike subject. To cut a long story short, if the recent warning to the Zamindar is not a special favour reserved for our contemporary, but an indication of the Panjab Government's attitude towards all independent journals, then Sir Michael O'Dwyer had better hold a Durbar and ask all independent journalists to shut up shop and organise a corps of volunteers on the lines of Sir Edward Carson wherewith to seek the repeal of the Press Act. He will certainly not kill anarchy in the Panjab with such tactics. He may, however, create it.

The Government of India rushed through their arduous labours of the Legislative Session before the end of March and with commendable haste the Hon. Members shook the dust of Delhi off their feet. They sped in various directions to recover their equanimity and self-assurance by breathing the freer air after it had been somewhat seriously ruffled by the deluge of non-official oratory in the Legislative Council. A long itinerary would seem to provide a sort of mental and physical bath to the perturbed and jaded Executive Councillor before he goes up to the Olympic heights at Simla. Immediately after the Government of India left Delhi to recuperate, various political and social bodies, conferences, associations and anjumans in the country entered on a spell of strenuous activity. The month of April has witnessed quite a carnival of public meetings and organised efforts of sects, communities, provincial and district political associations to take stock of their respective positions, redeliver their messages, and rekindle enthusiasm amongst their followers to march with snarer steps under their banners. There were the Provincial Conferences in the United Provinces, Behar, Bombay and Bengal, which maintained in every way the reputations of their predecessors. There were the Jain Conference and the Rajput Conference, and the Sikh Educational Conference, which saw no future for the Panjab unless Panjabis were adopted as the medium of instruction as well as the language of the courts. There was the Panjab Hindu Sabha, which even in its sixth year of birth does not seem to have got over its task of defining Hinduism. These Conferences and Sabhas are on the whole a reassuring sign of the times, and though some of them lack the sense of proportion and show tendencies of extreme sectarian bias, genuine efforts for self-improvement within the limits of sects and communities will eventually contribute to the general advance of the country.

The number of annual meetings and conferences during the last month relating to different sections of the Moslem community has been considerable. Prominent amongst these were the Bengal Presidency Moslem Educational Conference and the Bengal Presidency Moslem League, which held their annual sessions at Dacca. The Hon. Nawab Syed Nawab Ali Chaudhry, who presided at the Educational Conference, delivered an eloquent address in which he dealt with the educational needs of the Bengal Moslems. He described at length the situation of the community in regard to modern education and traced the historical and general causes that are responsible for its backward condition. The Mussalmans did not take early to Western education because the loss of their political power and prestige had paralysed their energies and they clung all the more tenaciously to their ancient culture and modes of thought. But now that the earlier feelings of alarm and suspicion have passed away other causes have sprung up to handicap them in the race. The Moslem community in Bengal is generally poor. The system of education now in vogue in the province has naturally become more and more adapted to the requirements of the dominant and progressive Hindu community and takes little account of the social, religious and intellectual needs of the Mussalmans. The latter have got to make up an immense lee-way, and their success depends in a considerable measure on their own exertions. But the responsibility of the Government is also great in the matter. The Mussalmans do not plead for privileges and favours at the expense of the Hindu community. They only want an equality of opportunity. Unless Government help to create special facilities for the growth of Moslem education no such equality of opportunity can be attained. The Hon. Nawab Syed Nawab Ali Chaudhry has indicated the various directions in which Government help is needed in all the branches of Moslem education. We trust his appeal for co-operation and assistance will not be in vain. Government owes this to the Moslem community of Bengal whose educational prospects have been so materially marred by the sudden annulment of the partition.

The address of the Hon. Mr. A. K. Fazl-ul-Haq, who presided at the Dacca Session of the Bengal Moslem League, is a straightforward and brilliant performance. He states the standpoint of the Moslem community in regard to various public questions with admirable precision and subjects some acts of the Government and a few aspects of its policy to a searching criticism. His views on the creation of the Presidency of Bengal and its effect on the position of the Moslem community are shared by the Mussalmans throughout the country. When the province of Eastern Bengal and Assam has been wiped out without the least regard for the interests and sentiments of the Moslem community, it is only natural that some efforts should be made by Government to guarantee for the Mussalmans some of the advantages of which they have been summarily deprived. He pleads for justice, for a fair recognition of the difficulties of the Mussalmans and of the duty of Government to afford them all legitimate help. His remarks on the Press Act and on Hindu-Moslem relations are worthy of note. We will particularly commend his observations in regard to mosques and other sacred places of Mussalmans to the notice of the Government for they sum up the attitude of the entire Moslem community in India in regard to this delicate and supremely important matter. The Statesman roundly declares the straight and sincere talk of the Hon. Mr. Fazl-ul-Haq as magnificent. We do not know if it is mischievous to give a timely warning to Government about the consequences of measures which are likely to stir up deep religious feeling. No sane Mussalman has ever objected to public improvements, but he can not certainly be expected to welcome such improvements at the expense of his religious sentiment.

The fourth anniversary of the Anjuman-i-Taraqqi-i-Talim, Amritsar, was celebrated on 25th and 26th April under the presidency of Shahi Suleman Qari, the well known preacher and lecturer. There was a large audience, many gentlemen from Delhi, Multan, Lahore and other places were also present. In the first sitting the President read his address dwelling on the need of the moral and educational elevation of the Mohamedan community.

After this the Secretary read the annual report giving a detailed account of the services rendered by the Anjuman in the cause of Moslem education during the past 1 years. Forty students were helped in getting higher education and sixty more students to study in different schools and colleges, the outlay being Rs. 900 per month. He also drew attention to the application submitted to the Government by the Anjuman for free and compulsory education, special schools for villages with better arrangement for accommodation, sanitation and with more teachers than one to teach the different subjects and classes. The Secretary also laid great stress upon the necessity of education in the Physical Sciences and urged upon the Mohamedan students to join F. Sc., and B. Sc., classes. He regretted the paucity of Mohamedan students especially in Engineering and Medical schools and colleges and assured the public that the Society will spare no effort in helping those students who especially wish to join such institutions. The assembly unanimously adopted two resolutions—the one expressed the heartfelt gratitude of the Members of the Society especially and the Mohamedans generally, to the Bahawalpur Darbar for the munificent permanent grant of Rs. 1,000 per annum and the other thanked Captain Malik Mubarez Khan for the handsome donation of Rs. 500 yearly for three years.

The fifth Anniversary of the Muslim Kashmiri Conference was held at Sialkot on the 25th and 26th April under the presidency of Nawab Mohamed Azam Khan Sahib, Rais of Dacca, (Bengal.)

The Muslim Kashmiri Conference.

The audience was very large with delegates from every part of the Panjab. The president delivered an instructive address in Urdu, which besides containing useful advice in general touched every topic of peculiar interest to the Kashmiri community of the country. Resolutions pertaining to the education of the Kashmiris in the Panjab and in the Kashmir State in particular, to the introduction of the panchayat system in the community, to their enlistment in the Army, to the removal of restriction under the Land Alienation Act and to other matters of communal import were adopted. About five thousand rupees were subscribed, the president himself contributing no less than about three thousand rupees towards the objects of the Conference.

The Rev. C. F. Andrews, on his return from South Africa, immediately resumed his duties in St. Stephen's College, Delhi. He hopes to stay on in Delhi for the greater part of the time till the University term ends in June. After that he will take up work in Rabindranath Tagore's School in Bolpur, Bengal, where a noble form of national education is being worked out under the port's direction. Mr. Andrews is still troubled owing to an accident which happened to his knee in London and was laid up during the whole time of the voyage. He met the Mohamedan community in Delhi shortly after his arrival and received their welcome back to the city. He hopes still to be able to reside in Delhi for two months in the year doing College work while the Bolpur school has its holidays. During his stay in South Africa Mr. Andrews lived entirely with the Indian Community, both Mussalman and Hindu, in every place he visited. Among his hosts were Mr. Musa and Imam Sahib Bawyer at Durban, Haji Habib at Pretoria and Mr. Gool and Dr. Jool at Capetown. The Mussalman community in each city gave him their warmest welcome, and he bore to them messages which he had received from Indian Mussalmans before leaving India. One of the greatest difficulties which Mr. Andrews had to face during the whole of his visit was the marriage question as it was related to Mussalmans. At present the condition of affairs is utterly deplorable. There can be scarcely said to exist any marriage law at all. Practically no marriages are registered and the greatest possible hardships and sufferings exist concerning wives of Mussalmans who reside in India and wish to rejoin their husbands. It was the refusal to allow a Mussalman lady to land and join her husband which opened up the whole question of marriage validity and made the passive resistance movement necessary. Until the present law is amended Mohamedan's marriage rights are safeguarded by the State itself. The difficulty which Mr. Gandhi had to face was this question of State legitimisation, and Mr. Andrews was able to render him valuable aid in safeguarding Mohamedan interests and preventing any compulsion in matters of religion. He had long interviews with all the leading statesmen on this very question. Mr. Andrews put the Mohamedan point of view clearly before them. In the end, proposals were put forward which would result in the law of South Africa being practically equivalent to that already existing in England, viz.:—the full State recognition of one marriage, combined with no interference from the State if religious marriages take place beyond that number. Mr. Andrews quoted the verse of the Quran Sharif "Let there be no compulsion in religion" with great effect, and his opinion on this question was listened to with much attention. There is a considerable hope that this matter, which has been such a long standing and grievous trouble in the past, will now be amicably settled.

Charitable Endowments.

WHILE welcoming those who had responded to the invitation of Government for a conference on charitable endowments, the Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock defined the scope of the conference. It was only convened to secure an interchange of views, and although they may find many points of agreement, it was not the Hon. Home Member's idea that they should formulate any definite resolutions. All that the Government desired was "a record of the general scope of the various representations."

This was the only thing possible to secure in a conference of 25 official and non-official members who had to discuss a number of most difficult questions relating to charitable endowments within the space of few hours in a single-day-session. But how such a record could be "extremely useful for the future in guiding the Government of India as to the course that it should pursue," is a mystery which only those can disclose who know how to manipulate non-official opinions for official purposes.

The Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock defined the attitude of Government during last sixty or seventy years as a policy of holding itself and its officers aloof from any part in the administration of religious endowments and trust holdings, and of desiring that these should be managed by committees of the community interested, those who are dissatisfied with the management of such endowments and trusts having free access to the ordinary courts of law. Where we believe Government has as constantly erred is in thinking that anybody desires that it, or its officers, should take up the management of religious endowments and trust holdings instead of the managing committees of communities interested therein. As we shall show, it is not in this direction that those dissatisfied with the management of such endowments and trusts have asked for reform. What they have desired is that the "free access to the ordinary courts of law," should be free in reality as well as in name, and that before a public-spirited person or group of persons wend their steps towards the ordinary courts of law they should have free access to materials on the basis of which alone the ordinary courts of law could accord to them a hearing.

Sir Reginald Craddock included among the persons most deeply interested in this matter (1) the general educated public who disliked the idea that it should be possible for trusts of this kind to be abused without adequate check; (2) the general body of beneficiaries; and (3) those who are connected with the management and administration of the trusts. The interest which each of these classes took in the matter was described in the following words:—

The first class as a class are, of course, not personally interested, except, that as enlightened citizens they dislike to see what they regard as a scandal going on unchecked. The second class, as a class, are deeply interested, but they may be so backward and so lacking in cohesion that even if they have any views they are not likely to take concerted action. The third class, when most conscientious and honest, genuinely dislike the interference and trouble which legislation for their further control might cause them, while those among them that are dishonest or grossly negligent, naturally do not want light to be thrown on their doings.

After this Sir Reginald Craddock summed up the general aim to which all efforts at legislation have been directed in the following manner:—

- (1) That the persons or committees managing such trusts and charities should be suitable persons.
- (2) That the procedure for determining their suitability and replacing them, if necessary, should be simplified.
- (3) That, in order to simplify this the rendering of accounts and the audit of such accounts should be made obligatory, and thus
- (4) Persons wishing to impugn, by a suit, the managements of such trust and the fitness of the managers should have at hand materials on which to base their suit.

With a view to attain these objects Dr. Rashbehari Ghose had brought in a Private Bill in the Imperial Council and Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoolla in the Bombay Council, the outlines of which we have already given, while Mr. Seshagiri Iyer and Mr. Govinda Raghava Iyer had brought in a Bill in the Madras Council which was designed to deal with religious trusts by amending Act XX of 1863.

The Hon. the Home Member said he could sympathise fully with the authors of these bills at the delay which had occurred in respect to their proposals, but he said he could assure them that it had been unavoidable, for, "as the" whole history of the controversy shows, the subject is too important to allow anything but the most deliberate consideration." And it was with this important admission that the Home Member commenced that hurried interchange of views on the 16th of March which is to assist Government in formulating another policy and adhering to it for the next sixty or seventy years in spite of the protests of the educated public.

Obviously it is impossible for us to know what transpired at the conference; but we understand that, as promised by Sir Reginald Craddock, the Hon. the Home Secretary commenced the discussion on each of the main heads, which had been confidentially circulated a few days in advance of the conference among the members, "with such observations as his careful study of the history of the subject prompted him to make," that the members proved patient listeners and that, like a row of schoolboys, they repeated, each in his turn, all they knew when called upon by the Schoolmaster-President.

With remarkable industry and promptitude the Home Department assimilated all that the members of the conference had said on the previous day and condensed and catalogued it in the form of a Press Communiqué on the 17th of March. This Communiqué announced that 17 non-official gentlemen (of whom 8 were Hindus, 7 Mohammedans, 1 of the Sikh community and 1 for Burma) and 8 official members had accepted the invitation of the Government of India. The first question to be discussed was the general issue whether the time had now come to reconsider the attitude of opposition which had generally hitherto been adopted by the Government of India towards any proposal to amend the Act of 1863. With regard to this, we are informed that a majority of those present were of opinion that alterations of the existing law were required. We are indeed surprised to find that even on this general issue unanimity should have been absent, specially when the majority made it clear that the alterations of the existing law were required, not with the intention of restoring the direct executive control of Government over the management of these endowments, but in order that the administration of their funds might be safeguarded from abuse.

On the second question, whether the legislation should continue to be uniform for India as a whole, it is stated that opinion was about equally divided. We are told that certain members, in recognition of the fact that the public opinion, and, indeed, practical needs of change varied in different provinces, would allow the provincial legislature to deal with the subject as it thought fit. Others were disposed to hold that the main lines within which greater control should be exercised should be laid down in one Imperial Act, which might be extended to any province at option, supplemented possibly by rules of local application only. For our own part, we fail to see which province of India is so much more advanced than others in these matters that a general Imperial Act would not suffice for all general purposes, nor are we satisfied that any province is so much less advanced than others that it could not keep pace with sister provinces in a very modest forward march. There may be local needs which vary, but such variation was peculiar to localities and institutions rather than to provinces, and we can well understand the necessity of supplementing an Imperial Act by rules of local application only. We can, however, understand equally well the possible tactical necessity of dealing with the matter through provincial legislatures, because provincial satraps differ among themselves in the pace of progress, and some could be induced to go full steam ahead when others are still hesitating about weighing anchor. The speed of the fleet is the speed of the slowest boat, and we can well believe that the Government of India is unable to steam ahead on account of the slowness of some provincial vessels which keep back the faster units of the Imperial fleet. This was exemplified in the case of Bombay in this very matter, and we dare say other Local Governments are equally ready to move forward if the Government of India give the signal.

The third question that was discussed at the conference was whether secular trusts should be treated differently from religious trusts. We are glad to note that the majority recognised that it would be impracticable to differentiate between the two classes of trusts. When the Hon. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoollah introduced his bill into the Bombay Legislative Council, we had pointed out that he had not specified any reasons for the belief that "it is not considered desirable to apply the provisions of this (Sir Ibrahim's) bill to charities of an exclusively religious character," and we had hazarded the conjecture that he had "learnt wisdom from the eyes of the wolf," and desired to court the least resistance of the Government and its hugbear, the furious theologian. Since writing that it has been amply proved that the Government is in much less terror of the furious theologian and of the cry "Religion in Danger," than it had made itself out to be. Moreover, as the majority of the conference explained, it is not possible in many instances to classify the purposes of a trust under the two heads, secular and religious. The obvious solution is that all charitable endowments must be treated uniformly. As a matter of fact as the origin of the institution shows, all Islamic Waqfs are religious, and only last year Government passed a declaratory Act on the subject of Waqf-ala-l-Anlad recognising the paramountcy of religion even in the matter of comparatively more secular Waqfs. We feel certain Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoollah himself would be willing to extend the safeguards provided in his Bill to all Waqfs if the Government themselves are not afraid of supporting the demand of educated Muslim opinion.

The main question, however, related to the publication of accounts in order to afford to the public information as to the extent and the method of management of these endowments. The Government Communiqué states that "there was a general feeling in favour of such a step," and we may take it that no dissentient voice was raised. This is very satisfactory, and we hope Government have put a proper valuation on this unanimity. We do not know whether the members of the conference included those who are connected with the management and administration of trusts; but it could hardly have been a representative conference if this, the third class in Sir Reginald Craddock list of persons most deeply interested in the matter, had been totally excluded. Presuming, therefore, that this class was represented, and that its representatives in the conference were, in the words of the Home Member, "most conscientious and honest," we may also safely presume that expression was given in the course of the discussion to "a genuine dislike of the interference and trouble which legislation for their further control might cause them." If even then there was a general feeling in favour of the publication of audited accounts, Government have a clear mandate from all persons deeply interested in this matter to legislate accordingly.

The Press Communiqué goes on to state that the view found expression that audit was attended with difficulties which might render it inexpedient, and opinion differed as to matters of detail, such as the imposition of this liability on all trusts or only on those above a specified value; the authority to appoint the auditors; whether this should be judicial or executive; the qualifications of auditors and the duties to be imposed upon them (i.e., whether those should extend to administrative audit or be confined to verification of such accounts as might be produced) very considerably. The details are of no little importance, for in some instances they go to the very root of the matter. But as any one could have foretold, they could not have been adequately discussed and settled in a single sitting. In fact, these are matters which require more extended consideration and the assistance and the discussions of more than a couple of dozen official and non-official members. A Royal Commission would have been the most satisfactory machinery for the purpose; but if for some reasons Government could not see their way to recommend one, they could have at least appointed an All-India Committee to go round and take evidence. This suggestion is not too late even now, and we submit it for the consideration of Government. We would here only venture to suggest that a mere verification of such accounts as might be produced by the managers of trusts would not be an adequate and effective safeguard. Committees composed of the members of the community to which the trusts may belong, elected by people themselves, should be appointed in every locality for the purpose of administrative audit.

We are informed that as regards the term of office of members of committees appointed under the Act of 1863, the general view was in favour of a five years' term. We hope the Trustees of the Aligarh College will note this. A life tenure must in many instances mean indolence, indifference and stagnation. If private endowments require the periodical election of trustees for their efficient management, how much more necessary it must be in the case of the greatest national endowment of Indian Mussalmans!

As regards the facilities now afforded to the public interested to move the courts to take action in cases of mismanagement, some desire was expressed that these should be increased, possibly by special concessions in the matter of court-fees and cost. It must be remembered that the late Sir John Jenkins had complained in 1911 that "practically no attempt has been made to utilize the remedies which the law already provides by invoking the powers which the courts possess to enforce the proper administration of such endowments." We recognise that special concessions in the matter of court-fees and costs would afford greater facilities to the public interested; but the chief difficulty in this matter is not connected with court-fees and costs.

The fact is that the public does not know where and what the endowments are. In 1910, the Times of India published a leading article on the subject of Muslim Endowments in the course of which our contemporary said: "There are gold mines under our very feet, but before digging them up the Mussalmans have to do not a little prospecting." Writing apropos of this, we said in one of our earliest issues, that we know of a case in Rander, the rich Muslim suburb of Surat, in which a philanthropic Muslim trader of Mauritius and Rangoon had left a third of his property to public charity for the benefit of his co-religionists. For nearly ten years the Bombay Secretariat and the district authorities of Surat were ignorant of a public bequest which was believed to amount to 33 lakhs. Few people in Surat itself knew of it, and even in Rander only the haziest notions prevailed as to the character and the extent of the bequest and the persons who were appointed trustees. Need we say more than this that even Lord Sydenham was unable, through being unaware of the existence of such a gold mine so near Bombay, to successfully persuade the trustees of the Bots Endowment to contribute liberally for the education of the Mussalman boys and girls of Gujrat. What is required is a survey of all such endowments, the preparation and maintenance as a public record of a statement giving (a) the trust property (b) the terms and conditions of the trust (c) a schedule of annual receipts and disbursements (d) the beneficiaries under the investment of trust, and, particularly, institutions of a public nature maintained out of trust funds (e) the names of the trustees (f) the period of their tenure of office (g) the method of appointing their successors and (h) such other particulars as the peculiar character of the trust may suggest. If these data were made available, the beneficiaries could be made to know their rights, and have ready at hand materials wherewith to approach the ordinary courts of law whenever there was any reasonable ground for suspecting mismanagement.

This could be effected only by compelling all trustees to have their trust duly registered within a fixed time, after which it should be declared penal for a trustee to deal with the funds of a trust unless it had been previously registered.

It is true that there are many important trusts already well-known to the public the affairs of which are not particularly well-managed, and that even in their cases the public has not availed itself of facilities already afforded for invoking the powers which the law courts possess to enforce their proper administration. But we contend that even in these cases a public-spirited individual or a group of individuals cannot ascertain the data on which to base their invocation of the powers of the courts without undergoing an excessive amount of odium and inconvenience. Contrast the difficulties of the present with the ease and convenience of the future if a survey such as we have suggested has been carried out, when anybody could go to the Collector's or the Judge's office and on payment of a small fee could inspect the full record of an endowment in which he happened to be interested, and for a little additional fee could obtain a certified copy of the record. With this in his possession he could examine the affairs of the trust, and if his suspicions were confirmed by such an examination he could confidently invoke the power of the courts to enforce better management. Even this would require no little public spirit; but it is too much to expect at any time, and certainly in the present conditions, that anybody, or even any committee or association, would undertake the odium, worry, trouble and expense of ascertaining all the particulars that we have enumerated and would thereafter undertake the further odium, worry, trouble and expense of a law-suit to enforce a better administration of a trust. This is not Government interference in religious matters, and we are sure our own record is not such as to lead Government to suspect that we could recommend to them a policy of active intervention in religious matters. As we wrote three years ago, Government are not asked to depart from their policy of non-interference in religious matters followed with praiseworthy consistency since 1863, but only to deviate into a consistency in mundane affairs as well. A man who forgets the inconvenient distinction between meum and tuum and pilfers another to the extent of a few pice is sure to be held up by the Police, the Magistracy, and the Jail authorities. But another who robs the dead as well as the living of thousands and lakhs in spite of his fiduciary position is not to be interfered with by the Government, nor allowed to be watched by the beneficiaries interested in his aptitude and honesty. If this is consistency, may we not pray to the Lord to be delivered from it through the wayward agency of our legislatures?

Young India.

One would give anything to know of a grown-up person who has not found himself wishing at one time or another that he could live his boyhood over again. That wonderful and divine experience is at once the illumination and the quest of humanity. It treasures up feelings that were full blooded and were not sicklied over by the pale cast of thought, sorrows that were real and whole, hopes that were spells of acute physical joys, desires that embraced without the least cowardly spasm of doubt or fear the entire gracious aspects of life and the universe. Mr. Wells has given a delicious picture of the future of humanity, when, cleansed of its ugly imperfections, it would stand as if on a footstool and reach its hands among the stars. This is in fact an exact picture of individual boyhood—a period of life when no sense of imperfection clings to the free and joyous movements of mind and feeling. It is a time of life when the world seems robed in purple, when everything seems alive with meaning or mystery, when even the wooden table and the stool and the pen and the inkpot have their individuality and seem to be endowed with miraculous articulation and gesture. In this populous world of wondrous tones and tints the little chip of humanity disports as a god. He dips into the secrets of creation. Worlds of magic loveliness issue every moment from the alchemy of his heart and brain as if from the Creator's hand. This faculty of creativeness and self-projection is the miracle of boyhood. Only the elect among persons of mature age can retain this faculty unimpaired to the last. It is the supreme vital impulse of a living society. It was to this faculty that Goethe referred when he said that man is in every sense divine, "for he builds worlds."

"Or bidding them no longer be,
"Exerts, enjoys a sense of deity."

The young educated Indian has had his boyhood, full of dreams, of creative wonders. In spite of the subdued anxiety and puzzling elusiveness of his home atmosphere, he has had his time when he held communion with the earth-spirit and looked overhead into vistas of light and glory. His public initiation as a "seeker of knowledge" is quite an event in the family. His own feelings about the ceremony have a vague intensity that is little short of an emotional crisis. The mullah or the guru emerges out of the unknown and the cosmos of the boy is filled with this dread presence. His whole conception of knowledge is tainted by his early experience under the iron rod of this remorseless pedagogue. The maktab or the patshala becomes to him a living purgatory, learning becomes a dire penance and the teacher oppresses his imagination as a nightmare for years. From the maktab or the patshala to the public school there is a whole change of atmosphere, but the boy enters it with a lump in his throat. He has tasted of the "fruit" of knowledge and has already made up the attitude with which he goes through his subsequent schooling. It is an attitude of mute protest against a scheme of life that should condemn him for the best part of day to sit with overstrung nerves through a dreary and hateful counting of incomprehensible symbols and rules of thumb and shiver to the very roots of his hair as a scowling face turns on him or a rasping voice dings horrors into his ears. In the public school, however, some relaxation of the nerve is possible. The drastic methods of the maktab pedagogue, who regards purging the boy of all his playfulness and mirth as the main end of education, are not generally used by his modern prototype in the public school. But the atmosphere of the public school is frigid and its tone is harsh and impersonal. The mullah and the guru are the tyrants of the old schools of intellectual and moral discipline, yet they put their whole heart into their work, and their pupils are also their disciples. The boys dread them and yet respect them genuinely and find themselves related to them by many human links. The school-master is a wholly different being. He is a creature of a system that is run mainly on commercial lines. His profession is a mere bread-winning device to him and not a vocation. He is generally concerned with getting the boys under his charge through "a course of instruction" within a definite period of time, and his whole duty ends when he has secured the largest percentage of "passes" within his Division at the annual examination. At his best he is a smooth machine that is generally successful in standardising the mind.

The boy, during his ten years of education at a public school, learns little that is useful. He has some strange facts and ideas stuffed into his memory and acquires some mechanical skill in the manipulation of figures. But he gets little intellectual training and discipline and, in spite of the moral text-book, his moral perceptions are usually dim. His character at its most critical stage receives no help and guidance and is subject to a variety of chance-influences in the process of formation. Some race instinct or religious injunction or even a superstitious admonition that had gone deep into his soul while yet a mere child, leaps out of his sub-conscious regions when he is face to face with a moral crisis and guides his conduct. The teaching of the school has no relation to his home life. It has no relation to the life of the street and the market place. It does not fit in with the conceptions of joy, happiness, social purpose and duty that his own individual experience is evolving in his mind. Before he has finished his school course he becomes vaguely conscious of the duality of his inner life. His parents and the general people around him are living their lives and thinking their thoughts, and their hopes and fears, their joys and griefs, their pursuits and occupations, their dealings with one another and the ways of their common intercourse in daily life give him one measure of social life and individual destiny. The secular spirit of the West that glimmers upon his sense through the obscurity of the school instruction and the text-book suggests an entirely different scheme of values and relations. The culture, social institutions and the beliefs of his forefathers claim his devotion and he is infinitely relieved if he can give them his unquestioning loyalty. The new gods of the West utter strange oracles from afar, and he held in trance by the glamour and prestige of novelty. The young mind abhors philosophical doubt and neutral grounds, and can never do without lusty faith and downright conviction. In spite of his many puzzles the boy hastens to strike an emphatic attitude in relation to the enormous questions that the Indian society has got to solve. It is at this stage, that is, a year or two before the young prodigy matriculates and passes on to the college, that some aspects of the general controversy and deep struggle of thought of Young India are impressed on his mind. He perceives for the first time, however dimly, the vast burden of his race. He becomes conscious of the social, political and other problems of his country. The whole tangle is far beyond his mental grasp, yet he begins to see some aspects of the tangle and hears distinctly the shouts of men engaged in straightening it up. The cries and catchwords of the press and the platform attract him and he begins to take sides in the momentous controversy which is still going on about the destiny of the Indian people.

The boy feels the pulse of change and sees the new spirit that moves over the surface of the waters. The school teaching does not help him much in realising the significance of what he sees and feels. The vast literature of controversy, the newspapers, the general talk and discussion around him give him some clue to the thoughts and riddles that inflict the mind of Young India. He takes a mental vow and is initiated into the service of his creed, community or country. The patriotic feeling is born in his breast and for the first time after his childhood he feels the richness and luxury of being. The magnitude of the task does not appal him, for he has a very hazy conception of it. With the simple vitality of his faith he sets out to plan a new heaven and a new earth. His patriotism is mostly communal in its origin. If he is a Hindu he seeks inspiration from the vision of Bharat that is revealed to him through his religious lore and literature and round which cling the tenderest associations and the aroma of fine deeds and noble idealism of a great and gifted race. If he is a Mussalman he glories in the achievements of his ancestors in all parts of the world—in art, literature, commerce and empire. His visions of the past fill his dreams about the future. Patriotic poems touch him to the core—he learns them by heart and they form the deep music of his soul. He can sing them well and his "recitations" at the communal gatherings win him the plaudits of the "potent, grave and reverend signors" of the community, and his face is flushed with excitement and incommunicable joy for a week. He begins to talk earnestly of social reform and of what he would do when he comes to take an active and responsible part in social life. In the meantime he holds forth amongst his fellows, and in every company in which he finds himself, on the folly and wickedness of the ways of men and their social institutions. The old men shake their heads at the young dreamer's vigour and zest and his reforming zeal. He takes delight in scandalising the women of his family by telling them half-a-dozen times every day what he thinks of the purdah, and of woman's existing status and how he would revolutionise the whole scheme of things. In religious matters he is often for "reform", and he measures his own talent and capacity by the extent to which he can rouse the ire of the school maulvi or the pandit by riddling him with heresies. The Arabic, Persian and Sanskrit classes in the secondary school are in fact small, young, debating religious societies, with the maulvi and the pandit as their permanent chairmen. The battles of Young India against obscurantism and the dark hosts of superstition and stereotyped dogma begin in the school room, and begin with all the heat and energy of boyhood. The maulvi is the symbol of the past with its fixed standard, and settled polity. The young boy bears in him the spark of the new illumination and is the promise of the future. The maulvi is a kindly, indulgent and easy-going man with a taste for puns and witty anecdotes. In controversial duels he often feels his ground slipping from beneath his feet, but he recovers his balance by shrewdly running off at a tangent and silencing the young enthusiast by a long and pointless tale. The maulvi has his idiosyncracies and his freaks and they furnish an inexhaustible fund for witty and irreverent gossip to the young iconoclast. He is rapidly disappearing from his place in the school and his new successor from the normal school and the training college is hardly an improvement upon the old type. The maulvi, in spite of his inefficiency and imperfections, has retained a distinct corner in the hearts of his pupils and in many cases has helped to lit a torch that has burned with steady flame to the last.

The young boy is deep in the splendours of his dreams when he matriculates and prepares to go to the college. His visions are fresh and inspiring; he has faith in his powers; he is unshakable in the strength of his patriotism; he is, in short, sure of his ground. The college draws him like a magnet and he goes with a heart full of rich emotion. He hopes he would find there the key to his riddle and an enormous accession of strength and faculty to recreate the world. His illusions are his stars and he walks in their light, secure from the dark shadows that have descended on the paths of older men. The college life of the young Indian is the most important phase of his career. He begins the spring-tide of his romance. He reaches out his hands to the core of things. He finds some degree of self-expression. But the process of disillusionment soon sets in and the lights of his early heaven drop out star by star.

The Aligarh Old Boys' Dinner.

The following speech was made by Mr. Ross Masud at the Aligarh Old Boys' Dinner while proposing the toast of the College:—

Mr. President and Gentlemen,—(Of all the duties that fall to one's lot there is none which is more pleasant than that of proposing the toast of one's Alma Mater on an occasion such as the one which has brought us together to-night. Whichever side I turn my eyes, I see the faces of old and dearly loved friends and I begin to wonder whether all the long years of separation have been a myth or not. I wonder how many of us realise the fact that gatherings of this kind help to keep one young. The very walls of our Alma Mater resound with a welcome and the atmosphere they exhale and in which they envelope him who has lived there before, takes that man's mind back to the days of his youth and so strong and magical is its power that as long as he stays within the four walls of his Alma Mater he no longer feels himself the old and careworn individual that he is in the world outside.

I also wonder how many of us have recognised the debt we owe to the institution where we have received our education and where we have spent the happiest time of our lives. Throughout our lives this college of ours is our haven of refuge, and from the storm and stress through which one has to pass in this world we turn to it as one would to his mother for peace and solace of mind. And remember if there be any Old Boy who does not rejoice when visiting this institution and who does not look upon it with the affection he would bestow upon his home, then I say that man is not the true son of this college and, miserable, indeed, is his lot. When we are sore beset with temptations and when we are faced with what seem insurmountable obstacles in our struggle for existence, it is the memory of having belonged to a worthy institution with noble traditions that comes to our help, and these traditions form our shield when we battle with all that is low and mean in this world. The feeling that one belongs to a corporate body of men and the reversed sense that one carries on one's shoulders, the honour of one's Alma Mater, are things which give stimulus to a man's soul and courage to his heart and thus help him to crush the temptations and overcome the obstacles that he finds in his way. Thus the debt we owe to our Alma Mater can never be repaid.

You must remember that in this world of ours every bond that helps to keep human beings together, and everything that engenders a spirit of kindness and fellow-feeling, are sacred. And I ask you, is there any bond which can unite men of various temperaments and nationalities more firmly together than the bond of having belonged to the same Alma Mater? There is one thing upon which I should very much like to lay emphasis to-night, and that is that each and every true son of this college should do his best to annihilate all those forces that tend to weaken this bond of union and that are prone to create a spirit of schism amongst the alumni of this institution. Let all of us—those who have already issued forth from the dearly loved portals of this College, and those who are to leave them soon—be firmly united in the common and noble endeavour of improving the social and the intellectual condition of our community, by crushing all that is evil and by creating all that is good and consequently great. Let it never be said of the students of this College that they have helped to increase evil in this world and that they have brought into it not union but disunion. Our aim should be to unite the friend and the foe, and not to disunite friends. It is thus and only thus that we who pride ourselves on being the sons of this institution can ever hope to do any good to our community and to the land to which we have the honour to belong. Frankness, truth, courage and self-sacrifice should be the motto of those who have been educated here.

Speaking as I do on behalf of the Old Boys, to whom I have the honour to belong, I should like to tell you who are the present students of our College that we expect great things from you. Not only are we, but also the eyes of your community are watching you most anxiously, for all its hopes rest on you. You have yet to pass through a great ordeal—the ordeal of life; you have yet to be tossed on the ocean of worldly strife, you have yet to face manifold temptations, and we who are your elder brothers are anxious to see how you behave in the world that lies beyond the walls of this College. And let me tell you why we, Old Boys, expect great things from you. It is because you have had better chances than we had, it is because you began your student life at a time when education was the cry of your community, it is because you have had better opportunities of comparing things than we had, and, last of all, it is because you are receiving your education at a time when your native land—the land of Hindustan—can no longer be called a country that lives in its past, a country that is asleep. You who are destined to play a very important role in the history of your country should prepare yourselves earnestly and carefully for the work that awaits you, and I assure you that as long as sincerity and toleration are your watchwords you can never go wrong. We wish you to be the best representatives of the highest intellectual life of your country, and in you who are our younger brothers we wish to see that combination of sound intellect, modesty and toleration of mind which is possessed by those who belong to a community that is healthy, a community full of mental energy.

But before I sit down to-night I should like to say something about a topic which is very dear to me. These annual dinners give us, the Old Boys, the best opportunity of giving you, the present students, any advice which we think might be useful to you. You must remember that you are now on the threshold of professional careers and I request you most earnestly to think carefully before you choose your profession. India is changing rapidly and life here is becoming more complex. A person with an incomplete knowledge of many things can no longer be admired nor can he do any good to his country; the time for specialisation has come and you must follow no idle family traditions or sentimental whim in your choice of a suitable profession. I take it that we all wish to see our community and our motherland great; now it is my firm conviction that that can only be done by our developing to the highest pitch all that is good in us. Each and every healthy inclination of the mind should be encouraged to the highest extent. In other words, what I want you to do is to take your real inclination to be your only guide in choosing a profession.

Gentlemen, I now ask you to charge your glasses. I have the honour to propose the toast of "The Dear Old College and the Trustees who govern our Alma Mater."

*Hindu Immigration to the United States.

THE New York Evening Post says in a rather playful editorial,— "The sciences are booming in Washington. Geography is being written anew by Congressmen who are reconstructing the boundaries of Asia. Astonishing contributions to anthropology are being made by the representatives of the American Federation of Labor, whose scent of racial distinction is nothing short of marvellous. New principles of economics are embodied in bills providing for an international sliding wage-scale test."

This sounds big, but there are facts behind it. The House Committee on Immigration is considering two Bills for excluding Hindus and another which excludes all Asiatic laborers. Note here Armenia is not counted as being in Asia. Various ingenious ways are being suggested to keep out Asiatics out of the country. One of the most novel one is by Commissioner-General of Immigration Caminetti, who says that the best way of excluding Asiatics would be to require all aliens to pass the physical tests required for recruits to the U. S. Army. Perhaps he was thinking of undersized Chinese and Japanese, but he overlooked the fact that that condition would not bar many Hindus, a race of Asiatics he would keep out of the United States at all hazards.

These Immigration Bills for excluding the Hindus are limited only by the Labor Unions and a few Pacific coast citizens. There are only 6,656 Hindus in a country which is about double the size of India. The Philadelphia Public Ledger rightly remarks that "only a Brobdignagian imagination could construe this to mean an invasion in force or a real problem." But the Labor Union men are following in the wake of Canada, South Africa and Australia.

Of these 6,656 Hindus, 300 are students attending the various American Universities. When this Hindu Exclusion Bill goes into law, as it surely will, there will be another obstacle in the way of poorer students who used to come here. Among other things the Bill provides that an intending student to the United States is required to have a letter from his District Officer, a certificate from the principal of the school he last attended, and a letter of recommendation from an American Consul in India guaranteeing that his parents will send him monthly the amount specified by the U. S. Government as enough to get a college education in America. All these are subject to the approval of the Immigration Authorities in the port of entry. On entering the country he will have to register and he must not do any other thing than what he is registered as. So one more chance is gone for Hindu students who used to work their way through school in America. Henceforth it will be only those possessing a long purse, who will be able to come to the American Universities.

To protest against the Hindu Exclusion Bills a deputation was sent conjointly by the Hindustan Association of America, the Pacific coast Khalsa Diwan Society and the Indian Defence League. The members of the deputation interviewed the British Ambassador in Washington and asked him to protest against the exclusion of British subjects from the United States. The ambassador could only reply that he would cable "home" and await instructions. In fact, there is mighty slim hopes of anything being done from that quarter. The House Committee on Immigration gave a four hours hearing to our deputation and said they would consider our point of view. It seems we are fighting a losing fight, but we are fighting it bravely. We are single-handed when public opinion in the mother country itself is voteless. Thus one more mark of the helot is being placed on our brow without a protest from the Power, into whose hands, for a time at least, our destinies are placed.

* The term Hindu is generally used for Indian, to distinguish from Red Indians who are known as Indians too.

Let us note in this connection that the Mussalmans of India have lost one more chance. Everybody is not born with a silver spoon in his mouth. Poor Mussalman students could take advantage of the open-door policy of the United States all these years. But they slept. Now they will have to wait till we develop educational institutions on a par with Europe and America, and that can only be done when the fiscal policy of India is left in our hands.

I will close by stating that some of the democratic papers have been pleading our cause, but, alas they seem to have very little influence on the representatives of a nation "which was conceived in Liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equals." We wonder, if any more American missionaries need to go to India to preach about the "brotherhood of man."

The Indian Press Act.

THE following letter was sent by Mr. Zafar Ali Khan to Mr. Philip Morrel M. P., in appreciation of his efforts to bring about some modification of the Indian Press Act:—

My Dear Sir,—I have received a number of letters from the readers of the Zamindar and other eminent Indian Muslims expressing their grateful appreciation of the interest you have taken in the Press Question and asking me to convey their sincere thanks to you for the efforts you are making to render the lot of the Indian Journalist more tolerable. The obligation imposed upon me is as agreeable as it is sacred and I take this opportunity of thanking you most sincerely on behalf of my countrymen for your sympathetic treatment of their grievances.

As regards the daily Zamindar, my people have lodged an appeal against the decision of the Panjab Government in the Chief Court. It is to be hoped that an early hearing of the appeal will be granted and the judgment pronounced one way or the other before the Session of Parliament is over.

In spite of the interpellations in the House of Commons Magistrates in British India continue to harass the luckless journalists and abuse the practically unlimited powers which the Press Act has vested in them. In February 1910 when the drastic nature of the Press Act in respect of the vast powers it gave to Magistrates to impose prohibitive monetary security, was being discussed in the Viceroy's Council, the Government had observed: "Unless we are to assume that the Magistrate is by design a malevolent creature, we may take it for certain that in ordinary cases he will not ask for more than Rs. 500, the minimum." The assurance of Government has turned out to be illusory, and Magistrates when demanding securities from present or prospective journalists have failed to show that benevolence on which the Government had counted. The latest exhibition of Magisterial eagerness to discourage independent journalism was made at Laypuri, a district in the Panjab, where a Sikh gentleman who intended to start a Press called the "Khalsa Press" for printing a vernacular paper, the Khalsa Akhbar, was mulcted in a security of one thousand rupees. The press and paper were both yet in embryo, the Magistrate could not know whether they were to be used for seditious propaganda or not, and yet he demanded a security of one thousand rupees. If it was necessary to bind down the unfortunate proprietor the minimum security (five hundred rupees) could have been demanded and if the paper had been objectionable the security could have been increased, as that course is open to Magistrates under the Press Act. But to demand a heavy security at the very outset before even the press was started or the first number of the newspaper had appeared, shows the spirit in which the Press Act is being administered. I asked Mr. Seed to explain all this to you and I am glad to learn that you are going to ask a question in the House.

I enclose a copy of an Open Letter to Lord Crewe from my friend Mr. Kamauluddin. It deals with the alarming attitude taken up by the Panjab Government with regard to the suppression of newspapers dealing solely with religious topics. To suppress papers like the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Badr on the plea that they contain "words which have a tendency to bring into contempt a certain class or section of His Majesty's subjects in British India namely Christians," is to use the Press Act for purposes which, to say the least, were never contemplated by its framers. The policy of His Majesty's Government in India has been never to interfere in the religious beliefs and observances of various sections of the Indian community, to whom perfect liberty in matters sacredotal has been guaranteed by law. For upward of half a century Christian Missionaries have been vilifying Islam and Hinduism, with a great deal of vehemence and have in turn been treated by their rivals to rejoinders which though pungent were nevertheless more in keeping with that laws of controversial propriety. Yet Hindus, Muslims and Christians have lived in India side by side in perfect peace and amity, and the Government has had no occasion to remind them that they have been using words which were calculated to breed mutual contempt or hatred. The admirable attitude of the Government in this respect may be summed up in he reply which a Lieutenant Governor of the Panjab gave to a representative Muslim deputation which waited upon him in 1897 with a request that a Missionary publication entitled the "Ummahat-il-Mominin" (the Mothers of the Faithful), should be suppressed on the ground that it was full of the vilest and the most indecent abuse of the Prophet. The Lieutenant Governor replied that he could not accede to the request of the Muslims for the simple reason that to interfere with the freedom of religious opinion was against the established policy of Government. The Muslims felt the refusal very keenly but had to console themselves with the prospect that although they could not as Muslims indulge in ribald abuse of Christian Missionaries, they yet had the right to defend themselves against their attacks in a becoming manner as enjoined by their faith. This satisfaction appears now to have been taken away from them by Sir Michael O' Dwyer's Government, which, in suppressing the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Badr has shown that whereas it is perfectly legitimate for a Christian Missionary to revile the Prophet and denounce Islam in the grossest language, a Muslim paper has no right to defend itself against Missionary attacks even in an appropriate manner. The Rev. Thomas Howell of Lahore publishes a book ("Isbat-i-Kaffara," printed at the Nawal Kishore Press, Lahore, 1913), which may be called the Billingsgate of theology. Its fulminations against Islam are simply disgusting. If the Indian Press Act could by any stretch of imagination be used for the suppression of theological polemics, the book of the Rev. Thomas Howell ought to have been proscribed under it. But the Panjab Government, while deliberately shutting its eyes to the stream of abuse poured from this book over the devoted heads of Muslims, castigates the Ahl-i-Hadees which only published a reply to Howell in a spirit of defence. A translation of the article which formed the basis of the Government order inflicting a security of two thousand rupees upon the proprietor of the Ahl-i-Hadees will be found in the letter above referred to.

The action taken by the Panjab Government against the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Badr the latter having been required to pay a security of three thousand rupees because it discussed the doctrine of the Incarnation from a scientific standpoint—has created the painful impression that the Government is beginning to depart from its time-honoured policy of non-interference with freedom of religious thought. This impression is further intensified by a recent order passed by the Panjab Government to the effect that persons not belonging to agricultural tribes would, on embracing Christianity, be included in that favoured list and would become entitled to small holdings and other privileges enjoyed by agricultural tribes. It is a well known fact that Missionary enterprise in the Panjab as elsewhere has succeeded only where pariahs, or according to the Hindu caste classification, the "untouchables," are concerned. That it is eminently desirable in the general interests of India that this unfortunate section of the Indian community should receive every consideration and have their status elevated, no one will question. But it is the height of bad official taste to convert a non-agricultural class into an agricultural class because it accepts baptism. Instances are not wanting in which the applications of high class Muslims and Hindus to be declared as agricultural classes have been rejected by the Panjab authorities. The inference is obvious and significant. If these applicants, over whom precedence has been given to persons of admittedly non-agricultural antecedents on the score of baptism, had likewise embraced Christianity, the fate of their applications would have been different. People are beginning to ask whether Government is going to assume the role of Missionaries. A member of the Panjab Legislative Council is going to ask a question in the Council in connection with the Government order, above alluded to.

I trust that the promise you have obtained from the Secretary of State to place on the table all the proceedings taken against Indian newspapers under the Press Act, will be fulfilled in due course. But I would particularly invite your attention to the cases of the Ahl-i-Hadees and the Badr which have caused much heart-searching in Muslim circles. A question in the House might help in reviving not only these two defunct papers but also the confidence of Muslims in the non-sectarian traditions of Government.

Once more thanking you for your kindness and sympathy.

YOURS VERY TRULY

Zafar Ali Khan,

The Abuses of European Civilization in Islamic Countries.

At a Meeting of the Anglo-Ottoman Society, held at Caxton Hall, London, on April 2nd 1914, the following address was delivered by Mr. O'Donnell of O'Donnell on "The Abuses of European Civilization in Islamic Countries."

The Chair was occupied by Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din, who in introducing the Lecturer said that strong drink was admittedly a curse to humanity—a degradation morally, physically and mentally; but at the same time from the very beginning it had permeated the human social system and every growth and development of civilization. It was very difficult indeed to trace its origin, but as old as the days of the mighty Pharaohs they found on the plains and cities, on the banks of the Nile and its Delta, evidences of the manufacture and commerce in intoxicating liquors. Similar evidences were to be found among the records of the Babylonians, Assyrians, Athenians and the Romans, and also the Jews. For 1900 years the Church of Christ could not see any inconsistency between wine-bibbing and the teachings of Christ; but when the non-Conformist Conscience awakened, they saw the sin in wine-bibbing, and the spirit of strong drink was to-day recognised as poison.

The Lecturer said: Very Reverend Sir, Ladies and Gentlemen: I have been asked by the Anglo-Ottoman Society to deal with this question which is of supreme importance for the peace as well as the hygiene of the East.

The great Teacher of the Mohamedan religion, as the Rev. Chairman had reminded us, had 1300 years ago inculcated doctrines of sobriety upon the warriors of Arabia; and as Moslem dominion extended the dominion of sobriety extended. Wherever you land on the coast of Africa—at any of those seaports frequented by European trade—you now see huge cargoes of Anglo-French Gin coming ashore and being distributed among the merchants of the place. You may be sure it is not under a Moslem banner that this wholesale trade in the degradation of negro races is being carried on.

I have taken as the leading subject of my address what is happening in what is called the French protectorate of Morocco. I intend, besides dealing with this subject, with this branch of the drink question among native races, also to deal with another fearful abuse maintained by the British Government in India. Unless here, in the Capital and centre of the Empire, a healthy feeling is roused which will insist upon the introduction of reforms, we can never expect those reforms to be carried out at vast distances from the Metropolis.

I deal with this question of the abuses under the French Protectorate of Morocco because it was under the protection of Britain that the French flag was hoisted over the independent Sultanate of Morocco. But a few years ago Morocco was an independent Mohamedan kingdom, and if any one—any Christian nation—or nation reputed to be Christian—was to take a leading place in Morocco in the apparent future, England might have looked forward to that position. Yet, for some unknown reason, the British Government itself repressed the enterprise of British nationality in Morocco, and gave up all the superiority Englishmen possessed to their European rivals, and literally placed the sovereignty of Morocco at the disposal of the French Republic.

How is the French Republic fulfilling the obligations which have been committed to its protection? I have here extracts from the Report of the French Senate drawn up by the Senator, M. Hubert, upon the horrible increase in the trade in intoxicating liquors which has occurred in the few years during which the French flag has been hoisted over Morocco. In the French Republic the various classes of drink producers and sellers form a confederacy still more formidable than the Brewers and Distillers whose sacred interests are respected by every British political party. In every constituency the drink interest in France is so powerfully organised that it is practically impossible for any candidate to put up, with any hope of success, who does not do the work the drink sellers want him to do. As a result, Morocco is being opened, shamelessly, to the most foul trade in intoxicants which has ever disgraced our nominal civilization.

In that country there is a systematic plan for creating Colonies of Alcohol Dealers who spread themselves over the conquered land. In this Report of the French Senator there are such examples given as the following:—In the year 1907, in the seaport of Casablanca, which was the first seaport which fell into the hands of the French invasion, there were only five drink shops in the town, and these were notoriously for the custom of the foreign sailors who attended the port. To-day, or rather two years ago, in the year 1912—only five years after the first occupation,—the five drink shops had risen to the enormous number of 161! But there is a more striking and scandalous example of what has been done by this civilized European power in the Moslem land which is under their protectorate. In Fez, itself the Capital of Morocco, the Holy City of the Moors,—in which the virtues commended by the Moslem religion were practised by a fanatical population—in that City of Fez there were in 1912 400 French "citizens" resident in the newly protected City. Of these 400 citizens 300 were sellers of intoxicating drinks! (Shame.) The contagion has gradually spread among the lower classes of the population surrounded by temptation, often badly fed, often underpaid. The Moorish workmen are led by the example of their European taskmasters to take the drink; and I have here the depositions of French Factory owners themselves, who admit that one-third of their Moorish workmen now spend their wages in intoxicating drink. That, very Reverend Sir, is the horrible legacy that a civilized country of Europe has bequeathed to your Moslem people. Now the only justification that the French Republic can give for this state of things—for this inhumanity—the only excuse is, that the drink trade brings in large profits to the French Treasury.

There are other evils of the grossest kind, not only tolerated but permitted and officially organised by the British Government in those districts of the East which have come into the trust of the British nation. We, the Reform party in India, have long been in possession of the proofs that what is called here the "White Slave Trade", that the equivalent of the White Slave Trade, is being carried on in a wholesale manner by the British Government in India, for the demoralisation and detestable pleasure of the British soldiers in India. (Shame.) During the last few days the witnesses upon this subject have been reinforced by the testimony of a British Reformer who commands universal respect, and has deserved the widespread gratitude of all lovers of humanity in this English land. I refer to the distinguished public servant who gave the final stroke to the Belgian tyranny in the Congo, the distinguished Sir Roger Casement. Within the last few days, he has published what was already known to Indian Reformers, the Circular of the General Commanding-in-Chief the British Army in India; and it is enough to quote one paragraph of that official Circular:—"In Bazaars it is necessary to have a sufficient number of women; to take care that they are sufficiently attractive; and to provide them proper homes." That Circular of the Central Authority was already known to us; but Sir Roger Casement has gone beyond the knowledge possessed by the Indian Reformers—he has not only got the Order of the Central Authority, but he has been able to trace the general effect of that order in the orders which have been issued, in conformity with that circular, by the Colonels Commanding the British regiments in Indian provinces, Sir Roger Casement, as an Irishman, has had no hesitation about publishing the abominable Circular which the officer Commanding an Irish regiment—the regiment of the Connaught Rangers—has issued to his subordinates. Writing to the Assistant Quartermaster, the Colonel Commanding directs as follows:—"The Cantonment Magistrate has already on more than one occasion been requested to obtain a number of younger and more attractive women, but with little or no success. He will again be appealed to. The Major General Commanding should invoke the aid of the Local Government by instructing the Cantonment Magistrates, whom they appoint, that they give all possible aid to Commanding Officers in procuring a sufficient number of young, attractive and healthy women."

Since civilisation began was there ever a more infamous document penned than that? Consider the example that England of the Missions gives to all the Moslem and Hindoo East. Consider the use of the Officers and Representatives of Justice—the Cantonment Magistrates themselves—in order to procure the young and attractive victims that are destined by the British Government in India for this infernal degradation. It is for you, Ladies and Gentlemen, each within your sphere to bring the facts, now fully unrolled, before every gathering and every organisation of men and women in this land. If an argument were wanted in order to prove that women must have political power in this country, the argument is afforded by the revelation of the hideous system that is carried on by a Government that is not shared by women.

Now we have here the admission that not only do the Military Authorities use whatever power they possess and whatever influence they possess among the vilest elements of Native society in order to gather this hideous tribute of young and attractive women, but we have also the demand for the infamous co-operation of the Officers and Representatives of Justice, and the Magistrates themselves! "The Cantonment Magistrate has already on more than one occasion been requested to obtain a number of younger and more attractive women." The Court of Justice presided to be the vestibule of the house of ill-fame! Might I ask who is the War Minister? Colonel Seely has resigned. Mr. Asquith is in Fife. I venture to ask him—most respectfully—what sort of gratitude is displayed in return by the British Government to the victims which it has selected for performing this service to the British Crown? Are Medals of the Indian Empire won by these women by their awful campaigns? We have now got the facts. We have now got the evidence of Sir Roger Casement—a name that can stand against any authority; and from this platform of the Anglo-Ottoman Society, which was framed and founded to bring about a better understanding between the English and Moslem races, we demand a wide and sweeping reform which must put an end to this abomination.

Very Reverend Sir, Ladies and Gentlemen,—It is impossible for any word of mine to add to the persuasive force of this hideous circular itself. That is what we see a European State doing in Asia—we see what another European State is doing in Western Africa—and unquestionably the establishment of those innumerable houses of intoxication among the sober populations of Islam is necessarily accompanied by every other vice and degradation.

I will not weary you by dwelling further upon this subject upon this present occasion. I have felt it my duty to lay before you the simple facts; and upon you, and your influence and the influence of this meeting and of those whom you are able to inform and guide, depend the wiping away of this vile blot of European civilization, and the doing at length of common justice to that noble civilisation of Islam, which, continually derided and denounced, is on so many points infinitely superior to the rule of its conquerors. (Loud Applause.)

At the conclusion of a general discussion of the subjects dealt with in the address, which then ensued, the following Resolution, proposed by Mr. Arthur Field (Hon. Secretary of the Society) seconded by Mr. Blake, was unanimously adopted, viz:—

"That a letter be addressed to Sir Edward Grey calling his attention to the abuses introduced by the French Protectorate in Morocco in spreading the trade in intoxicating drinks among a Moslem population."

A resolution of warm thanks was moved by Mr. O'Donnell to the very Reverend Chairman Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din, and to his distinguished colleague, the Very Reverend Imam Qazi Haireddin Islamic Chaplain to the Ottoman Embassy. The resolution of thanks was carried unanimously by acclamation.

Mr. Arnold's Appeal Dismissed. Judgment of the Privy Council.

THE LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

THE judicial Committee of the Privy Council, at which there were present yesterday Lord Shaw, Lord Moulton, Sir John Edge, and Mr. Ameer Ali, dismissed the appeal of Mr. Channing Arnold, the editor and proprietor of the Burma Critic, from a conviction of defamation and a sentence of one year's imprisonment by the Chief Court of Lower Burma. The proceedings were taken under the Indian Penal Code by a district magistrate, who alleged that Mr. Arnold defamed him in two articles headed "A Mockery of British Justice."

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Mr. D. A. Wilson, and Mr. A. Page appeared for the appellant; Sir Eile Richards, K.C., and Mr. A. M. Dunne for the respondent.

The arguments were recently heard before a Board composed of Lord Shaw, Lord Sumner, Lord Parmoor, Sir John Edge, and Mr. Ameer Ali, when judgment was reserved.

JUDGMENT.

Lord Shaw, now in delivering their Lordships' judgment said that the appellant was charged with having defamed Mr. G. P. Andrew, Deputy Commissioner and District Magistrate, of Mergui, by the publication of two articles in the Burma Critic, on April 28, 1912, entitled "A Mockery of British Justice. Mr. Arnold had had experience as a journalist, and he was at one time the chief editor of the Bangkok Times. He ceased to be editor in the end of September 1911, and in January, 1912, he was registered as one of the proprietors and the editor of the Burma Critic. The proceedings against him were initiated June 11, 1912, by Mr. Andrew. On October 3, 1912, the trial began before Sir Charles Fox, the Chief Judge, with a jury. It lasted from October 3 to the 19th when the jury returned a unanimous verdict of Guilty, and a sentence of one year's simple imprisonment was pronounced. After undergoing four months' imprisonment, the remainder of the sentence was remitted.

Their Lordships listened to a long argument in support of this appeal, during which the entire history of three stages of proceedings was discussed. These were, first, the details of the conduct of McCormick, a planter, who was charged with having abducted a Malay girl of about 11 years of age; secondly, the conduct and proceedings of Mr. Andrew as District Magistrate at the investigation conducted before him into this charge and which ended in his declining to commit McCormick for trial; and thirdly, the proceedings at the trial in the present case.

It was important to see what were the provisions of the Penal Code which applied to the case. "Whoever," says section 498 of the Indian Penal Code, "by words either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs or by visible representations, makes or publishes any imputation concerning any person intending to harm or knowing or having reason to believe that such imputation will harm, the reputation of such person, is said, except in the cases hereinafter excepted, to defame that person." His Lordship then referred to the exceptions under the section and said that it was upon the ninth exception that the determination of the appeal solely depended. That was in these terms:—

"It is not defamation to make an imputation on the character of another provided that the imputation be made in good faith for the protection of the interest of the person making it, or of any other person, or for the public good."

In connexion with that exception it was necessary to take its language along with of that section 52 of the Code, which was to this effect:—"Nothing is said to be done or believed in good faith which is done or believed without due care and attention."

It was contended by the appellant that in the course of the charge there was misdirection by the Judge and that the jury's minds were diverted from this, which it was admitted was the true and only issue, to other questions. What were these? They were the very things which the prisoner's counsel had throughout the trial insisted on introducing—namely the question of the conduct of McCormick and of Mr. Andrew, the narrative as to Mr. Andrew being accompanied by the suggestion that it was after all indefensible and corrupt. Their Lordships recognized that that mode of conducting the defence, which it appeared to have been difficult to repress, was not unlikely to lead to confusion; but it was at least satisfactory to find that the learned Judge in charging the jury made no mistake in stating what the true issue was.

THE NATURE OF THE LIBEL.

It was expedient to state what the libel contained. Being headed "A Mockery of British Justice," after a considerable amount of inflammatory matter, it proceeded to "speak out against those officials who have forgotten their duty and have dared trifle with the fair fame of England." Having made these very serious allegations the appellant added:—"The facts before us indicate that he (Mr. Andrew) conspired with Mr. Finnie to burke the case; that he conducted it in camera; that he refused to heed the protest of the complainants that the interpreter employed was a paid parasite of McCormick, and did, in fact, deliberately mistranslate; that of the witnesses for the prosecution only those called by the District Superintendent of Police, and not even all of them, were allowed to give evidence; that in a word the whole inquiry was an outrageous make-believe and a mockery of what he is nominally representative, the fair play and judicial honour associated with the name of England. By what looks like the meanest of tricks, the unfortunate complainants were unrepresented by any lawyer at this judicial force."

The libels were at least seven in number. First, of conspiracy with Finnie to prostitute justice by saving McCormick. Secondly, of having, apparently knowingly and as part of the partisanship, bailed out McCormick for a non-bailable offence. Thirdly, of having misled the Malay girl, her parents and friends, by leaving them without professional advocacy, which they had been led to expect. Fourthly, of having perverted the course of truth by a partisan interpreter. Fifthly, of having tried the case in camera (very little was made of that in argument). Sixthly, of not having called certain witnesses in the inquiry; and seventhly, of Mr. Andrew's having heard the case knowing that certain people objected to his doing so. Of these libels the first was the real basis of all. It imputed corruption. Several of the others might not appear, but for their resting upon that basis of corruption, to be of so serious a type. But in their Lordships' opinion that could not be said of the third and fourth for if it were true that the magistrate had designedly deprived the complainants of legal assistance, and provided them with a false interpreter, then such wicked conduct would not only be itself indefensible but would colour all the rest. Upon the whole it could not be denied that if any substantial part of this defamation was true, it meant ruin to the career of Mr. Andrew and any others engaged in conspiring with him as alleged.

THE POINTS FOR THE APPELLANT.

The points put forward in the appellant's favour as establishing that although the charges were false yet he was excused by statute because he believed them bona fide and had given due care and attention to their truth were substantially three. In the first place it was urged that he relied upon a letter published with the signature of "Vigilance," and addressed to the Rangoon Times. It was dated August 31, 1911 and at that time the appellant was connected with that paper. It contained a long narrative incriminating McCormick and also Mr. Andrew and others, the second element proposed in support of Mr. Arnold's good faith was of a different and an important character. It was this:—In the district of Tenasserim referred to the position of sub-divisional magistrate was occupied by Mr. Buchanan. It was alleged that Mr. Buchanan had been on unfriendly terms with McCormick but their Lordships did not think that there was anything substantial in that allegation, and they further thought it right to put on record their opinion, which was in entire concurrence with that of the Chief Judge, that Mr. Buchanan in his investigations and conduct was actuated by entire good faith. Although his conclusions and suspicions might have been erroneous, their Lordships saw no reason to think that from beginning to end he did not act in accordance with the best traditions of the service. Mr. Buchanan himself made inquiries and came to the conclusion that McCormick should be put upon his trial.

The third point, which was more important than either of the foregoing in support of the contention that the writer of the libels believed them to be true, was the admitted conduct of McCormick himself. Although it was no part of the submission of the counsel for the appellant at their Lordships' Bar that McCormick was guilty, their Lordship thought it was an element relevant to the consideration whether Mr. Arnold was acting in good faith in these libels to show that he believed that McCormick's own admissions would have justified his committal for trial. The last matter which their Lordships reckoned to be a perfectly relevant one in the category of elements in the case which bore upon the point of the accused's good faith was this. Importance was attached to a pronouncement by the magistrate. After investigating the facts, and declining to commit, he went on to say that in his opinion McCormick's conduct was pure and philanthropic. Their Lordships could not agree with such an opinion, and their views coincided with those of the Chief Judge upon that subject.

They were of opinion that there were thus several elements in the case which were all with perfect propriety submitted to the jury in support of the defence. Their Lordships were also of opinion that a fair and statable case in support of the statutory defence and of the belief in the wickedness of Mr. Andrew was put forward on the points which have been already enumerated, but that no others were of any real weight. In putting forward, however, the points mentioned, their Lordships thought that a case was made which demanded an answer. Such an answer was given, and it also was both fair and statable.

THE LETTER SIGNED "VIGILANCE."

In the first place a serious and weighty reply was made on the subject of the letter signed "Vigilance." It was not confined to the remark that the letter was no valid excuse for a belief in gross slander. The points proved were these:—When that letter was received by the Rangoon Times a most proper course was taken, and that with the appellant's knowledge. It was forwarded by Mr. Stokes, the assistant editor, to the Chief Secretary to the Government of Burma, so that there might be official confirmation of its allegations before its being published. These allegations were examined into, and on October 31 the Chief Secretary wrote stating that the Lieutenant Governor had caused inquiry to be made and had found that the allegations against the officers were without foundation. By this time the appellant had ceased to be editor of the Rangoon Times and the incident was closed. In 1912 the attacks were renewed in the defendant's paper, the Burma Critic, but at the trial he neither defended the articles as true nor gave any assistance as to what were the actual things on which he founded his own beliefs, nor, finally, what the steps were, if any, on which he took to investigate their truth before giving them to the public. Every officer who had investigated the case except Mr. Buchanan had agreed with the conclusion at which Mr. Andrew arrived—that the charge should be dismissed.

It was alleged that the prosecutors were led on to the trial by Mr. Andrew, and that Mr. Andrew had wickedly conspired suddenly to leave them in the lurch without an advocate and furnish them with a false interpreter. That was not only untrue, but particularly cruel. In their Lordships' opinion when it was discovered that the truth with regard to Mr. Andrew had not been that in these particulars he wickedly conspired to defeat justice, but that he was, on the contrary, anxiously endeavouring to secure that justice should be furthered and guarded, then the mistake should have been acknowledged and an apology tendered. That was not done, but upon the contrary the case was conducted to its close upon the footing that an unstated defence was the real and good defence—namely, that the libels and all the libels were true. Nobody was to be blamed in these circumstances for thinking that the plea of good faith on the part of Mr. Arnold had sustained a serious shock.....

"THE PRIVILEGE OF THE PRESS."

Proceeding Lord Shaw said:—"Their Lordships regret to find that there appeared on the one side in this case the time-worn fallacy that some kind of privilege attaches to the profession of the Press as distinguished from the members of the public. The freedom of the journalist is an ordinary part of the freedom of the subject, and to whatever lengths the subject in general may go, so also may the journalist, but, apart from statute-law, his privilege is no other and no higher. The responsibilities which attach to his power in the dissemination of printed matter may, and in the case of a conscientious journalist do, make him more careful, but the range of his assertions, his criticisms or his comments is as wide as, and no wider than that of any other subject. No privilege attaches to his position.

Upon the other side it would appear from certain observations of the learned Judge that this false and dangerous doctrine may have been hinted at, that some privilege or protection attaches to the public acts of a Judge which exempts him, in regard to these, from free and adverse comment. He is not above criticism, his conduct and utterances may demand it. Freedom would be seriously impaired if the judicial tribunals were outside of the range of such comment. The present case affords a good illustration of what is meant. When the examination before Mr. Andrew concluded with his declaration that in his judgment the action of McCormick was pure and philanthropic, the whole trial would seem to have been laid open to searching and severe observations, and no blame could be attached to these. But when the criticism was converted into an attack upon the magistrate as a conspirator against justice, a traitor to his oath a trickster, a man who had manoeuvred his procedure so as to defeat truth and protect an associate, then, of course, it is for the person who has uttered these things to justify them, or, under the Indian Penal Code, to establish affirmatively that he believed them to be true, and that on reasonable grounds. On both of these matters last mentioned the learned Judge seems to have properly directed the jury.

THE FUNCTIONS OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

It is the duty of their Lordships to consider the special position and function of the Board, in criminal cases as the advisers of the King. The powers of his Majesty under his Royal authority to review proceedings of a criminal nature, unless where such power and authority have been parted with by statute, is undoubted. Upon the other hand, there are reasons both constitutional and administrative, which make it manifest that this power should not be lightly exercised. The over-ruling consideration upon the topic has reference to justice itself. If throughout the Empire it were supposed that the course and execution of justice could suffer serious impediments, which in many cases might amount to practical obstruction, by an appeal to the Royal Prerogative of review on judicial grounds, then it becomes plain that a severe blow would have been dealt to the ordered administration of law within the King's Dominions.

These views are not new. They were expressed more than 50 years ago by Dr. Lushington in his judgment in the Queen v. Mkerji (1 Moore N. S., 272), and Lord Kingsdown, in the case of the Falkland Islands Company v. the Queen (1 Moore N. S., 312), stated the matter compendiously in these words: "It may be assumed that the Queen has authority by virtue of her Prerogative to review the decisions of all colonial Courts, whether the proceedings be of a civil or criminal character, unless her Majesty has parted with such authority. But the inconvenience of entertaining such appeals in cases of a strictly criminal nature is so great, the obstruction which it would offer to the administration of justice in the Colonies is so obvious, that it is very rarely that applications to this Board similar to the present have been attended with success." Their Lordships desire to state that in their opinion the principle and practice thus laid down by Lord Kingsdown still remain those which are followed by the Judicial Committee.

There have been various important cases in recent times to which, naturally, reference has been made. The first in the case of Re Dillet (12 A. C., 459)..... Lord Watson there observed that "the rule has been repeatedly laid down and has been invariably followed that her Majesty will not review or interfere with the course of criminal proceedings unless it is shown that by a disregard of the forms of legal process or by some violation of the principles of natural justice or otherwise substantial and grave injustice has been done."

NOT A COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.

The present case brings prominently before the Board the question of what is the sense in which those words are to be interpreted. If they are to be interpreted in the sense that wherever there has been a misdirection in any criminal case, leaving it uncertain whether that misdirection did or did not affect the jury's mind, then in such cases a miscarriage of justice could be affirmed or assumed then the result would be to convert the Judicial Committee into a Court of Criminal Review for the Indian and Colonial Empire. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that no such proposition is sound. This Committee is not a Court of Criminal Appeal. It may in general be stated that its practice is to the following effect:—It is not guided by its own doubts of the appellant's innocence or suspicion of his guilt. It will not interfere with the course of criminal law unless there has been such an interference with the elementary rights of an accused as has placed him outside of the pale of regular law, or, within that pale, there has been a violation of the natural principles of justice so demonstratively manifest as to convince their Lordships first, that the result arrived at was opposite to the result which their Lordships would themselves have reached, and, secondly, that the same opposite result would have been reached by the local tribunal also if the alleged defect or misdirection had been avoided. The appeal in Dillet's case has been referred to, and their Lordships do not think that its authority goes beyond those propositions which have now been enunciated.

Their Lordships were referred to the dicta of Judges and the rules set up with regard to the procedure of the Court of Criminal Appeal in England; but they are not the rules adopted by this Board, which as already stated, is not a Court of Criminal Appeal. And the authority of these decisions, which apply to a different system, a different procedure, and a different structure of principle, must stand out of the reckoning of anybody of authority on the matter of the procedure of this Board in advising his Majesty.

The application to the present case is simple. Even had this Committee been a Court of Criminal Appeal it is hardly doubtful that the appeal would fail. Ad hoc their Lordships are left in no doubt as to their own duty in conformity with the practice of the Board. They will humbly advise his Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. There will be no order as to cost.

The Army Crisis. Debate in the Commons.

[Concluded from our last.]

Mr. Holt and the Opposition.

THE GOVERNMENT'S PROFESSION.

THE GOVERNMENT professed that the measures they contemplated were what I might almost call peace measures of protection. Their case is that they moved the military to protect certain depots as they would have moved policemen to protect a town hall. I cannot reconcile that with statements we have heard from the Government, and I accept the word of the Secretary of State, but I confess his description of the intentions of the Government are irreconcilable with the action which was taken by the Government. If he correctly interpreted the considered opinion of the Cabinet, then somebody in high quarters has betrayed the Cabinet by taking action behind their backs. (Cheers.) The Government profess to have given us the whole truth but they have refused or neglected to give us an essential part of it. What is General Paget's version of what he said to his officers? (Cheers.) We are asked to believe that the instructions given to General Paget were those contained in the document of December 16 and the letter of March 14. Where in those instructions did General Paget find his authority to offer officers domiciled in Ulster and desiring to be excused service the opportunity of disappearing until the operations in Ulster were over? (Cheers.) There is not one word to show what the Government said to General Paget or what General Paget said to his officers. If the Government were merely contemplating making secure against a raid by irresponsible people on certain magazines and stores in Ulster they never would have told the General that he was to excuse from service officers domiciled in Ulster; and no officer domiciled in Ulster would have asked to be excused from such service. (Cheers.)

THE HONOUR OF THE PRIME MINISTER.

Nor am I able to reconcile the statement made by the Cabinet with the known facts. The Prime Minister late on Sunday night sent for a representative of the Times and conveyed to him for publication a message intended to reassure the public. In the course of that message he denied the rumours of extensive naval preparations, and said that the whole foundation for them was two cruisers being ordered to Ireland. But we now know on the authority of the First Lord of the Admiralty himself that that statement was inaccurate at the time it was made. I do not accuse the Prime Minister of wilfully misleading the country in that statement. My inference is that he did not know, and that is the most curious thing of all.

Mr. Churchill.—The movement of the First Battle Squadron was the result of a Cabinet decision taken more than ten days ago.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain.—Does the first Lord tell me that when the Prime Minister said on Sunday, the 22nd, that no movement of ships in connexion with Ulster was contemplated he knew that the First Lord of the Admiralty had on the 19th ordered a battle squadron to Lamlash, in proximity to the coast of Ireland, in case of serious disorder? The honour of the Prime Minister is at stake, and it is the First Lord who stakes it. (Cheers.)

At this point in Mr. Chamberlain's speech, Mr. Asquith who had been absent from the House, returned to his place, and was received with cheers, and Mr. Chamberlain repeated that his honour was at stake.

THE GOVERNMENT AND GENERAL GOUGH.

Passing to that part of Mr. Asquith's speech which dealt with the action of the officers concerned, Mr. Chamberlain said:—The Prime Minister has told us that no one ought to ask an officer what would be his course of action in future contingencies, and that no officer ought to ask what the Government would expect of him. That no one would dispute, and if in the case under consideration most unhappy results had followed from the Government's breach of this rule the blame with all its consequences must be accepted by those who first violated it.

I listened not without emotion to the right hon. gentleman's speech under that impression; but when, after the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister had spoken, what did we find? That the whole thing was a put-up job (prolonged cheering), that it was a hollow comedy played by the Secretary of State, who, if he had asked to resign, knew while he was speaking that his resignation was not accepted. (Cheers.) I confess that I have never seen anything more humiliating than this drama of spectacle played before a credulous and deceived House of Commons. Now we know from another source of information that these paragraphs which two Ministers stood at this table to-day and declared to be the sole work of the Secretary for War and to have been inserted by him because he had not been able to be present throughout the sitting of the Cabinet, were prepared by him in consultation with another member of the Cabinet, Lord Morley, who, I believe, had been present throughout that sitting, and could not have consented to have put those paragraphs in unless in his opinion they were a fair interpretation of what the Cabinet had decided. We do not hear that he has resigned, and we know now why the Prime Minister does not accept the resignation of the Secretary for War. (Cheers.) There are some things which Prime Minister—and, if the present Prime Minister will permit me to say so, he least of all or as little as any—will not do. They will not throw over a colleague for doing what they themselves in fact if not in words had assented to. (Cheers.) The Secretary of State for War and Lord Morley are pledged by that paper which they gave. (Cheers.) The Government may throw them over if they like, but if they are thrown over, if the word they pledged is repudiated, as men of honour they cannot stay in the Government a day longer (cheers), and if they stay then the paper which they approved and one of them initialed, and the interpretation of that paper which the Chief of the General Staff gave to General Gough and authorized him to read to his officers, is a binding obligation alike on them and their colleagues. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Churchill's Defence.

Mr. Churchill rose to reply amid Opposition cries of "Time." Mr. Bonar Law remarked.—"Let us know what he has got to say."

Mr. Churchill.—Under ordinary circumstances with the regular succession of our Parliamentary debates there is very little opportunity for judging the character of individuals or of parties, but there are occasions when the temperature is raised, as I dare say it may be raised, to the point where you will interrupt the Government reply.

Mr. Bonar Law.—You are only doing this to avoid saying anything.

Mr. Churchill proceeded to say that he intended to deal with the most insulting charges made by Mr. Austen Chamberlain. One might expect sneers from political opponents, but for Mr. Chamberlain to say, after Colonel Seely's frank and manly statement, that his resignation was a put-up job was an illustration of chivalry as practised by the Opposition. (Cheers.)

Mr. Churchill went on:—

Lord Morley came into the room while the Secretary of State was opening for the first time the box in which the letter of General Gough was contained. He came into the Cabinet room, deserted by the Cabinet, who had repaired to lunch, to find out from my right hon. friend what were the precise terms of the declaration he had to make in the House of Lords. He never revised or examined those paragraphs, or took any decision upon them. My right hon. friend takes upon himself the whole responsibility. I dare say we shall see the right hon. gentlemen at the head of a Government in this country. (Ministerial laughter.) I can only say I hope that in that day he will have a colleague as loyal and as chivalrous as Lord Morley. (Cheers.) Although my right hon. friend takes full responsibility for the decision taken, Lord Morley, who was only indirectly brought in, considered it right and proper to say that he took full responsibility for it. (Cheers.)

THE BATTLE SQUADRON.

As to this battle squadron. A fortnight ago to-day the Cabinet decided that a battle squadron and its attendant ships should be taken to Lamlash. This particular squadron was at Arosa Bay and was coming home. The battle squadron was allowed on its course as long as it was not certain that the movement would be effected without bloodshed or serious military opposition. As soon as it was clear that the movement had been safely effected my right hon. friend suggested to me that it would be a good thing, as there was great excitement and there were many lying rumours in the Press, to delay the movement of the battle squadron for another fortnight. But it is going to Lamlash, and there it will stay during the continuance of this crisis. (Cheers and counter-cheers, and Unionist cries of "How about the artillery!") The Vice-Admiral desired to have the guns on board in order that the men might work them as occasion offered.

When movements, however limited, precautionary, reasonable, non-provocative in themselves, have been made, it is necessary that contingent preparations should also be taken into account in case what we all hope and trust will be avoided were to suddenly break out upon us. That is the explanation of a great deal that you will read in the next few days in the newspapers of stores, ships, men and guns, ambulances and pontoon sections, and so forth, that were taken into general consideration in case contingent movements should be necessary. That is the only explanation.

A DISORDERLY SCENE.

Mr. Churchill continued:—When the question of the officers had been put aside, and everything said that could fairly be said to reduce that action to its proper proportions, the fact remained that the great issue had been raised of the Army versus Parliament. (Cheers.) We are content to let that issue, in so far as it has been raised, move forward steadily to its ultimate conclusion. Another issue has been broken in upon—I mean that of the Army versus the people. (Cries of "Oh" and cheers.) Every effort has been made with the greatest dialectical skill by the right hon. gentleman the member for the City of London and by the Leader of the Opposition, who emulates his dialectical force without all his dialectical subtlety (laughter) to show that it is always right for a soldier to shoot down a Radical or a Labour man—(cries of "No" and cheers) and always wrong—(cries of "Withdraw," "Rub it in," "A lie," and "A damned lie.")

These are the two great issues which at the present time overshadow the local issue, the complicated, delicate issue with regard to Ulster. If these issues are raised we on this side of the House are prepared at any time, in any way, by any method whatever—

Lord H. Cecil.—To misrepresent your opponents. (Cheers.)

Mr. Churchill.—I would most earnestly ask the House to end this debate by considering where it is that we are actually drifting to-day. (Opposition cheers.) I earnestly suggest that when we have got to the point when rebellion, organized, avowed, applauded (cheers), and stimulated, is set on foot against the ordinary working of our legislative system, when attempts to deal with that rebellious movement if it should be necessary are attempted to be countered, when attempts are made to paralyse the executive in dealing with rebellion, by fomenting, stimulating, or suggesting mutinies and resistance in the Fleet and the Army (An Opposition member:—"Never!")—I welcome any one who says "Never" to that—when that stage has actually been reached in our sober, humdrum, prosaic, British politics, it is about time for serious and responsible people of all parties to see whether they cannot do something to make the situation a little better. (Cheers.)

THE DIVISION.

The House divided and there voted:—

For the second reading	314
Against	222
Majority for	—92

The Bill was then read a second time.

The House stood adjourned at 10 minutes to 12 o'clock.

Women in Egypt.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Cairo, March 20.

It is fairly generally admitted that the future of all Moslem races, and the elevation of their moral and physical standard, depends in a great measure on the better education of the Moslem woman and on her emancipation from the very secondary—one might with all truthfulness say, degraded—social position that she occupies even to-day. There are signs that this fact is gradually receiving recognition in Egypt. The spread of education among the male section of the population is slowly broadening the views of the Egyptians as to the social position of their womenfolk. Polygamy, except among the lower classes, is as much an exception to-day as it was the rule some score of years ago. The increase in the cost of living may, of course, have had something to do with this change, but as this monogamistic tendency has been noticeable among the Pasha and Bey class, it is not unreasonable to assume that the spread of education has not been foreign to it. Furthermore, the movement in favour of the abolition of the veil which has sprung into prominence during the past two or three years, and the articles, some of them exceedingly outspoken on that subject, and on the urgent necessity for improving the position of the Egyptian woman, which appear in the vernacular Press, afford interesting indications of the transformation in the general outlook which is slowly coming to pass.

The raising of the standard of education among the men has had for natural consequence a demand for educated wives, and parents, realizing this fact, are seeking by all means in their power to obtain for their daughters the instruction that will render them intellectually attractive when the time comes for them to be married. The Government, has done its best to assist in the matter, and has established a great number of schools where girls can receive elementary and advanced tuition. But the demand for admission far exceeds the available accommodation.

NEW SOCIETY FOUNDED.

While official efforts have been made to meet this new situation, it has become increasingly evident that the instruction afforded at the public and private schools was not having the useful result that was expected, in that girls who had completed their studies had no means of further extending their knowledge, and that those whose early marriage had brought their education to a premature close had no facilities for completing that education if after their marriage they desired so to do. With a view to filling this want there has been founded in Cairo, under the auspices of the Khedivah-Mother and of the wives of the Ministers and of the chief European and native notables, a society called the Women's Educational Union. Its objects as set forth in its statutes are:—

1. To unite in a common bond women of all nationalities interested in education, and thus promote the cause of female education in Egypt.

2. To assist mothers and teachers to understand the best principles of education, and afford them opportunities for consultation and co-operation so that the wisdom and experience of each may be profitable to all.

3. To provide for this purpose lectures dealing with education in its physical, mental, and moral aspects.

4. To afford to girls and young women who have been well educated an opportunity of maintaining their interest in intellectual and literary matters, and to publish for that purpose a magazine dealing with educational subjects in a language understood by the majority.

Two meetings have already been held at the Egyptian University, and at the last Mme. El Bassel, who is well known as a writer, gave a lecture in Arabic on "The Influence of Women." A large number of adhesions have been received, and there are many signs that the society will meet with great success, since every effort is to be made to observe the wishes and customs of those for whose special benefit it is intended.

THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF AL-BAYAN FI ULUM-UL-QURAN
 HELD AS AN
 INTRODUCTION TO THE COMMENTARY
 OF THE HOLY QURAN
 CALLED TAFSIR-I-HAQQANI.

THE original book was written by M. Abu Muhammad Abdul Haqq Haqqani of Delhi in the Indo-Arabic language. The learned author has left nothing untouched concerning what is required for a valuable book of this nature. The unfair objections raised against Islam by its enemies, through their ignorance or injustice, have been treated and refuted at full length. The existence of God through reasonable arguments, the refutation of suspicions and doubts raised by Agnostics and Atheists, the discussions on the nature and attributes of God, filled with deep learning and logical reasoning, together with refutations of the false and absurd assertions of the opponents are subjects worthy of appreciation by lovers of truth. The nature of angels, their existence as independent beings, their transformation into any shape they like: the thorough investigation of these statements of the rationalists and philosophers on the subject: the debates on the mission of the true Prophets; the different aspects of inspiration and revelation, the proof of the miracles performed by the Prophets and Saints; the just answers to the plausible statements of the disbelievers in the Prophets and their miracles; the soul and the next world; the transference of man to it; the reward and punishment of good and evil deed; the refutations of spurious religions and of Atheists by their insufficient and false teachings; together with reasonable answers to the suspicious cast by the malignant spirit of the enemies of Islam and the false imputations charged by them against the holy person of the Prophet, together with the testimonies borne in favor of him by the critics of Europe, have been fully described in this translation.

An abstract of review by the Comrade:—The translation in English is quite good. The printing and get-up is excellent; Messrs. Thacker, Spink & Co., being responsible for it. The book has about 750 pages, but from beginning to end besides being learned and instructive is very interesting reading for a Moslem, and more so for a non-Moslem in search for truth about Islam. The book for the sake of convenience is divided into three chapters, and has an Introduction which deals with knowledge gained by External Senses, Internal Senses, by Revelations and by means of Signs and Emblems. The first chapter deals with the last and the greatest of all the Prophets of God, Mohamed, the attributes of God—the creator of the universe, Sanctification, Angels, Genii, Soul Resurrection, and the next world, with objections raised by opponents of Islam and answers to them. The second chapter is the most important as it deals with the early history of Islam, gives a brief sketch of the life of the Prophet, and discusses fully all about crusades, polygamy and inspiration of the Holy Quran, Judaism, Christianity, Vedas, Buddhism Jainism, etc. It explains the Divine Science in the Quran, explaining the prayers, Zakat, Fasting, Haj and Jihad. In the last chapter, a great deal is explained about the Old and the New Testaments and the portions thereof which have been lost. Very useful information is given about the Christian and the Hindu sects, and closes with an account of Zoroastrians. It is a book which will be most useful for the English educated Moslems, as it would give them a very clear insight into their faith, and prepare them to defend it easily against the attacks of the Christian and other Missionaries. Books like this dealing with the modern علم الكلام were badly needed and we strongly recommend all to purchase and study it carefully.

FATEHPURI, Delhi, 22nd September, 1913.

The English translation of "Al-Bayan," the famous book written by Maulana Abdul Haq, has been given to me for reading and reviewing by Hajee Muhammad Ishaq.

The book is so well translated that the beauties of the author's style and diction have been amply preserved. This treatise would be a most valuable addition to the Islamic literature in the English language. It expounds in a most lucid and logical manner the teaching of the Great Prophet, and gives a rational and logical refutation of all the attacks on Islam.

This book would be useful both to the Mohamedan readers and those Europeans who want to learn the truth about Islam.

(Sd.) M. A. ANSARI, B.A., M.B., M.D., M.R.O.S., I.R.C.P.

This book will be a best companion to the Moslems and non-Moslems in India and Foreign Countries and the members of the New All-India Mohamedan Religious Association. Price has been reduced from Rs. 15 to Rs. 10/8 so that learners of truth about Islam may easily purchase it.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor
of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1918, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (13s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

The Week.

Ulster.

London, May 1.

There is much speculation as to Government's action regarding Home Rule. It is stated that Government will offer the establishment of a Commission drawn from both sides, to consider the Federal system, empowered to fix a date by common consent on which Federalism shall become operative. Thus the time-limit on which the Nationalists insist will be retained, but in the meantime the Irish Parliament will have an opportunity to prove its capacity and goodwill towards Ulster. Hence the ultimate inclusion of Ulster in the Irish unit will depend on the good behaviour and efficiency of the Dublin Parliament. Mr. Redmond and his colleagues refuse to speak on the matter at present owing to delicacy of the situation. The difficulties of a compromise are evidenced by the slight hardening tone of the papers.

The "Daily Chronicle" and lobbyist Liberals would have liked Government to take strong action against gunrunners and blame Mr. Churchill for again taking independent action without the knowledge of his colleagues. They fear that pacificatory utterances of Mr. Balfour and Sir Edward Carson were meant to drive a wedge between the Liberals and the Nationalists through the abolition of the time-limit.

Telegrams from Dublin announce that the prosecution of Ulsterites has been abandoned owing to Nationalist representations.

London, May 2.

Speaking at Swindon, Mr. F. E. Smith said that Unionists would never assent to a settlement of the Home Rule question, providing for an automatic inclusion of Ulster after a period of years.

In course of a speech at Buncorn, Lord Hugh Cecil declared that Unionists were still bitterly opposed to Home Rule and would adopt every Parliamentary means to prevent it being passed.

At a meeting at Coventry "to protest against the use of British forces to shoot Ulster loyalists for political purposes," Mr. Balfour said that he was glad that at least some members of the Cabinet now recognised that nothing could meet the Ulster difficulty but a clear-cut separation of Ulster. He was confident that nothing else could avert civil war. Unlike the constitutional problem as to whether Home Rule ought to be given before the country was consulted that was a problem which could not be finally and peacefully settled by a General Election, for even if the country did reverse the verdicts of 1886 and 1895, there would still be the position of Ulster to make the Bill unworkable.

London, May 6.

Several papers state that preliminary communication passed between Government and the Opposition yesterday with a view to a conference regarding Ulster.

The "Daily Mail" says that Mr. Asquith met Mr. Bonar Law and Sir Edward Carson and it is believed that Mr. Churchill was present.

The "Daily News" states that Mr. Redmond was not consulted at yesterday's approach to fresh negotiations and adds that this is one of the several disquieting features of the political situation from the Liberal standpoint. The same paper declares that a hundred Unionist members of the House of Commons met on Monday with the object of reviving the "Die-hard" movement.

London, May 7.

According to newspapers Mr. Asquith had a conference with Mr. Redmond yesterday. The latter, it is stated, is not eager to enter a conference but desires the Home Rule Bill to leave the House of Commons first and to have any compromise embodied in an amending Bill.

London, May 8.

The papers assert that Mr. Asquith saw Mr. Bonar Law yesterday and subsequently Mr. Redmond and also Mr. Devlin and Mr. Dillon. A deputation of "Die hard" Unionists waited on Mr. Bonar Law yesterday to protest against concessions on the Ulster question.

Mr. Redmond has made a statement to the effect that so far as he knows conversations regarding Ulster have not been renewed. He denies that he has consulted Mr. Asquith with reference to new concessions, and says that the position of the Irish party regarding concessions has not changed since the second reading of the Home Rule Bill. Mr. Redmond adds that he is confident that Bill will be sent to the House of Lords in its present shape before the Whitsuntide recess.

the Haj Pilgrimage.

Bombay, May 5.

The Government of Bombay have submitted to the Government of India revised proposals in connection with the Haj pilgrimage. These will be circulated to other Local Governments before any decision is arrived at.

Albania.

Durazzo, May 2.

Epirote insurgents, with many guns, captured Kolonia. Despatches say that they massacred women and children and gutted the town. It is reported that they are advancing.

The news has caused the utmost indignation in Durazzo. Crowds are parading the streets, and patriotic speeches are being made and anti-Greek cries raised.

A meeting is to be held to-morrow to protest against the massacre.

Durazzo, May 4.

Late in the evening the Government received the news of important attacks made on insurgents in course of the day. Many villages in the enemy's possession had been retaken and Government forces had pushed forward to Bomati near Kolonia in the hope of being able to recapture the latter place shortly.

Athens, May 7.

There was a sanguinary engagement at Kodra yesterday. Five hundred Albanians were killed and wounded and the Epirotes also had heavy losses.

Durazzo, May 7.

A Greek band with artillery and machine-guns is marching on the Berat Road to Valona and Durazzo is occupied by strong forces, consisting largely of Greek regulars.

London, May 7.

Reports from various sources confirm the news of the crucifixions at Kodra. Nails were driven through the chests, hands and feet of the victims. Children were found at Hormova cruelly tortured; many had their fingers cut off. It is also asserted that many Albanians at Vrbecko and other places near Leskovitch have been massacred or burned in their houses by the Epirotes.

The Epirote Government has consented to suspend hostilities on the intervention of the International Commission which will undertake to supervise and guarantee the continuance of concession by the Albanian Government.

Macedonia.

Constantinople, May 2.

It is stated that the emigration of Greeks from Thrace has stopped. It is reported that the Porte has drawn the attention of the Powers to the intolerable position of the Moslems in Greek Macedonia, adding that it cannot remain indifferent to it.

New Delhi.

London, May 2.

A feature of the Royal Academy is seven water-colour drawings of the preliminary designs of the approaches and buildings at central points of New Delhi, showing Government House and the Council Chamber.

A Research Scholarship.

Lahore, May 2.

A research scholarship of the value of Rs 60 per mensem will be awarded by the Government annually to a diploma of the Punjab Agricultural College for post graduate study provided a sufficiently promising candidate is forthcoming who will have to present a thesis after scholarship period.

Seditious Literature.

Lahore, May 4.

An informal Conference of the Principals of the various Lahore Colleges and educational institutes was held about the week-end with a view to devising ways and means to check dissemination of seditious literature among the alumni. All heads of the institutions promised to support and co-operate in keeping off possible malign influences.

The Kurds.

Constantinople, May 3.

Eleven Kurds, including Shaikh Shehab-ed-din, have been hanged at Bidlis in connection with the recent revolt.

The Late Duke of Argyll.

London, May 8.

The funeral service of the late Duke of Argyll took place to-day in Westminster Abbey before a vast congregation. The King and Queen, Queen Alexandra and other members of the royal house were present. Members of the Cabinet, Ambassadors and Ministers members of the House of Lords and of the House of Commons and representatives of the Dominions also attended.

The Oriental School in London.

London, May 6.

A large meeting was held at the Mansion House to-day in support of the Oriental School in London. The Lord Mayo presided. Lord Curzon moved a Resolution in support of the view that great Imperial and commercial interests were dependent on an adequate provision for instruction in Oriental languages literature and social customs. Lord Curzon called attention to the work of the School in teaching Oriental ideas, traditions and customs. To know the language of the East, he said, was a great thing. To know its spirit was greater. The commercial importance of a scheme for removing London's inferiority to Continental capitals in this respect could not be overestimated. Unless the representatives of our mercantile houses in the East were equipped with the knowledge of local languages and ideas, the spoils of commercial enterprise would be taken from us, as they were already being largely taken in the Far East, by indefatigable rivals, especially Germans. The provision of the School was a great Imperial obligation.

Lord Crewe said that though there were two schools of thought the largest body of informed opinion held that it was of the greatest possible advantage for young officials, instead of leaving language study till their arrival, to go out with a strong substratum of formal knowledge.

Lord Reay, Lord Inchcape, Mr. Faithful Begg, and Sir Montagu Turner also spoke. Sir William Anson, Sir Algernon Firth, Mr. Ameer Ali, Lord George Hamilton and Lord Lamington were present.

Immigration to Columbia.

Simla, May 8.

The following Resolution has been issued in the Commerce Department with reference to the resolution of the Government of India, No. 8446-9461-3, dated the 7th November, 1913. Intimation has been received that the prohibition against the landing of artisans and skilled or unskilled labourers at ports of entry in British Columbia as issued by the Government of Canada, has been extended to the 30th September, 1914. The Governor-General in Council accordingly requests all Local Government and administrations to make the above intimation as widely known as possible, particularly in places from which immigration to Canada is believed to be most common. Intending immigrants should also be warned at the ports of embarkation of the risk they run in proceeding to that country.

Public Service Commission.

London, May 5.

Mr. Drake did not think it possible to train Indian students of practical forestry in India so efficiently as in German forests, where training had been going on for centuries.

Mr. Seton, of the India Office, said that the rates of pay were not sufficient to attract, first-class men for educational posts.

In accordance with the suggestion, contained in the Currency Commission's Report, Lord Crewe has sanctioned the creation of a second Financial Secretaryship for the India Office and has appointed Mr. William Robinson to be Financial Assistant Secretary thereto.

The Indian Currency System.

London, May 5.

Mr. Rupert Gwynne in the House of Commons to-day asked: "What is the ultimate aim of the India Office with regard to the Indian currency system and what effective measures are being taken to reach the same?" Mr. Roberts said: The chief aim is the maintenance of the exchange value of the rupee at sixteen pence and the chief measures are the provision of a gold standard reserve, other sterling reserves for the regulation of the coinage of rupees and sales of drafts between England and India.

Congress Deputation.

London, May 6.

Lord Crewe will receive next Monday the delegates of the Indian National Congress when contemplated reforms of the India Council will be discussed. A meeting with the members of the House of Commons has been fixed for Wednesday. Sir William Wedderburn will give a breakfast in honour of the delegates on Thursday. They will afterwards attend the Conference at which Lord Courtney will preside.

House of Lords.

London, May 7.

In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Asquith announced Government's intention to lay proposals before the House for the re-construction of the House of Lords, during the present session. He would introduce on Tuesday a procedure resolution regarding Home Rule, Welsh Disestablishment and the Plural Voting Bill.

South Africa.

Capetown, May 7.

It is understood that General Smuts has promised a deputation of Johannesburg Mussulmans that the Indian Commission's recommendations generally will be carried out. He also promised to do everything to settle the marriage question satisfactorily. He said that when the Immigration Act came before Parliament for revision, Government did not intend to put any hardships in the way of Indians.

Indians in British Columbia.

Intimation has been received that the Canadian Government have extended to the end of September next, the operation of the order in Council, prohibiting the landing of any class of artisans of labour in British Columbia.

Our London Letter.

London, April 17.

LORD HARDINGE AND THE INDIAN MUSLIMS.

The Indian mail of last week has brought us the full text of the Viceroy's speech in reply to the address that has been presented to him at Delhi by the Muslim deputation. It is, indeed, noteworthy that in spite of the very weighty and significant tone of His Excellency's declaration on that historic occasion, we had been left absolutely in the dark even as regards the barest summary. Reuter and other news agencies, and even the ever-watchful Times had been, curiously enough, conspicuously silent over this affair. It is true, a very brief paragraph in the Times had informed us that a Muslim deputation had been received by Lord Hardinge at Delhi and that the Viceroy had promised to convey to His Majesty the expressions of loyalty contained in the Address. But that was all!

Those of us who have been carefully studying the Indian policy of this journal—a policy that has been so emphatically confirmed of late by means of the "Indian Peril" bogey—could, however, easily understand the remarkable attitude of silence that had been mysteriously adopted in that particular quarter. It is plain that had Lord Hardinge dropped even the smallest hint that he was inclined to treat seriously, if not actually to believe, what had been said lately against the Indian Muslims in certain influential quarters in India as well as in England, we would have certainly been treated not only to lengthy telegraphic reproductions of His Excellency's words, but also to elaborate leading articles on the subject in some of the leading Tory newspapers in London. Knowing that it had been decided by the Indian Muslims to wait upon Lord Hardinge in deputation, the Indian "experts" connected with the various Tory journals here were on the tip-toe of expectation. Were they going to receive a sort of official approval of their wicked attitude towards the Indian Muslims? Was the Viceroy about to formally bless them for their pseudo-Imperialism? Were seventy millions of His Majesty's loyal subjects in India going to be cruelly labelled by the head of the Indian Government?

We now know that all such false hopes have been shattered to pieces. Lord Hardinge has given yet another proof of his sound and wise statesmanship. He has for once and for all knocked the very bottom out of the scandalous and mischievous theory of the "disloyalty" and "revolutionary policy" of the Indian Muslims that has been so widely and so freely advertised of late. The Indian Muslims have now been told by His Excellency himself in language that could not have been more emphatic that their loyalty and their attachment to the Crown had never for a moment been in doubt. They can thus in future well afford to contemptuously ignore the noisy but harmless barking of these "Imperial" hounds.

A careful perusal of His Excellency's speech at once shows how thoroughly Lord Hardinge has grasped the position in which Indian Muslims find themselves. He does not ridicule the Muslim sympathy that had been so keenly and so justly roused in India for the fate of their co-religionists in other parts of the world, as has been ignorantly done elsewhere. Nothing could be more to the point than Lord Hardinge's reference to the unreasonable attitude adopted in the Press of this country towards the Indian Muslims, and no more severe condemnation of that attitude could be imagined than what has fallen from His Excellency's own lips. "It is true," says Lord Hardinge, "that writers in the English and foreign press have been misled by such expressions (of sore feelings) and, owing to a merely superficial comprehension of the Mohamedan train of thought, have misrepresented the attitude of your community, and attributed to them actions and thoughts which those who know you well can only regard as a deep misunderstanding." Furthermore, the Viceroy has dealt a fatal blow to those who had so deliberately organised the malicious anti-Muslim campaign. His words—"I can only assure you that I and my Government have never doubted the unswerving loyalty which we know quite well to be one of the noblest and most sacred traditions of your community"—will go down in the history of Indian Muslims as a record of their goodness and a testimony to their wisdom during the very momentous period thorough which they have just passed.

We do not wonder at all at the deep silence that now prevails in the editorial offices of the reactionary Tory papers in London. Lord Hardinge's utterance has fallen on them as a bombshell. It has paralysed them beyond any hopes of recovery and it has proved to the world the wretched untruth of all their writings and statements.

The personnel of the deputation could at once dispose of any attempts that may be made at arguing against its representative character. It consists of Indian Muslims of all shades of opinion and contains representatives of various provinces and presidencies. It has been led by a man that is held in great esteem and regard by the entire community. There is, however, a touch of humour in the distinguished list of the gentlemen who had formed the deputation. We find therein one or two names to whose claim of representativeness the Times and other self-constituted authorities in London had offered very serious objection on their visit to this country last autumn. It was apparently left for these "judges"—and not for the Indian Muslims themselves—to decide who should or really could represent the Muslims. Even the general recognition from the overwhelming majority of the community that followed the sudden departure of these two gentlemen from India last year was not sufficient to convince these superior personages in London of the representative nature of their mission. Much to their disappointment, they have now to put up with the hard fact that the deputation representing the whole Muslim community of India has included these two "irresponsible individuals" and we sha'n't be surprised if they were the most prominent members of the deputation. Yet only six months ago the reactionary circles in England were at pains to impress upon the British public the "bogus" character of these two gentlemen's mission to this country, that they were only representing themselves, that they had no voice in the counsels of the Muslim community in India, and all the rest of it.

It is now plain that this Indian Muslim bogey is, to all intents and purposes, dead. We cannot, of course, even now expect to witness the burial of this malicious doctrine. It would be more than human if that were to occur. It would be antagonistic to the "honourable" traditions of its authors if they were now suddenly to give up the reckless crusade in which they have indulged so long. We shall, no doubt, meet with weak reminders of their existence from time to time, but such occasional outbursts in future are bound to fall on deaf ears. Even the bulk of the British public—which is not as a rule well-versed in Indian matters and which is very likely to believe the articles on India which appear in the reactionary press of this country—has at last discovered the fraud that has hitherto been practised upon it. It had been cunningly prepared for a regular revolutionary upheaval among the Indian Muslims and, now it is told on the highest authority that the Government of India has never for a moment entertained such sinister ideas as regards the community. All this is due to Lord Hardinge's sagacity and high statesmanship. A man of his calibre and experience could never fall a victim to the treacherous scheme that had been devised in certain quarters. He has been brought up in the excellent school of diplomacy and his training helped him to look through the "affair."

The Muslims of India—and indeed all the communities as a whole—are essentially loyal. Grievances they have had and no doubt still have; and nobody could accuse them of disloyalty if they, from time to time, adopt means—purely constitutional and legal means, let it be at once said, to bring their complaints before the authorities and to seek remedial measures. They are certainly at perfect liberty to offer such criticism and opposition as they can to any policy of the Government which they honestly believe to be injurious to the interests of their community or country. A Government which does not tolerate reasonable criticism, it can safely be said, is not fit to govern. Nobody is more fully alive to the desirability and in fact the necessity of honest criticism than Lord Hardinge himself. His words in the course of his recent speech at Bombay in reply to the Address of the Municipal Corporation bear ample testimony to this. "Criticism and opposition," said His Excellency, "have their value, and so long as they are inspired by no mean or self-interested motive they are to be welcomed, and indeed when you consider the enormous problems to be dealt with in India, and the gigantic interests involved in any large question of policy, it would be very astonishing and a poor compliment to the intelligence and public spirit of India if there were not fair and reasonable opposition." Lord Crewe, addressing the Indian Civil Service probationers last year, has likewise shown the importance he attaches to criticism in India. It will be remembered, that speaking as the Secretary of State for India, he impressed upon his hearers the significant formula of tolerating and facing fair opposition to their action or policy in India.

Lord Hardinge has again spoken as the "man on the spot", and his speech in reply to the Muslim deputation's Address cannot but produce an excellent impression on the minds of those people in this country who had been so wickedly misled by the writers of a certain type in the Press. It has further brought home to the Muslim community of India the significant fact that, in spite of deliberate attempts in various quarters to misrepresent them to the outside world, the able statesman at the head of the Government of India has clearly shown how utterly indifferent he has been himself to all such insinuations and how emphatically convinced he is of the unwavering loyalty of the community to His Majesty's person and throne. Lord Hardinge's speech has made a very favourable impression on the Indian Muslims in London.

COLONEL AZIZ ALI'S CASE.

The Times has been giving undue prominence to Colonel Aziz Ali El-Masri's case, which has just been concluded at Constantinople. This journal has already written two leading articles on the subject, protesting against the "partiality" of the court-martial, which has been trying the Egyptian officer, and demanding the interference of Great Britain in the matter to secure the release of the prisoner. We are once more reminded by this paper that British prestige demands such a course and are incidentally told that all that has been meted out to Aziz Ali is due to Enver Pasha's well-known jealousy!

We now know that the sentence of death which had been originally passed on the Egyptian Colonel has been committed to one of 15 years' imprisonment and that there is every possibility of further reductions in the sentence. I am, of course, in no way entitled to comment upon the justice or injustice of the whole case, but in spite of the agitation that has been created in Egypt as well as in the Press of this country by the Times, I can safely state that no thinking man in Egypt or Turkey can ever accuse Enver Pasha of jealousy. Neither could anybody who is at all in touch with modern Turkey, charge the Ottoman Government with deliberately securing the arrest of Colonel Aziz Ali with the fixed motive of having him imprisoned or put to death without giving him any opportunity to defend himself.

Throughout the stormy agitation that has been so meanly engineered in London over this case, the most hopeful sign has been the utter indifference to the Times' protests that has characterized the attitude of the Sublime Porte. They were dealing by court-martial with one of their own subjects and it was no business of any one outside to interfere in the matter. Even now if the Turkish authorities are convinced of the innocence of the Colonel, there is every probability of the sentence being squashed; but it is certain that they are not prepared to permit any external influence being brought to bear upon them on the occasion. Whatever His Majesty the Sultan may do of his own accord on the advice of his Ministers is another matter.

If British prestige becomes involved when a Moslem subject of a Moslem Sovereign is being tried according to the military laws of the country, on the ground that England, being a Moslem Power, could not afford to see a foreign Muslim unjustly (?) put to death or imprisoned, one wonders what had happened to this particular sensitiveness of feeling about prestige in England when thousands of innocent Muslims (men, women and children) were being deliberately slaughtered in the Balkans or in the oasis of Tripoli. Then, of course, it was perfectly unreasonable for the 70 million Moslem subjects of Great Britain to impress upon her the fact that they were sorely feeling the butchery that had been going on in Africa and South-Eastern Europe and to remind her that she, as the greatest Moslem Power in the world, ought at least to exercise her undoubted influence over the European Chancellories to put an immediate stop to the brutal anti-Moslem crusade that had been undertaken. Then evidently no question such as that of the British prestige was involved; but now, when we have no reason at all to doubt the impartiality of the Court-Martial which has been trying the Colonel, an Ottoman subject, in the name of the Sultan himself, we are immediately told that, unless Great Britain interferes in the matter, British prestige will suffer. The sinister motive is not far to seek. The object is to thoroughly misrepresent the case to the Egyptians with the off-chance of the wretched scheme working successfully and the hitherto cordial and affectionate relations existing between Cairo and Constantinople becoming in consequence strained.

If Colonel Aziz Ali is deserving of mercy, he is bound, sooner or later, to receive the Imperial pardon. The affectionate hold which His Imperial Majesty the Sultan retains on every Muslim heart—nowhere stronger than in Egypt—will never allow this latest anti-Moslem campaign in England to attain its mischievous end.

TETE À TETE

We are happy to learn that our distinguished countrymen who have recently gone to England as delegates of the

A Distinction and some Differences.

Indian National Congress are to be received by Lord Crewe on Monday. One of the Congress delegates, Mr. M. A. Jinnah, in the course of his speech, as Chairman of the meeting held at Bombay, on the return of Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali, to welcome them, referring to the Secretary of State's refusal to receive the Moslem delegates, had said: "With the greatest respect for Lord Crewe, it seems a denial of a most elementary right of representative men to whom the Secretary of State should always be accessible. . . . Let us hope this will not form a precedent." In spite of the Times of India's obvious chagrin at this statement, no fair-minded person would fail to regard this as an almost self-evident truth, and we are happy to record Lord Crewe's reversion to the universal practice of his great predecessor in office, and, let us acknowledge, of Lord Crewe himself. Lord Crewe's refusal to receive Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali has given to his promise to receive the Congress delegates the appearance of a distinction, though the real distinction lies in being delegated by one's people and not in being received by the Secretary of State. It appears, however, that the reception of the delegates is not going to be a ceremonial affair, as such "distinctions" are apt to be in the cases of those whom officialdom labels as "the natural leaders of the people". Our distinguished fellow countrymen who have proceeded to England do not belong to this class of people but are the real leaders of the Congress school of politicians. Naturally, therefore, they mean more business than ceremony when wishing to be received by the Secretary of State, and we understand that the main topic which will be discussed on the occasion will be the contemplated reforms of the India Council, though we trust other important topics, such as the repeal of the Press Act, the separation of the Judiciary and the Executive and the extension of Executive Council Government at least to such major Provinces as are still subject to one-man-rule, will not be ignored. Evidently the Marquess of Crewe does see that, unlike the case of the Moslem delegates last November, some public advantage would arise from such a reception and discussion. But we wonder whether his lordship feels certain that his action would not be misunderstood by any of the fellow-countrymen of the Congress delegates with whom they are not in accord and who claim equally with them to represent the political attitude and temper of the people in India. On certain questions the majority of Hindus and Muslims interested in politics hold the same, or at least similar views, much to the annoyance of a section of the bureaucracy, and both communities will heartily join us in wishing the utmost persuasiveness to the eloquence and logic of the Congress delegates when urging the Indian view on the Secretary of State's attention. But it cannot be denied that on some questions neither the Hindu delegates of the Congress represent the views of the entire Hindu community, nor do the Moslem delegates of the Congress represent the views of the entire Moslem community or even of the majority. Indeed, it is so obvious that the delegates would not themselves deny it. How has the Secretary of State guarded himself then against a possible misunderstanding of his action in receiving these delegates by those with whose views they are not in accord. Besides there are heaps of toadies in both communities who would have been only too willing to start croaking against the representative character of the Congress delegates if officialdom had once suggested such a thing to them. What would the Secretary of State have done under the circumstances? Would he have sought refuge, as he did in the case of Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali, in the certainty of his action being misunderstood by these unflinching auxiliaries of the bureaucracy? Would he have assured the Congress delegates that the sentiments and aspirations of Indians of the Congress school of thought deserve and receive the fullest attention and sympathy of His Majesty's Government and that he himself spares no pains to inform himself on the matters through the many authoritative sources of intelligence that are open to him. Well, well, we need not dwell too much on what his lordship did six long months ago. It is enough for our purpose to know that this "most elementary right of representative men to whom the Secretary of State should always be accessible" has not been denied in the case of the Congress delegates and that the case of the Moslem delegates has not formed a precedent. As a matter of fact nothing that is done against the Mussalmans ever forms a precedent against others, and it must afford special satisfaction to the school of separatists who are ready to fight the battles of everybody except their own community and share the sentiments of the poet who said :

شرکت غم بھی نہیں چاہی غیرت میری

But while on this subject, let us ask the reader to note that so far as we know the Congress delegates were not elected in a formal manner, by the Congress itself but that every prominent Congressman who expressed his readiness to go to England this summer at his own expense was accepted by the All-India Congress Committee as a delegate. We wonder what the precisionists in the Moslem community think of this after having objected to the delegation of Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali, although it was formally accepted by several properly constituted political bodies, including the All-India Moslem League Council, and, what is still more important, hailed by hundreds of thousands of Mussalmans who otherwise care little for politics and political bodies. Let the Mussalmans also note that Delhi missed an abortive meeting of Rai Bahadurs and Rai Sahibs on the 30th of April convened to protest against the claims of the Congress delegates to represent others besides themselves. We have already said that Hindus as well as Mussalmans have their Jo-Hookams and Ji-Hozaars. But note the difference. The Hindu sycophants know that like one of the two sets of the elephant's teeth, according to the Indian proverb, they are only meant for show and not for use. The Mussalmans unfortunately do not merely exhibit their sycophants but also use them, and thus force others to abuse them. What they should really do with them is to put them under glass cases and warn them of the evil consequences of throwing stones at others from that bi-jou Crystal Palace.

So far as we have ascertained we receive much less frequently than some other contemporaries of ours unsolicited favours in the shape of literature of varying degrees of temperature from strong nationalism to red-hot revolution. In ordinary times one's first impulse is to consign it to the waste-paper basket. But when terrorism is making itself felt the proper course appears to us to forward such literature to the police. For the first time we received such literature sometime after the Delhi Outrage, and communicated with the Director of the Criminal Investigation Department, to whom it was delivered. Subsequently we used to forward it to the Hon. the Chief Commissioner, or, in his absence, to the District Magistrate of Delhi. What happened to it afterwards we did not know, nor felt any particular inclination to enquire. After that for some months we were not favoured with such literature, but recently some such matter is being sent to us, though we must add it does not directly concern India, nor is equally inflammatory. It deals with the question of the emancipation of Egypt which has a political status very different from that of India, opposition to the British occupation cannot be called high treason there. Nevertheless it is a curious fact that when patriots of this class set out to emancipate their country they are stimulated by so much optimism that they do not rest satisfied with working for their own country but devote a good deal of attention to half-a-dozen other countries also. Possibly this may be due not only to their love of liberty throughout the world and sympathy with all those who strive for it, but also to a desire to win the sympathy of all lovers of liberty in every quarter of the globe. Anyhow, if only these enthusiasts knew that instead of receiving any assistance in the attainment of their chief object they embarrass those whose cause they take up along with their own they would very probably desist from bestowing on them such unsolicited favours. We daresay the authorities in India now get forwarded to them more literature of this kind than they can satisfactorily deal with and consequently they decline to receive any more. The best course perhaps under the circumstance would be for every one to destroy all such literature the moment it is received, for we find that although the possession of such matter is not illegal, the police look upon the possessor of it as a sure and certain conspirator and accomplice of some bomb-thrower. But the difficulty is that it is not always possible to say what is seditious and what is not. For instance, it is quite possible that according to the standard of Mr. Tollinton a pamphlet published in Japan on the myrtardom of Sherket Pasha may be considered, treasonable publication and who knows that the possession of the Economic History of India by Mr. Dutt and his numerous contributions on Indian Land Revenue, Mr. Dadabhoi Naoroji's speeches and writings on the Drain Theory and other efforts to "rouse the British conscience" and Mr. William Digby's "Prosperous" British India may land the possessor into jail as a guilty conspirator. Every one who receives these unsolicited favours has not sufficient time to go through all he receives in this way and it may happen that something is left undestroyed. Now we venture to ask whether it is right and just to hold such a person guilty of conspiracy and wreak on him the vengeance of the Police for all undetected political outrages. Government should make it clear that the possession of a leaflet of this character will not bring on the head of a person all the wrath of the Police and the consequent punishment as a conspirator.

In the course of the preliminary examination in the Delhi Conspiracy Case some "Liberty," "Yoga" and other leaflets were produced which Mahatma Munshi Ram of the Haridwar Gurukula had sent to Sir James Meston along with a letter of his own. In this letter the Mahatma refers to the pain that has been caused to him and says that his heart "is sad and heavy to learn that there are still misguided men in India who do not understand the mischief they are doing by publishing rank nonsense to inflame the 'unthinking, half-educated masses'". The leaflets were addressed to four of his professors, some of which he sent to a friend in Simla with a request to place them in the hands of the Viceroy. The rest he forwarded to Sir James Meston "with the hope that something could be done to find out the publishers of this mischievous leaflet". The Mahatma proceeds: "The envelopes bear the post-mark of Lahore, all the addresses appear to have been printed, and thus the perpetrators of this foul deed appear to have taken good care to evade detection; but the quotation from the last Mogul Emperor 'and the appeal to the Ghazi spirit shows the leaflet to be the work of some one well imbued with the spirit of jehad in Mohamedanism. Although an allusion to Arjuna of the Gita appears, yet it is the fall of Turkey and the usurpation in Persia which are deplored." After delivering this innocent little verdict, the Mahatma lapses into his role of humility and winds up with an expression of his sense of shame "that one of my own countrymen, a child of mother Bharat, appears to have prepared this most un-Aryan leaflet, and can but pray to the Divine Mother to lead away such misguided sons of Bharat from the path of unrighteousness." The Delhi Conspiracy Case is still in its preliminary stage, and we do not, therefore, wish to say a word about the proceedings that have so far taken place—about the accused in the dock, the witnesses that have been examined and the evidence that has been recorded on behalf of the prosecution. It is evident, however, that the "Liberty" and "Yoga" leaflets, to trace the authorship of which the Mahatma of the Gurukula has liberally drawn upon his truly "Aryan" spirit and psychology, are alleged by the prosecution to have been the work of some of the accused in the Conspiracy Case, for which an enormous mass of evidence has been produced. We do not know whether all the accused share the faith with which Mahatma Munshi Ram has lit his torch, but they are all Hindus and are presumably nearer in spirit to the Yoga philosophy than to the teachings of Islam. The evidence against them has yet to be sifted and we sincerely hope that if they are really not guilty they may be able to establish their innocence. But in the light of all that has so far happened it was an impudent and wicked presumption on the part of this busybody of a Mahatma to have gone out of his way to traduce the "Ghazi spirit" and "the spirit of Jehad in Mohamedanism." The Mahatma talks of "the Aryan spirit" of "Mother Bharat" with unction. This may be a good and beautiful thing, and it would be a stimulating experience to see in flesh and blood the spirits that he is summoning at Gurukula from the vasty deep of the Vedic Ages. But if they are to be imbued with a spirit as "Aryan" as the Mahatma's, the "Divine Mother" will not have much reason to be proud of her children. Gushing souls with a taste for the archaic have made pilgrimages to the Gurukula and, under the spell of the Mahatmaj's "tall and commanding figure," his "charming manners and simple life," the severity of the school regime, its cloistered purity and picturesqueness and its naive idealism, have felt as if they have come into visible touch with the Spirit of Peace which has found a new dwelling and will shortly spread forth on earth to assuage the bruised heart of man. This picture of the Mahatma and his work has been coming into vogue quite recently. We wish it were as real as its patrons would have us believe. This effusion of the Mahatma, at any rate, gives us quite a different picture. It reveals a narrow-minded bigot, whose heart is shackled with sectarian hate. Sir James Meston and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald may have to tone down their effusive praise.

Mr. S. KHUDA BAKSHI, Bar-at-Law, who has given to the public from time to time his studies and researches in Islamic history and civilization has prepared a translation of "Geschichte der Islamitischen Völker," the famous work of the well-known German author, Dr. Weil. The book will be published on the 15th of this month by the University of Calcutta, and we will review it at some length when it comes in our hands. We may, however, indicate the scope and nature of the work by quoting the following passage from the Introduction written by Mr. S. Khuda Bakshi, an advance copy of which has been supplied to us:—"Dr. Gustav Weil is too well-known to require any introduction or recommendation. Among Oriental scholars in Germany he holds an honoured position, and in spite of continuous researches and the unwearied industry of his countrymen his work still retains the confidence of scholars all over the world. The work of which I now offer an English translation is a volume at once handy, compact and scholarly—suited most eminently for students who need a safe and trustworthy guide to lead them through the labyrinth of Mohamedan history. It is, moreover, free from cumbersome foot-notes, which, though necessary and useful to scholars, are yet somewhat distressing to students. I have not, however, altogether succeeded in avoiding the foot-notes, but I have been as sparing as possible. I could not overlook the results of more recent investigations and researches, and I have, therefore, thought it necessary to incorporate them wherever I deemed such a course essential in the interest of learning and scholarship."

We reproduce elsewhere some extracts from the Report of the Indian Enquiry Commission which was appointed by the Union Government of South Africa to go into the question of the Indian grievances. It is on the whole a satisfactory document and the Commissioners have dealt with some of the main issues of the Indian problem in a spirit broader and fairer than was expected from some of them. The scope of the inquiry was limited to the immediate causes of the recent strike of Indians in Natal and elsewhere and the allegations of acts of violence and torture committed upon persons sentenced to imprisonment in connection with the strike. The broader issues of the status of Indians in South Africa and their right to an equality of treatment as citizens of the Empire were, of course, not included in the terms of reference. The matters that the Commission was authorised to investigate and report upon related to (1) the Orange Free State question, specially enactments which disallow Indians to have immovable property registered in their names or to carry on trading or farming operations in that State, with the provision that every Indian entering that State before being permitted to settle there should make a sworn declaration before a Magistrate that he will not engage in any trading or farming operations; (2) the Cape Colony question; (3) the Marriage question; (4) Repeal of the £8 tax and (5) the administration of the Immigration and Licensing Laws. The Commissioners' recommendations, which are the result of their inquiry, are summed up at the end of the Report. They recommend, among other minor things, the repeal of the £8 tax and the recognition of the validity of a monogamous marriage even if it is solemnised according to tenets that recognise polygamy. These recommendations are a great improvement on the existing order of things, and we trust the Union Government will immediately carry them into effect. The other recommendations are also sound as far as they go and their full acceptance will materially diminish the rigours of the Immigrants Regulation Act, 1913. The marriage question will lose much of its heart-burning and bitterness if the Commission's views take full effect, but we are afraid it will not entirely cease to exist. The only solution that would commend itself to the Indians, whose religion allows them under certain conditions to have more wives than one, is to leave them to a free practice of their usage of which their faith and conscience approve and to recognise it as lawful. The recommendation of the Commission on the subject amounts to this, that a man may have one wife recognised by the law, while his other wives will not get legal recognition and therefore his connection with them would be irregular and his offspring from them would be illegitimate according to the law. The Commission recommends a considerable advance from the original position, but the hardship and humiliation of the situation would not end. Next week we shall reproduce the views of the Commissioners on the question and discuss them in detail. The Commissioners complain that the Indians refrained from giving evidence in a body and entirely ignored the Commission, and, therefore, they could not enquire into the allegations of ill-treatment. It should, however, be remembered that the Indians had objected to the personnel of the Commission, and their demand for the inclusion of a member who would command their confidence was absolutely unheeded. In view of this they took a solemn vow not to give evidence before a body for whose freedom from bias they had no assurance. But their abstention has now proved to have been well advised on other grounds as well. "As is common knowledge among the Indians," writes Indian Opinion in a recent issue, "they had over three hundred witnesses excluding many Europeans who had made affidavits and who were ready to tender evidence. Every association throughout South Africa would have led evidence on the main grievances. This would have meant a delay of at least six months in the issue of the report of the Commission thus rendering it impossible to introduce remedial legislation during the current session of Parliament. And it would certainly have been disastrous if the settlement had been delayed for so long. What is, however, more important is the fact that the settlement spirit that pervades the atmosphere would, it is highly likely, have been marred. Mr. Andrews' great work of conciliation could not have been done. For the Indian community would have led voluminous evidence as to ill-treatment. This would have been hotly combated by the other side, and hot words would have passed between opposing counsel. The sitting of the Commission would have roused the keenest excitement between the Indian and the European sections. Instead of all this, thanks to the Indian abstention, we have still the atmosphere of conciliation so silently, so effectively and with such wonderful love and humility created by Mr. Andrews."

One of the favourite arguments with which philosophers of the White-Man's-Burden school oppose any measure to give the subject races of the "coloured" Finance and Politics. variety the least responsible control over their own affairs is the inherent unfitness of the latter for such responsibility. They are held to lack every one of the qualities that have equipped the peoples of Europe for self-government. They have no physical or moral stamina, no vigour and decision of character, no sense of responsibility, no conception of disinterested public service, no political honesty and so forth. This sense of righteous superiority is, however, shattered occasionally by inconvenient and dramatic exposures of the methods with which national and international affairs are conducted in some of the most advanced States of Europe. Madame Caillaux's revolver has not only put an end to the life of a Parisian journalist who had considerable influence in French politics but also laid bare the colossal corruption of French politicians in which even the Ministers of the Republic are involved. This scandal illustrates the whole connection of politics with finance in France. The French are a nation of investors and the French Government is supposed to be the guardian of the National Savings Bank. Investment is an instrument of diplomacy, a wedge of penetration, a source of influence. The financiers have captured the machinery of the State. As the Nation says, the banks have become in France what the trusts are in America. They dominate politics. They own the Press. They control the political parties. It is not, therefore, strange that M. Tardieu's is a name as well-known in high finance as in journalism and politics, and that an affair like that of the American Marconi and British Cabinet Ministers and the Liberal Whip, which created so much excitement in one of the Entente Cordiale countries, should be but a normal circumstance in the public life of another, which is its neighbour.

The recent scandal which shook the French Ministry, drove M. Caillaux out of office, and involved the characters and reputations of four ex-Premiers, relates to the exploits of Rochette, a Company promoter, who, by a long series of frauds, succeeded in robbing the French investors of about two millions sterling. He was put on his trial, but the legal proceedings dragged on for three years, and he was subsequently condemned to three years' imprisonment—after he had fled and disappeared. A certain Minister was generally accused of complicity in his flight. For a detailed exposition of the facts we make no apology in quoting the Nation at length. It says:—Undoubtedly, a great part of the responsibility falls on M. Caillaux. His own explanation is really more interesting, and in a sense more damning, than all the vague suspicions against him. No one has been able to show that he was personally intimate with Rochette, or shared in any of his ventures. His own story is, first, that he owed an obligation of gratitude to Rochette's counsel, who had acted for him in his private affairs; and, secondly, that Rochette through his counsel had threatened a sweeping exposure of the whole system of 'Republican' finance. He was the rank outsider, the disreputable, if successful, adventurer. But he had compiled a rather deadly book, which a discreet middleman of the politico-financial demi-monde was allowed to see in proof. It was a statistical history of the last twenty years of investment in France. Here was the record of all the really respectable popular 'issués,' foreign loans, foreign railways, and the like, the ventures promoted by boards which number ex-banks, the operations recommended by boards which number ex-Ministers among their directors. It was a history of inflated values, high commissions, and the inevitable fall of prices, which showed, as are told, a net loss to the French investor of four hundred millions sterling. A malicious parallel chapter described how similar institutions in England and Germany had made in the same period a gain of 680 millions. All this would figure in Rochette's defence at the trial, and the book would be behind it. Rochette had already spent a third of a million on 'publicity' for his various ventures; the press might be trusted to do something for a client so munificent. M. Caillaux had already a sufficiently nauseating scandal on his hands—the defalcations of the liquidator Duez, amid which so much of the confiscated wealth of the religious orders had evaporated. He did not want to have to answer as Minister a fresh series of accusations which might readily be so handled as to suggest that the whole Republican political world was nothing but a vast fraudulent concern engaged in robbing the small investor. On our reading of the facts, this unpublished book of the audacious Rochette is really the centre of the affair. He blackmailed the Republic, and M. Caillaux happened to be the Minister in power at the moment; the chances are that any other of these none too scrupulous and none too courageous politicians would have acted as he did. Into the details of the affair it would be tedious to enter. It is a morass of meanness, disloyalty, and lying. Ministers give orders to judges; legal officials bend to pressure and take their revenge by making revelations; one Minister has an eavesdropper concealed behind a curtain; another steals a State paper, hides it for three years, and at last produces it to destroy a rival. Finance, in short, has done more to degrade politics than any other alien interest in social history. Good observers tell us that the French public is stupefied, indignant, and resolved to make a sweeping change. But to what group or party can it turn? Indeed, the White Man's Burden is a heavy one; but we admire his persistence and his altruism that he would saddle no one of a sable hue with the weight of—how many millions did Rochette say?

The Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler opened the Islamia College, Peshawar, last year. Standing close to the mouth of the Khyber Pass, he was naturally impressed with the import of the ceremony he had been invited to perform. The event was certainly impressive in more ways than one. The sturdy Mussalman races of the N. W. Frontier Province, which had hitherto shown no inclination to move with the times, had raised large sums of money of their own accord to found a first grade college for the education and training of their youths on modern lines. The independent border tribes were also interested in the scheme and made voluntary contributions to the College fund. The enthusiasm, the energy and the measure of self-help displayed in the cause of Western education by these virile races, whose attitude towards Western influences had been so hostile in the past, marked the beginning of a new era in their history. Fancy may indulge with pardonable freedom in picturing the future when the younger generations of the border communities would be equipped with modern knowledge and begin to guide the destiny of their race in the light of modern ideals. The future is rich with hope, but the fulfilment of its abundant promise depends entirely on the extent to which the opportunities of the present are utilised. It is satisfactory to note that the foundations of the new educational movement have been laid well. During the first year of its existence the Islamia College has made wonderful progress. It opened in April, 1913, with 14 students; it has now 313 boys on its rolls, 70 of whom are from trans-frontier districts. The first Annual Prize Distribution, which came off on the 30th of April last, was attended by hundreds of raisas, khans and chiefs, including a large number of European officials. The Hon. the Chief Commissioner presided over the function. Mr. Tipping, the Principal, whom his Aligarh pupils remember with affection, reviewed the last year's work in a report which is a record of remarkable progress. The College is affiliated to the Punjab University up to F. A. and its affiliation up to B. A. has already been recommended by the Syndicate. The credit of the good results achieved by the College in its first year of existence is due to the energy of the Principal and the staff. The College also owes much of its present success to the services of its indefatigable and resourceful Secretary, Sahibzada Abdul Qayyum Khan C. I. E. The provincial Government is in entire sympathy with the aims of the College and is ready to lend it active support. The work of planting the seeds of higher education among the Pathan community of the Frontier Province has started under the best auspices. Its future success would mainly depend on the degree of self-help and self-sacrifice shown by the community itself. Government co-operation is indispensable, especially at this stage, and we trust it will always be readily forthcoming. The main thing to be kept in mind is that the control and direction of the affairs of the College should be entirely in the hands of the chosen representatives of the people, for only thus can the educational movement become thoroughly national and therefore most likely to yield the best results. Those who think that they can educate people and still retain them in leading strings have not yet learnt anything from experience.

The Comrade.

A Complaint from the North-West Frontier.

We receive from time to time appeals from people who think they have been injured by the actions or the decisions of officials, but almost invariably we have to ignore them, because we do not regard ourselves as a Court of Appeal with pretensions to judicial authority. But occasionally we receive the statement of a case which falls within the purview of a newspaper, because there is apparently no avenue open to the aggrieved party for securing the redress of his grievance except the publicity given to the case in the columns of a newspaper. It is obviously impossible for a journalist to go into these matters like a judge and jury, and one does not expect from a newspaper such care and attention. Nevertheless a newspaper can arm itself with sufficient data to establish a prima facie case for the person appealing to it, and is, we think, fully entitled to bring the matter to the notice of Government with a view to have an enquiry instituted into the case.

Such a case is that of Nawab Mohamed Ghulam Qasim Khan Sahib, Nawab of Tank in the district of Dera Ismail Khan in the North-West Frontier Province. We have received from the Nawab Sahib a letter enclosing copies of a memorial in English submitted to the Hon. Sir George Roos-Keppel, then Chief Commissioner of the Province, another memorial in Urdu submitted with a copy of the English memorial to the Hon. Mr. Donald now Chief Commissioner, and translation of a resolution of the Government of the Punjab and a Sanad of the same Government announcing certain honours and dignities conferred upon the Nawab Sahib's grandfather, Nawab Shah Nawaz Khan, in 1875, together with some jagirs and exemptions from payment of Revenue and Police charges, for the maintenance of the dignity and position of Nawab Shah Nawaz Khan and his successors. One of the enclosures is a pedigree of the Nawab Sahib which is a document of considerable interest.

From the first memorial we learn that the Nawab Sahib traces his troubles and misfortunes to the displeasure of Mr. T. B. Copeland who was posted as the Deputy Commissioner of Dera Ismail Khan some years ago. It seems that certain allegations of high-handed dealings towards a section of the residents of Tank had been made against him, and that in the course of the enquiry Mr. Copeland made an adverse report to Sir George Roos-Keppel, "in consequence of which," says the memorial, "he had not only the misfortune of incurring Your Honour's displeasure but also his agent, Karamat Huzain, was ordered to leave the district under section 36 of the North-West Frontier Regulations." But, the memorial adds that "subsequently coming to know the real facts of the case, Your Honour was graciously pleased to restore the petitioner to your favour, thereby winning his deep gratitude." The sequel, however, proves, that deep gratitude is more easily won in the N. W. F. Province than a petitioner who has had the misfortune to incur a Deputy Commissioner's displeasure, and consequently the Chief Commissioner's, is graciously restored to his favour.

The memorial cites an application submitted on the 14th April, 1912, by the Chaudharies of Tank as proof of the fact that the complaint from which the Nawab Sahib's troubles arose were baseless. It then goes on to say that Mr. Copeland was transferred from Dera Ismail Khan and nothing further happened till he was re-transferred to the district subsequently. When this happened the Nawab Sahib was carrying on some litigation both in the Revenue and the Criminal Courts against some of his tenants-at-will. He paid shortly afterwards a visit to Mr. Copeland in the course of which the Deputy Commissioner asked the Nawab Sahib to withdraw the prosecutions against the tenants, and if he did not desist from such "rascality" (badmashi), threatened him with expulsion from the Province, a power which Government has with little forethought or wisdom conferred upon its officials on the North-West Frontier Province. It appears that the Nawab Sahib gave information of this conversation to Sir George Roos-Keppel in a registered letter on the 31st of July, 1912, but received no reply.

If the report of this remark of Mr. Copeland could be believed, we could offer some comment of our own which, we may take it from previous experience of this province, would be accounted in us as high treason, and possibly we might immediately lose another subscriber of the Comrade who had paid the full subscription for the year—from the public exchequer. But for reasons far more valid than the fear of the Press Act and the hope of some unearned subscription we prefer instead to quote from the memorial the comment of the Nawab Sahib himself. In concluding his memorial to the Chief Commissioner he says: "The honour and position of Nawab was granted to him by the benign Government, and he is ever willing to obey all orders which Your Honour or the local authorities may lawfully issue. It is obviously impossible for him to carry out such wishes of Mr. Copeland as are calculated to disgrace him in the eyes of his people, to injure his legal rights and to cause unjustifiable loss to him. Surely from a political as well as personal point of view, it is hardly justifiable for Mr. Copeland to seek to bring disgrace upon those whom the Government have invested with the honour and status of Nawabs."

Among others we have done not a little to expose the real character of a certain section of those on whom officialdom confers its so-called honours. But our best supporters in this enterprise have been the officials themselves who "honour" this class of people on the New Year's day or the King-Emperor's birthday and dishonour them every day of the year. Even the worm turns and no wonder that a nobleman of the Frontier whose ancestors had rendered great services to the State, and whose own services were rewarded with the title of Nawab, now turns round to rebuke Government for its contradictory attitude. Either the Nawab Sahib, who, according to the Sanad of 1875, was selected by Government as a successor to the Tank Nawab on account of being the most suitable member of the family, was deserving of this selection and of the title of Nawab, or he was not. But if the Government do not confess that their selection and recognition were gross blunders, they must protect their protégé from the shocking manners and awful fury of "hot-headed youths" (that's the phrase, is it not?) who have put no more than ten years' service in India before being posted as Deputy Commissioner over large districts. Even the maker of counterfeit coins would not refuse to accept at its face value a spurious coin of his own manufacture that is tendered to him; but officials have often no hesitation in dishonouring their own creations. Well may the titled gentry say to them:

زبان خود را یافزای قدر
که هرگز آید ز بروده عذر

(Increase the dignity of the Nawabs of your own creation; for never does your own creation turn against you.)

The Nawab Sahib of Tank's tale of woe is as follows. In a theft case in which the police were prosecuting the accused on the complaint of the Nawab Sahib, Mr. Copeland interfered and recorded his opinion against the maintenance of the prosecution, but this order was set aside by the Judicial Commissioner. Nevertheless, the lower court acquitted one of the accused on the very ground on which Mr. Copeland had recorded his opinion, and Mr. Copeland himself reduced in appeal the sentence of the second accused. As a result of this action this court dismissed other complaints which the Nawab Sahib had preferred against the number of other tenants, though ultimately these orders, too, like Mr. Copeland recorded opinion, proved to be without justification and were set aside by the Session's Judge. The memorial complains that encouraged by rumours of the Deputy Commissioner's displeasure the Nawab Sahib's tenants presented a number of frivolous applications to the Deputy Commissioner upon which Mr. Copeland passed orders obviously prejudicial to the Nawab Sahib, causing him considerable loss. A noteworthy circumstance in connection with these Revenue proceedings is that the Nawab Sahib, now thoroughly warned as to the weather he could repeat and fearing further trouble through Mr. Copeland's displeasure, presented applications to the Assistant Collector for withdrawal of some notices of ejectment against a number of his tenants who had instituted suits under the Tenancy Act for the in cancellation. The Assistant Collector rejected these applications, and Mr. Copeland, who was curiously enough informed that the applications had been submitted merely to please him, and was requested to bring about a settlement, called for certain information which was supplied, but did nothing to bring the matter to a satisfactory conclusion. As a result of all this the Nawab Sahib's tenants, non-proprietary residents of Tank and Kamins refused to carry out their legal and customary obligations towards him. They have been led to believe, says the memorial, that, however illegal their conduct may be, no official would give him any relief because he had incurred the displeasure of the head of the district.

Nor is this all. At the instigation of the Nawab Sahib's enemies a complaint of enticing a married women for illicit intercourse was instituted against him in the court of Mr. Copeland which, says the memorial was so obviously unfounded, that finally Mr. Copeland directed it to be consigned to the records on the ground that "the complaint did not wish to pursue the matter further "at present." This is, indeed, a curious order, for it does not appear whether the complainant still retains the option of coming one day to Mr. Copeland's Court to pursue the matter further. We think the man should have been compelled to substantiate such a charge or withdraw it. When nothing further was done the Nawab Sahib prosecuted the complainant for defamation, but we are told that the Sub-Divisional Officer of Tank has ordered that this complaint should remain pending till the return of the accused from the Veterinary College of Lahore, where he is receiving his education. The Nawab Sahib complains that even the inspection of the record, for which he applied, and to which he is entitled, has not hitherto been permitted to him.

Incidents have since then occurred which give rise to apprehensions concerning his personal safety. He cites paragraph 180 of the Political Diary No. 52, dated 21st December, 1912, to show that two residents of the Tank Sub-division, stated to be Bhatias, went to Ilaga Mahaud in order to arrange a raid or dacoity for the purpose of killing the Nawab of Tank, that they offered Rs. 6,000 to a group of dacoits for that purpose and that they put up with some people with the object of arranging the raid but were not successful in inducing the men to commit it. Some more evidence of such designs was available soon after and the Nawab Sahib caused it to be officially recorded. But he has since been informed that the papers have been sent to the headquarters of the district. No enquiry seems to have been made into this affair, nor do any steps seem to have been taken against the persons who are alleged to be intriguing to bring about the Nawab Sahib's death. These apprehensions may seem to us at first sight somewhat needless, but we have to remember that we are dealing with the affairs of the North-West Frontier, and, as the Nawab Sahib reminds us in the memorial submitted to Mr. Donald in Urdu, not long ago the son of another prominent frontier man, Khan Bahadur Azeem Khan, was killed in the bazar and the culprit has, it is alleged not yet been punished.

In the memorial submitted to Sir George Roose-Keppel the Nawab Sahib of Tank seeks the protection of the Chief Commissioner "against a state of thing which involves not only material injury and personal indignity but also danger of life. "He respectfully prays that the Chief Commissioner may be pleased to enquire from Mr. Copeland how he had failed to discharge his duties as the Nawab of Tank and to grant him an opportunity of "showing causes" against whatever complaints Mr. Copeland may have against him. He urges pathetically that all the Deputy Commissioners of Dera Ismail Khan ever since he became Nawab of Tank have been satisfied with the manner in which he has discharged his duties towards the Government and his people. He humbly refers to the services he has rendered on various occasions in connection with dacoities and "confidential political affairs," of which, he says, he possesses ample documentary proofs. Finally, he gives expression to a feeling of childlike want of comprehension which indicates far more vividly than any critic of the system of administration followed in the North-West Frontier Province could have done, the absence of that security which we associate only with the "Reign of Law." He asks why Mr. Copeland has adopted this attitude towards him, what it is that he wants him to do and in what he has failed to carry out Mr. Copeland's orders. He also asks whether "the line of policy adopted by Mr. Copeland is in accordance with Your Honour's wishes", for he confesses that, if it is so, he will "bow before the will of the representative of the sovereign to willingly abide by Your Honour's directions." He says he bore the consequences of Mr. Copeland's unjustifiable displeasure with patience so long as they were confined to injury to his property and legal rights. But now, in the words of the memorial, "the situation having become very serious, he is not only afraid of some false case or cases being concocted against him, calculated to bring disgrace upon him and his family, but is also in fear of danger to his life. "The subordinate district authorities, very naturally following the example set by the head of the district, listen to misrepresentations on the part of his enemies, and he cannot, for obvious reasons, even obtain legal advice in the district of Dera Ismail Khan." How significant are the words "very naturally" and "for obvious reasons!" But even more significant is the final appeal in which he asks the Chief Commissioner either to enquire into the causes which are at the root of the matter, or "to be instrumental in restoring between Mr. Copeland and the petitioner those amicable relations which ought to subsist "between the Deputy Commissioner of Dera Ismail Khan and the Nawab "of Tank."

We know that there is an Indian Penal Code containing the penal law of the land to the shaping of which went the genius and the sustained labour of many distinguished English jurists. We also know that there is a Criminal Procedure Code which lays down at great length and in minute detail the procedure for the application of the penal laws. There is also a well established revenue system and regulations dealing with it, clearly laying down the rights and duties of landlords and tenants and the powers of the Revenue Courts. There is also an Executive and a Judicial administration in the Province maintained at no little cost to the tax-payer. But throughout this long memorial, drawn up no doubt by a lawyer, there is no appeal to any code or law or Regulation and no protection is sought from any Court. The central figure of this pathetic document is a young gentleman no older than one of our "young hot-heads," probably an alumnae of Oxford or Cambridge who has left behind him at his College the reputation of extreme amiability and brought with him the culture and refinement of his University. It is not probable that he has a quarter of the wealth or any thing like the position in his own country which the humble memorialist enjoys. But we miss in the memorial the true features and the expression of our amiable cultured and refined University man, and only see the lineaments of a stern, inexorable, vindictive god who has to be propitiated by all kinds of offerings, and to obtain whose good-will the trembling worshipper seeks the intercession of two of the dii majores. This young god stands to him in the place of the Indian Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code and all the Rules and Regulations of the Province. He represents the Revenue System, all the Courts and every Department of the Administration. In short, as the poet says:

مجھ کو کیا اک زمانہ مہربان ہو جا نیگا

(Every one has a place in his heart for thee. If only thou wert satisfied it would be as if the whole world was kind to me.)

We ask whether it is right or just to leave hundreds of thousands of people in all stations of life throughout large areas at the mercy of a single official whose word, and not that of King or Parliament or any Indian Legislature is law to the entire population placed in his charge, even though his College may remember him as an extremely amiable man and he may have brought from his University a good deal of its culture and refinement. Even in other provinces the power and prestige enjoyed by the head of the district develops in him self-reliance to an undue extent while they play havoc with college reputations for amiability and University traditions of culture and refinement. But in a province where the regulations place extraordinary powers in the hands of young men practically responsible to nobody but their conscience, we are not in the least surprised to hear the most prominent nobleman of the district being called a rascal by a gentleman who most probably used to say "Please" and "Thank you" to his servants, nor are we shocked to receive complaints of absolute defiance of law by one appointed to administer it who would not perhaps bear even a common soldier being deprived of his right to disobey a General acting on the authority of the Cabinet if the order was unreasonable.

It appears that no satisfactory answer was received by the Nawab of Tank to his English memorial, while the Urdu memorial submitted to the present Chief Commissioner together with the copy of the English memorial to Sir Roos-Keppel has not answered at all. We do not know how far the allegations contained in these two memorials are correct, but a strong prima facie case has been made out and the Nawab Sahib of Tank, knowing only too well the risks he runs by thus publishing his grievances, is still determined to run them rather than risk those still more serious consequences to which he has referred in his memorial. We think he should be given an opportunity of substantiating his complaints against Mr. Copeland and Mr. Copeland should also have an opportunity of meeting those complaints. We, therefore, trust the Hon. the Chief Commissioner of the Province, or, failing him, the Government of India would institute an inquiry into the matter and publish the true facts of the case along with the Government's decision. The second memorial is the obvious result of despair, and the Nawab Sahib of Tank appears to be so worried that he would prefer to exchange his land and Jagirs with some land on the Punjab canals and altogether give up his domicile in the Frontier Province. This is not a small matter for evidently the Nawab Sahib of Tank has considerable stake in the land even according to the highest bureaucratic standard. Let us wait and see how this matter is viewed by Government and what decision is arrived at in a case in which aristocracy is pitted against bureaucracy "in these democratic days".

Khwaja Kamal-ud-din and his Supporters.

Some years ago Khwaja Kamal-ud-din left off a lucrative practice at the Chief Court Bar of Lahore, fell out of the ranks of those who were making a name for themselves as leaders of Moslem thought in India, and, unassisted by public funds, went to England to spread Islam in Europe or at least refute the baseless charges brought against Islam by the Christians and cultured pagans of Europe alike. To all intents and purposes he was given up as lost by Indian Mussalmans, and beyond receiving his little monthly magazine from London and glancing through it with a half-critical half approving eye they took no interest in him and his work. There was nothing sensational in his work, nothing like a pitched battle with the Secretary of State on the question of the Moslem University, the resolute defence of their desert homes by the Arabs of Tripoli, or the determined Ottoman defence of Adrianople, its loss and ultimate recapture. How could the Khwaja, then, expect any assistance or even interest in the work that he was so resolutely and so quietly doing? He was only fighting the battle of Islam against unheard of odds, and what was Islam to Indian Mussalmans that they should watch the struggle with interest?

But luck did not altogether desert the Khwaja. The first convert whose last remnant of doubts about Islam he helped to remove turned out to be a Peer, and although we feel sure Lord Farooq Headley is too good a Moslem to base any claim of superiority on anything but the basis of Islam's aristocracy, taqwa (or God-fearingness, if the term be permitted), Indian Mussalmans had left the theory of Islamic aristocracy sufficiently far behind and acclaimed the conversion of a Peer quite in the spirit of the nouveau riche of America acclaiming a Peer as a son-in-law. Ecce signum! Behold the miracle! The requisite sensation having been provided, Moslem India instantly turned towards the Moslem Missionary in England, and for three whole months he was the unfailing theme of every conversation in Moslem India. Nothing that Indian Mussalmans could do for him was too much. Subscriptions were being opened on all sides for him and because we ourselves were unable to give the time necessary for this work many of our friends accused us of being lukewarm in such a sacred cause. Some Ahmadi gentlemen at Lahore had, however, constituted themselves into an All-India Committee for the purpose, and we directed everyone who wished to offer any assistance to the Khwaja Sahib to the doors of the Lahore Committee. But despite much talk of Moslem solidarity we found to our great regret that sectarian doubts began to assail some Mussalmans in this country. The charlatan also found this to be an excellent opportunity, and availing himself of sectarian suspicions, began to work for his own selfish ends. We shall be failing in our duty if we did not mention that the action of some Ahmadi gentlemen assisted the designs of the charlatan by providing considerable material for sectarian doubts.

The net result is that hardly any assistance has been rendered to the Khwaja Sahib and even the ambitions of those who wished to profit by the Khwaja Sahib's success have not been satisfied. That's what the men have done, though we must add that some kind friends in Bombay sent their contributions as soon as they were informed that the Khwaja Sahib needed assistance and were satisfied that he was doing good work. But the response of Moslem women has not been equally slow or selfish. None of them has, of course, tried to ride on the crest of the wave that the conversion of Lord Headley created in our languid sea. That is some negative proof, but positive proof also has not been wanting. Mrs. Khedive Jung (Tyeba Begam), the gifted daughter of Nawab Imad-ul-Mulk Bahadur, has followed in the footsteps of her father and has equally liberally assisted the Khwaja Sahib with her own contributions. Mrs. Humayun Mirza, the Secretary of the Anjuman-i-Khawateen-i-Islam (Moslem Women's Association) of Hyderabad, has sent Rs. 500, and now Tyeba Begam has sent another Rs. 500 (Hali) through Mr. Shaikat Ali, the Secretary of the Khaddam-i-Ka'ba.

This last is a contribution of Mrs. Hakim-ud-Daulah Bahadur, the Vice-President of the Hyderabad ladies' Association. In Paigham-i-Sulh appeared a simple message from Khwaja Sahib in these words:—

میرا ارادہ ہے کہ نبی کریم کی بعض حدیثیں مختصر سی لاکتوں میں جمع کر کے
ہزار چاب دون اور مفت تقسیم کروں۔ یہ امر اس قابل غین کہ اس کی لٹی چندہ
کہولا جائی یہ سوال صرف دو تین سو روپیہ کا ہی۔ اگر کوئی عمد کا شیدائی
اپنی آفاقی کلام کو مغرب میں تقسیم کرانا چاہتا ہے تو یہ سہل طریقہ ہے *

We do not know what effect this simple and direct appeal created on Moslem manhood, but we now know how it affected Moslem womanhood. Khwaja Sahib can bring out two series of Pocket Editions of selections from the great Prophets' Traditions or publish three or four thousand copies of one series instead of a thousand and only for which he had asked some lover of Mohamed to contribute. Mrs. Aqeel Bilgrami, (the daughter of the late Khan Bahadur Maulvi Syed Ali Hasan whose sad death occurred at Delhi only the other day) has also sent Rs. 1,000 (Hali) through Tyeba Begam who is her sister-in-law. This is what a few women who love God and fear Him have done. In a way it was easier for them to do this, for men have taught them only too well the lessons self sacrifice and devotion to duty. But have the teachers themselves nothing to learn in this direction? Let them answer the question—if they dare. Khwaja Sahib is not alone now at Woking. Another enthusiast who has worked in America and Japan before this has joined Khwaja Kamal-ud-din, and let us assure those who suffer from sectarian suspicions that the assistant whom Khwaja Sahib has received with open arms is a Sunni and non-Ahmadi. We shall be glad to give further information to any one who asks for it and assist him in sending the funds to the Khwaja Sahib and to his assistant. But once more our eyes turn towards a woman, noble, brave and patriotic, to whom no one has appealed for a good cause in vain. Sultan Jahan Begam's is a name familiar to all who work for such causes, and if, by any chance Her Highness has not already made a liberal grant for this purpose, we are sure that she would do so now and that the support from Bhopal would be in proportion to Her Highness's well-known munificence. It seems to us that the time has come when in all public affairs of the Mussalman the lead should be taken by noble women like Her Highness the Begam Sahiba of Bhopal, like Mrs. Hakim-ud-Daulah (a lady who, we are told, possesses talents and learning equalled only by her zeal in all good causes and who contributed most liberally for the Turkish Relief Fund), like Mrs. Aqeel Bilgrami, and, last but not least, like Tyeba Begam Mrs. Khedive Jung. It is the women of Islam that are the foremost in all such enterprises and it is our experience that while retaining all their womanly grace they are far more manly also than men.

The Lonely Homestead.

I SHALL always look back with feelings of pleasurable regret to the cold weather of 39-00, most of which period I was employed on special duty making enquiries regarding cattle theft along the Jumna Khadir, that portion of it which lies in Muttra district and stretches away into Gurgaon and towards Delhi.

The work was of a most interesting nature and one escaped the daily scribbling, so common a feature of Police work either at headquarters or out on tour. Beyond making notes, to be utilised in framing a Report at the completion of my task, a pen was seldom in my hand, its place being more worthily occupied by gun or rifle, since capital sport was usually obtainable at every stage in my wanderings. The jhau held quantities of black partridge; muggur were wont to bask on sandbanks for a few hours of a morning, the lack of gheds in Muttra led to geese and duck frequenting backwaters of the Jumna, while on the wide usar plains adjoining the river large herds of black buck gave plenty of work for my rifle. A very intelligent Muhammedan Head Constable and a Hindu Constable belonging to the District accompanied me on my wanderings, and between us we managed to collect a mass of rather curious and interesting details concerning the cattle thief and his modus operandi. My Report however—on which I relied for earning some little kudos—was never heard of after its despatch to headquarters. Probably the lack of columns of statistics damned it in the eyes of officialdom, or some of the views it contained must have run counter to theories favoured by those in high places. Some day I must endeavour to reproduce the substance of my investigations, in the hope of the public according it more consideration than it met with from the authorities. I had held charge of Muttra all the hot weather, being relieved by a piece D. S. P.—I was a mere Assistant—in November, and had acquired a fairly intimate knowledge of the District, one of the most attractive in the Provinces for anybody keen on ancient Indian history and the traditions and old world customs prevalent among dwellers in the land of Krishna. Dacoities, the work of gangs from across the Bhurtpur border, aided by local budmashes, had been rather frequent during the year and afforded the Police plenty of work. When engaged in cases of that sort I naturally gathered a heap of information of a useful description from a professional standpoint, and became acquainted with most of the bad characters, and learnt the names of prominent leaders, so as to be in a position to form a good idea of what gang was responsible when a dacoity occurred. One almost invariably came across some feature in the case that served to connect it with another performance by the same lot of criminals, and the exact manner in which a dacoity was carried out differed according to whether it was the work of Mewatis or Minas from Bhurtpur, a gang from the adjoining part of Agra district or a sour de force of local men.

Encamped at the little Thana of Majhoi, situated on the right bank of the Jumna and with a huge stretch of low jungle a mile away which harboured a herd of wild cattle, a sowar arrived one afternoon with a letter from the Superintendent of Police directing me to join him at Sonkh—a Station within three miles of Bhurtpur boundary line.—to assist in tracing out a big dacoity that had taken place between that Thana and the town of Gobarthan, places about thirteen miles apart. A copy of the first Report and the English memorandum submitted in all cases of serious crime had been sent to me, and I amused myself after dinner—orders for marching next day having been issued—in reading those documents and consulting a large scale map I always kept in my office box. It was evident from the documents before me that the dacoits must have crossed the road at some point between Sonkh and Gobarthan, if they did not proceed along that highway when en route for the village which had been the scene of their operations. I suddenly recollected a well on that road, close to a walled garden, where resided a fakir with a far from unblemished reputation. That personage gave me cause to remember him, for when riding past his abode one hot evening in the Rains his particularly rude demeanour and truculent aspect had impressed the holy man on my memory. It seemed likely that the gang would halt at the well for a drink and smoke and the presence of a body of travellers at a lonely spot after sundown must have been remarked by the fakir, let him deny the fact as much as he liked. Majhoi was over thirty miles from Sonkh and I had some important business at Koni next morning, so I sent back the sowar with a note explaining that I would reach the Superintendent's camp the evening of the second day and suggesting that the Circle Inspector might do worse than interview the fakir in question. I also sent my Head Constable on ahead to try and gather some information "on his own", directing him to wear plain clothes and let the fact of his belonging to the Police be a secret for the time being. As a rule it is most unwise to work

"unbeknownst" to the officer directly in charge of an investigation, for he generally detects such procedure and, feeling that he does not possess your confidence, ceases to exert himself more than is absolutely necessary and declines to act on his own initiative. However, the Thanadar at Sonkh was a fine specimen of an Oudh Thakur, had worked with me in several dacoity cases that year, so was not likely to misunderstand my motive in sending the Head Constable to make a few enquiries on the quiet. Arriving at the camp of the Superintendent of Police on the date promised, I found the Junt Sahib also present, and it was a treat to meet some Europeans again after my solitary rambles along the khadir. That evening I interviewed the Circle Inspector, an officer of fine detective ability and one of the extremely few Indian subordinates who did not hesitate to tell you things as they actually were; what is termed the "kachcha hal" of a case. Trusting on his confidence not being abused, and sure that proper use would be made in due course of the information he furnished, this Inspector was as good a Police officer as I met during all my service in the Department. Loyal to his immediate superiors and fearless in the execution of his duty, he was brutally murdered in the Kotwali at Bareilly some few years later. Ignorant of the noble art of self-advertisement, he never trumpeted forth the services he rendered, but—for my part—I freely admit that a large portion of the praise I received for work at Muttra was justly due to the sound advice and prompt obedience to orders on the part of poor Shabbir Hussain. To return to the Sonkh dacoity. As the Head Constable had not rejoined me, the Inspector and I agreed—after consultation with the Station officer—to await the advent of my Head Constable, men having gone out in various directions in search of news, while others were at the scene of the dacoity where the preliminary proceeding of the usual investigation were being completed.

The following morning the Inspector came to my tent soon after daylight and had important tidings to reveal, supplied him by the Head Constable who had reached Sonkh late the previous night. The latter had visited several villages along the border, pretending to be seeking for a camel that had gone astray, but in reality to try and get a clue to the movements of bad characters suspected of belonging to a dacoit gang or who, at any rate, were cognisant of men who did so. His inquiries proved fruitless to a great extent, though he discovered that—as I surmised—ten or twelve persons had been noticed sitting at the well near the bagh of the Fakir, a party of pilgrims returning from Gobarthan—one of the sacred spots in Muttra—having encountered these strangers and had a brief conversation with them. When within a mile of Sonkh, the Head Constable's attention was drawn to a couple of houses standing apart from other habitations and partially hidden by an encircling hedge of tall bamboos. The nearest village was over a mile distant and the hamlet intervened, so he thought it would be as well to ascertain the sort of people who lived remote from their neighbours. The men of the house—of whom he saw three—did not give him a hearty welcome and seemed doubtful as to the truth of his story concerning the missing camel. He could not obtain access to the house and had to rest content with a few minutes conversation ere he went on his way to the Thana. When questioned the Station Officer could not at first locate the dwelling referred to, but soon remembered the place about which we were enquiring. It was a fairly large homestead, jointly owned by four Mahomedans, who stood to one another in the relationship of brothers and cousins. Their names did not figure on any of the Thana records nor was anything known against their character. All the same, the Head Constable appeared so convinced that there was something fishy about these men, and in Police work—as elsewhere—it is the unexpected that often happens, that Shabbir Hussain and I resolved to pay an early morning visit to the place and search the premises. If the inhabitants of the house were honest folk, such proceeding would be an additional proof of righteousness for them, and if they were mixed up with dacoits the public would gain by their being brought to justice. In order to reach the homestead before any of its inmates were stirring, or left their charpoys for the fields, it was necessary to start from the camp at a terribly unseasonable hour, shortly after 4 a. m. It was a bitterly cold night, a wintry moon shedding its ghostly light across the open plain we had to traverse to reach our destination. Quitting the cart-road, we walked along the little paths that exist in all village lands and by which field labourers proceed to and from their daily toil. A sudden rustling in the tall arkar plantation betrayed a herd of deer, disturbed in their nocturnal feast on the crops; but beyond those startled animals we neither saw any living thing nor even heard a village cur bark. It was "false dawn" when we reached the place and sat beneath a fine peepul tree in front of the building, awaiting daylight when one could demand admittance and be sure that none of the household contrived to get away unobserved. We had not been there long when the main gate, leading into the big courtyard, opened and a man coming out went to a well for some water. He did not notice our little party, so was considerably surprised to be stopped on his way back and told who we were, while he was ordered to take us inside the enclosure and at once collect the rest of the household. In the centre of the yard—round which long low sheds and dwelling apartments formed a quadrangle, with a byre for cattle at one end—a fire was smouldering which we soon stirred up and enjoyed the welcome heat afforded by the flames. There were four men in the house, no women-folk nor any servants except a bhishti. Three of those persons were brothers, dour caterans who said nothing but sat in moody silence eyeing their visitors with a gaze of unconcealed hatred and wrath. Directly it was light enough, I sent a constable to fetch two witnesses from the nearest village, so as to conduct the search in accordance with the rules prescribed by law. Meanwhile I went up a rude flight of steps on to a terrace that ran round three sides of the courtyard and was in fact the roof of the rooms beneath. With me was an Orderly, an Afridi from Swat Bonair who had found his way to Muttra from Blurtpur some time back and had enlisted in the Armed Police, bringing about half a dozen of his countrymen later on to follow his example. With them the personal factor reckoned before anything else, and I found them capital men for the Armed Branch, if they required more careful handling than the average Indian recruit. His quick eyes spotted an object inserted in some thatching that covered a portion of the terrace and further examination revealed the hidden article to be a tulwar.

This was first blood to our side, and when the two "respectable persons" arrived to witness the search, we set to work in the hope of unearthing more weapons and possibly some stolen property. Our anticipations were not doomed to disappointment, since during the next two hours we found more tulwars, half a dozen guns and pistols of sorts, and a queer weapon composed of a small round buckler fastened between two black buck horns, the tips of the latter furnished with steel points so as to stab an opponent in a fight at close quarters. Most of the firearms were buried below the manger where the cattle fed, but their comparative freedom from rust showed that they had been in use at no distant date. Then one commenced finding a different class of goods, silver ornaments artfully placed in the earthen walls of the rooms, carefully plastered over with mud to retain them in situ. Digging up the floor in one of the sheds we unearthed a pile of umbrellas, evidently never used, and which one of the search witnesses promptly claimed as his property, stolen from him when returning from a weekly bazar a short time ago. There was hardly one shed that did not yield its tale of stolen goods chiefly ornaments of Indian pattern, anklets, wristlets, nose-rings, and so forth. The cousin mentioned above was a much younger man than his relatives and showed greater alarm at our proceedings than did the older culprits. When he saw the heap of recovered property gradually increasing in size, he signed to the Inspector his desire to make some communication to him, and then declared his wish to point out where things were concealed on condition of being accepted as Queen's Evidence. No Police officer is empowered to hold out hopes of pardon or make promises to that effect, besides the case struck me as too firmly established to need bolstering up by a confession, and I warned the would-be informer accordingly. However, he probably felt that he had committed himself in the opinion of the other members of the family, so took us to a little drain where after a spell of removing brick and draining off some very dirty water Monsieur le Cousin drew out a couple of really handsome silver chains, followed by a few trinkets of lesser value. It was midday by the time the search had reached this stage, and I was glad when a man arrived with myiffin basket containing sandwiches and a drink. News had also been sent to the Joint Magistrate, who kindly rode over, a step that I calculated on to checkmate the usual assertions of Pleaders for the defence to the effect that the wicked Police themselves plant stolen property in order to secure the conviction of poor honest people. It was almost dark before our business was finished, the four accused marched off in safe custody to the Sonkh Police Station, and our find conveyed to the same place in a cart I commandeered for the purpose. The Lower Court committed the prisoners to Sessions and one had no fears about the result of the trial. But I failed to take into account the peculiar working of the judicial mind and the Judge in question (long since retired) took a view of the case as extraordinary as it was unexpected. The Defence counsel produced some Ruling bearing on Hindn law, whereby the inmates of a common dwelling are not responsible for the actions of their fellow tenants. The unlucky cousin, least culpable of the quartette, adhered to his resolution to make a clean breast of the affair and related the dacoities in which he and his relation had taken part. Better for him had he preserved silence on that, and other points, for the Judge sentenced him to seven years imprisonment and acquitted the remaining three men on the ground that although inhabiting the same house they were not necessarily aware of the evil practices of their youthful relative. The hypothesis possessed quaint features, as it must have been based on the theory of one individual bringing stolen goods galore to the common courtyard and concealing them in a score of different parts of the homestead without being perceived by the other inmates. Further he must have dug up floors and hidden guns and tulwars without any suspicion of such conduct being aroused. Legal expenses perhaps punished the family to a certain extent but a wilder travesty of justice I have seldom come across even in this land of perverse verdicts. The Inspector had a good entry recorded in his Character Roll; some monetary rewards were paid to the subordinate police engaged in the search etc, and a complimentary note from the Inspector-General formed my share of the satisfactory results of our raid on the Lonely Homestead.

Aligarh Wins the Beighton Hockey Cup.

IN brilliant weather and in the presence of the biggest crowd that has ever watched a game of hockey not only in Calcutta, but in India, too, for that matter, fully fifteen thousand people having foregathered on the Calcutta grounds, was the final of the season's Beighton Tournament concluded on Saturday, the Aligarh College triumphing over Jamalpur by three goals to two. Indeed the size of the crowd reminded one more of a football match than even a hockey final, despite the fact that the latter game has taken a great hold over the city of recent years. The most remarkable thing about the attendance was their non-partisan spirit, neither of the finalists being local teams, and it speaks volumes for the sportsmanship of the Calcutta crowd that even having had no interest whatever in the final issue, they had come down in their thousands, determined to cheer every bit of good play, it mattered not whichever side were responsible therefor. And they did applaud every bit of good play they saw, and of brilliant play there was quite enough on either side, so that the cheering was almost continuous from the time the teams took the field right up to the finish.

The seating arrangements on the Calcutta ground were, as usual of the best, Mr. C. R. Clayton having marked off a number of enclosures on the western side for the convenience of C. F. C. members and their friends the League Clubs, the Jamalpur and Aligarh visitors, and the military, while separate arrangements obtained on the other three sides of the ground. The turf was in the pink of condition.

Before appearing in the final, Aligarh met and defeated the Police in the second round by 4—2, Calcutta, in the third round by 1—0 and the Customs "B" in the semi-final, after extra time had been played, by 2—0. Jamalpur, on the other hand had disposed of the E. I. R. Apprentices (Lilloah) in the second round by 10—0, which stands as a record score for the season's tournament, the Medicals by 2—1 in the third round and the Customs "A" in the semi-final by 1—0 after a draw of 1—1, in which extra time was gone through.

JAMALPUR'S GAME.

Saturday's final furnished one of the most exciting contests that have ever been witnessed in the Beighton Cup. No fewer than five goals were scored, Aligarh leading at half-time by 2—0, Jamalpur scoring once on crossing over, before the College netted again, while almost on time the Railway added another goal. When the students led by 2—0, many thought that they would have a run away victory, like the Customs achieved a few years ago against Calcutta, but Jamalpur recovered wonderfully and gave their opponents as stiff a fight as they had ever had. The game was a very fast one—indeed a faster game has not been seen during the season—and it is a wonder how the teams stood the great pace right through, while as a scientific exposition of hockey the game would be hard to beat. The finer points of the game were being demonstrated by either side almost every minute, and the enthusiast wished for nothing more.

Aligarh were undoubtedly the better side during the first half, but in the second, either team attacked alternately, and Jamalpur had, if anything, the best of the exchanges. The fact that they had been a couple of goals down at the interval had no effect on Jamalpur except that of infusing fresh life into their movements. Each set of forwards missed open goals, due to over-eagerness to score.

PLAY AND PLAYERS.

As forecasted in these columns on Saturday, Aligarh proved themselves the better-balanced side and won as such. Their forward play was magnificent, superior in point of combination to that of Jamalpur who were more brilliant individually. Curiously enough the outside left of either team did not shine in comparison with the rest of the respective attacking lines. Anwar Ali, Fatch Mohamed, Mustafa and Asad for Aligarh and Alexander, Piggott, Boileau and Rogers on the other side were all at the top of their form. A better centre-forward than Boileau has not figured in the season's tournament. Alexander's centres were real beauties. Asad Ali's command over the stick was admirable. It was at half and at back that Jamalpur were really beaten, though few could notice it. The Jamalpur trio worked very hard indeed, but their display lacked that finish which was Aligarh's own. Calistan, the Apprentice's centre-half, has done better, and it is a pity the support he received was not of the best. The Aligarh halves, on the other hand, were a happy family, and Azher Ali and Mahbub at centre and left respectively were brilliant. Jamalpur had a great back in Mills on the right, but Jordon was decidedly "off colour." Both the College backs were superb and indeed there was not one weak spot in the team. Gasper and Aga Meerza, the respective goal-keepers, were responsible for some very excellent saves and neither can be blamed for the shots that went past them.

SIXTH INDIAN WIN.

This is not the first time that the Cup has been won by an Indian team, but the Aligarh College are the second Indian combination to achieve the feat. During the twenty years that the trophy has been fought for it has been annexed by Indians half-a-dozen times, the famous Ranchi eleven having held it on five occasions namely, in 1897, 1898, 1903, 1906 and 1907, and on Saturday, another Indian victory was registered. This was the first time that either Aligarh or Jamalpur have appeared in the final, both having taken part in the competition several times before.

FIRST HALF.

Aligarh were the first to appear, and they were closely followed by Jamalpur, both teams being loudly applauded. Boileau and Mustafa Hossain bullied off at 5-21, Jamalpur defending the garden-end goal. The game was started with one referee and an old ball, and there was nothing in the opening play until Boileau got down and collided with Azher Ali both falling. Pigott received and all but got through, Rahmat effecting a clearance. Asad Ali transferred play on the College left but was sent back by Mills. Another rush by Aligarh was stemmed by Calistan, after which Fateh Mohamed forced an unproductive corner. Calistan intercepted a pass by Imamuddin to the forwards, and Aligarh were having the best of the deal until Boileau got down on his own, being robbed in the circle. Alexander, who obtained possession, failed to centre, and Anwar Ali and Fateh-Mohamed invaded the Railway circle, forcing a short corner. The ball was beautifully placed and Azher Ali put through with a splendid shot eight minutes from the start. Great cheering followed. The pressure on the Jamalpur goal was maintained and Mustafa had hard lines in not scoring, the ball just going behind. A little later Jamalpur threw away an excellent chance of scoring, Alexander centring well, but the rest of the forwards missed the ball. In succession Alexander put in another centre for Azher Ali to hit away. Jamalpur were awarded a "free" in their opponents "twenty-five", but Alexander's shot went behind, and another invasion of the Jamalpur citadel followed—a beautiful piece of combination on the part of the forwards—and Mustafa, having had time enough to steady himself, aided the second goal fourteen minutes from the start. Tremendous cheering signalled the incident. The game continued to be very fast, and Alexander had hard lines in being pulled up for "off-side." Fateh Mohamed forced a corner, and after Sadiq Hossain had been penalised for "sticks", Asad Ali got down in fine style, displaying rare stick work, but Mills again came to the rescue of his side. Boileau next distinguished himself with an excellent sprint, but was beaten back by Sadiq Hossain, and the Aligarh forwards again assumed the aggressive, forcing another corner which, however, yielded nothing. Alexander made another capital run right through the defence before passing to Pigott, who centred right across, but none could accept it. Jordon broke up a combined run by Asad and Mustafa, while Mills was responsible for stopping Fateh Mohamed. Anwar Ali was very tricky on the right and caused Jordon no end of trouble. Receiving in mid-field, Asad got away beautifully and had only Gasper to beat when the latter rushed out and kicked away. Just before half-time was called, Aga Meerza saved splendidly from Boileau, and the interval saw the teams placed thus:—

Aligarh—Two goals.

Jamalpur—Nil.

SECOND HALF.

A new ball was provided when the game was resumed, and hard exchange hitting characterised the first two minutes' play. The first man to get prominent was Pigott, who was robbed in the circle, but the ball went out to Rogers, who dribbled through the backs and reduced the margin with a beauty. Boileau all but equalised the next minute—the game had not been resumed five minutes yet—but he lost his stick just as he was going to shoot. Jamalpur were pressing and Pigott experienced hard luck in being ruled "off-side"—a decision which did not go unchallenged. From the ensuing "free" Asad Ali broke away and was only stopped in the circle by Nicholas. Jamalpur attacked again and obtained a corner, Aga Meerza saving a hot one from Rogers. Asad Ali was again conspicuous for a brilliant run, and when he had beaten everybody but Gasper, the latter rushed out in the nick of time and prevented a certain goal. Porthouse similarly livened up matters on the Jamalpur left, but he lost to Imamuddin. Anwar and Fateh Mohamed combined, and the latter passed to Mustafa, who was adjudged "off-side." Alexander twice centred beautifully, forcing a corner the second occasion, but the Aligarh defence could not be easily beaten again. Going down well together, the Aligarh forwards again invaded the Jamalpur "twenty-five." Mustafa appeared to be "off-side," an appeal being preferred, but not heeded, and Anwar and Fateh Mohamed combining, the latter put on the third College goal amidst deafening cheers, fifteen minutes from the resumption. At the other end Porthouse claimed a corner, which was disallowed, and a couple of "off-side" rulings against each side followed. Off a corner against the College, Boileau sent behind. Mills stopped Mustafa. Jamalpur were triers to the bitter end and, although they were a couple of goals down worried the College defence beyond measure. Boileau once rushed down but was penalised, and the Aligarh forwards had again a look in. Alexander transferred play, losing to Sadiq Hossain. Anwar Ali ran down the College right and passed on the line to Fateh Mohamed, who had only Gasper to beat, but he gave "carried," and a splendid chance was lost. Pigott was pulled up for "off-side." A couple of minutes from the close, Pigott, breaking through in fine style, scored Jamalpur's second goal, and although each side tried their best to score again they failed, and Aligarh won, the final score reading:

Aligarh—Three goals.

Jamalpur—Two goals.

The teams were:—

Aligarh College:—Aga Meerza (goal); Rahmat Khan and Sadiq Hossain (backs); Imamuddin Hyder, Azher Ali and Mahbub Alam (halves); Anwar Ali, Fateh Mohamed Khan, Mustafa Hossain, Asad Ali and Altaf Hossain Khan (forwards).

Jamalpur:—Gasper (goal); Mills and Jordon (backs); Nicholas, Calistan and Woolman (halves); Alexander, Pigott, Boileau, Rogers and Porthouse (forwards).

Referees:—Messrs. A. B. Rosser and E. Studd.

THE PRESENTATION.

At the conclusion of the game, Sir Lawrence Jenkins, who presided, and had keenly watched the game from start to finish, rose amidst cheers to make a short speech before the prizes were given away. "I have been asked," said the Chief Justice, "to give a short summing-up before the presentations are made. I have always been accustomed to give a lengthy one (laughter). This is hockey, and not football, and I don't think it requires a very lengthy speech, and there are no gold medals to be given away, but silver ones. Still the wishes are the same. There was only a single goal's difference between the teams. The game was a very good one, and although Jamalpur displayed first-rate form, they did not get as many goals as Aligarh." "Let us not congratulate the winners the less," continued Sir Lawrence, "because they do not live in Calcutta, but come from Aligarh, which used to be in the North-West Provinces of Bengal." The Chairman complimented Jamalpur on the fine exhibition of hockey they had given and expressed the hope that both the winners and the losers would come down again next year, though they might not meet as they had met that evening.

Mrs. Richardson, wife of Mr. T. H. Richardson, President of the Bengal Hockey Association, then distributed the various hockey prizes of the season. The Aligarh College received the Beighton Cup and the Bengal Hockey Championship Cup, besides eleven silver medals. Now that the Cup has been taken away for the first time since 1907 it can reasonably be hoped that next year the number of entries will be larger.

THE AFTERMATH.

The scene at the end of the match was unique. The Aligarh team, being all Mahomedans, hundreds of their co-religionists watching the game made a dash for the C. F. C. enclosure, and Mr. Clayton had all his work cut out to preserve order. The invasion was a short-lived one, but there were quite a number of stalwarts, who braver than the rest, presented themselves before the winners and garlanded everyone of them, the whole team being eventually carried shoulder high across the maidan amidst frantic cheering. It was quite dark when the crowd melted away, satisfaction being expressed on all sides at witnessing a most stirring struggle.

Indians in South Africa.

The Commission's Report.

We give below some of the salient points from the Report—

On the Community's Abstention

Unfortunately the main object which the Commission had in view in recommending the release of Messrs. Gandhi, Polak and Kallenbach was, to a great extent, frustrated by the attitude taken up by these persons.

So far from assisting the Commission by placing before it the case for the Indian Community for the redress of alleged grievances and by collecting evidence in support of the serious allegations of acts of violence committed upon persons sentenced to imprisonment in connection with the strike, the leaders decided, on various grounds which it is unnecessary to mention, entirely to ignore the Commission. The result was that not only was the Indian community not represented by counsel, but that, acting upon the advice given by Mr. Gandhi, no witnesses appeared to substantiate the charges of violence.

Fortunately, during the latter end of our sitting, a few Indians, chiefly from the Mohamedan section of that community, who represented the Natal Indian Congress, did appear before us and gave evidence of considerable value and importance. At a latter stage of the Enquiry, when the Commission sat in Cape Town from the 23rd to the 27th February, several other Indians presented themselves who claimed to represent various societies, three of them having travelled from the Transvaal for that purpose. These persons were, we think, well advised to refuse to follow the advice given by Mr. Gandhi to his fellow-countrymen to ignore the Commission. By appearing and giving evidence they were able to give us important information on certain subjects, and, by doing so, they, in our opinion, rendered considerable service to the Indian community.

On the Causes of the Strike

The documentary evidence as contained in the various Blue-books, which have been placed at our disposal, makes it clear that the strike was immediately due to dissatisfaction on the part of the leaders of the Indian Community with the provisions of the Immigrants Regulation Act, 1913.

Being unable to obtain from the Minister what he considered to be satisfactory assurances on these points, Mr. Gandhi deliberately decided to take the grave steps which immediately led to the strike and the subsequent disturbances which are the subject of this enquiry. In his letter of the 28th September, which closed the correspondence between the Minister and himself, he informs the former that the step which he purposes to take "consists in actively, persistently and continually asking those who are liable to pay the £3 tax to decline to do so and to suffer the penalties for non-payment, and, what is more important, in asking those who are now serving under indentures and who will, therefore, be liable to pay the £3 tax on completion of the indentures, to strike work until the tax is withdrawn."

This is the first occasion on which, in the course of the correspondence already referred to, mention was made of the £3 tax. It was a matter, however, on which there can be no doubt that many of the Indians felt very strongly, and it had been one of the chief subjects of discussion between the Union Government and Mr. Gokhale when he visited South Africa in 1912. The feeling of the Indians on this subject had been much aggravated by the statements made to them that the Union Government had promised Mr. Gokhale that a Bill would be introduced in the next session of Parliament to repeal the tax.

When, therefore, no such Bill was introduced and when, in addition, the Government repudiated having made any promise to that effect, the result was that there was grave disappointment on the part of the Indian community, especially in Natal. It is impossible for us in this Enquiry to enter into the controversy which has arisen on the subject of the promise alleged to have been made to Mr. Gokhale; it is sufficient for our purpose to state that the Indians had been led to believe that such a promise had been made and that on failure to introduce the expected legislation there was considerable feeling on their part against the Government.

There were other matters affecting Indians which we were invited by certain witnesses to investigate, but which, in our opinion, did not fall within the scope of our reference. Our enquiry into alleged grievances is limited to those which in any way contributed to the strike. We have no authority to investigate and to make recommendations upon the general position of Indians in the Union, and the disabilities under which they suffer.

There was one other subject, however, upon which, though we at first felt some doubt as to whether it was within the terms of our reference, we ultimately decided to hear evidence. Complaints were made that the laws of the Union, more especially the Immigration and Licensing Acts, were being administered against Indians in a harsh and unsympathetic manner. That was one of the subjects specially referred to in a letter from Mr. Cachalia, the Chairman of the British Indian Association, to the Secretary of the Interior, dated 12th August, 1913, and published in Blue Book C. D. 7111, page 26, in which he formally notifies the Government that the Indian Community purpose again to have recourse to passive resistance, and in which he states that the struggle will be continued so long as, amongst other things, "a spirit of generosity and justice does not pervade the administration of the existing laws referred to therein."

The same subject is referred to in other communications that took place between the Indian leaders and the Government, and in his letter of the 21st January, 1914, in which Mr. Gandhi intimates to the Minister his intention not to take part in the proceedings before the Commission, he sums up the points on which relief is sought, as follows:—

- (1) The Orange Free State question.
- (2) The Cape Colony question.
- (3) The Marriage question.
- (4) Repeal of the £3 tax.
- (5) An assurance that existing laws, especially affecting Indians, will be administered justly and with due regard to vested rights.

In view of these circumstances, we came to the conclusion that we were justified in extending the scope of our Enquiry so as to include an investigation into the subject of the administration of the Immigration and Licensing Laws.

We feel bound, however, in view of the terms of reference to limit our investigation to the five subjects specified above, and to eliminate from our enquiry such questions as the following, which we were invited by various witnesses to consider:

- (a) That the Transvaal Laws prohibiting Asiatics from becoming the owners of fixed property and from acquiring rights under the Gold Law should be repealed;
- (b) That it should be illegal for the Government to insert in grants and leases of land in townships in the Transvaal a clause prohibiting the transfer or sub-letting of the land to Asiatics;
- (c) Such general questions as the alleged want of proper educational facilities for the children of Asiatics; their inability to carry firearms, to ride in trains in the Transvaal, etc.

None of these matters in our opinion had any effect in bringing about the strike and most of them could only be dealt with by legislation and not by administrative action, so that we do not consider that they fall within the scope of our enquiry.

That being so, we now proceed to discuss the five subjects set forth by Mr. Gandhi in his final letter of the 21st January, 1914.

The Orange Free State Question

This has already been referred to, and, in view of the assurances given by the Minister on the subject it is somewhat difficult to understand why it has been resuscitated. The only point that can be made regarding it is, that inasmuch as under Section 7 of the Act of 1913 educated Indians entering the Free State become subject to Section 8 of Chapter 33 of the Free State Law Book, which amongst other things requires that a declaration shall be made before a Resident Magistrate, and inasmuch as it has been agreed by the Minister that no such declaration shall in future be required, it might be advisable to amend Section 7 of the Act so as to make this perfectly clear.

The Cape Entry Question

It is clear that, if the provisional settlement of 1911 did in fact safeguard the existing rights of Indians, then in strict law there has been a breach of that agreement. Unfortunately the terms of this settlement are not set forth specifically in any formal document, but are to be gathered from two letters which passed between the Private Secretary to the Minister and Mr. Gandhi on the 28rd April, 1911.

It has been pointed out that in the letter of the Private Secretary of the 22nd April, there was no direct assurance that existing rights would be maintained, but there is no doubt that Mr. Gandhi and the Indian Community generally understood that this was one of the terms of the settlement. This appears from many letters subsequently written by Mr. Gandhi to the Minister and specially from certain correspondence which took place between them in January and February, 1912, and subsequently in July and August, 1913. For example, in Mr. Gandhi's letter of the 24th August, 1913, he states specifically that "the correspondence setting forth the provisional settlement of 1911 protected all existing rights of the British Indians." Statements to the same effect are made in other letters, and never on any occasion was this claim repudiated by the Minister. In fact, a perusal of the correspondence leaves the impression that this was common cause between the parties, and was never the subject of controversy.

Then, if that be so, it follows that by restricting the entry of Indians born in South Africa into the Cape Colony to those who can satisfy the educational requirements of Act 30, of 1906, there has been a departure from the provisional settlement of 1911. At the same time it is clear from Mr. Gandhi's own letters to the Minister that there is very little substance in this alleged grievance.

Looking at the whole subject from a practical point of view, we have come to the conclusion that no good purpose could be gained by recommending that this shadowy grievance should be remedied by amending the Act of 1912, so as to restore the right of South African born Indians to enter the Cape without undergoing the educational test therein provided.

Before leaving the subject we might refer to a point to which our attention was directed by Sir Benjamin Robertson. Section 4, (2) (a) of the Act of 1913, which deals with the educational requirements of the Cape and Natal Provinces, makes provision for those who were, at the commencement of the Act, lawfully entitled to reside in any Province. It was pointed out that the right conferred by that section would not strictly avail any person who became lawfully entitled to reside in any Province after the Act came into force, as for example, a child born after the commencement of the Act of Indians domiciled in South Africa.

It is indeed difficult to see what good purpose is served by the inclusion in the Section of the words "at the commencement of the Act," and they might very well be deleted.

Administration of Existing Laws

We have now reached the fifth and last of the alleged grievances which have been formulated by Mr. Gandhi in his letter to the Minister of the 21st January, 1911, in which he requires "an assurance that the existing laws especially affecting Indians will be administered justly and with due regard to vested rights." The representations which have been made to us on this subject deal mainly with the Immigration and Licensing Acts, and, as already stated, we propose to confine ourselves to those subjects.

The Immigration Act

The complaints against the administrative methods of the Immigration Department were fairly numerous, chiefly in the Cape Colony. In respect of some of them we were not satisfied that they have been established and we do not propose to make any reference to such. There are others, however, in regard to which we are of opinion that grievances do exist and we propose to deal with these as shortly as possible.

The Licensing Act

Representations were made to the Commission regarding the administration of the Acts with reference to the grant of licenses to carry on trade or business in the Cape Colony and in Natal.

We do not, however, see our way to making any recommendations on this subject which are likely to be of any use.

No evidence was laid before us as to the administration of the licensing laws in other towns of the Cape Colony or in the country districts, and we have, therefore, no observations to make on that subject.

As regards Natal, the system is somewhat different from that which obtains in the Cape Colony.

The evidence before us is to the effect that the Act is not so strictly administered against Indians in the Natal boroughs as it is in Cape Town, but that it is becoming more and more difficult for Indians to obtain new licenses except in those quarters of the towns which are inhabited almost exclusively by them, and which may be regarded as Asiatic reserves. In some other parts of the towns it is almost impossible now for Indians to obtain new licenses.

As regards the rest of Natal outside of the boroughs and townships, there is one licensing officer, who is a Government official, and from whose decision an appeal lies to the licensing board. His policy towards Indians is far more liberal than that of the licensing officers in the boroughs. In fact, he informs us that he makes no distinctions between Europeans and Indians.

A fact of some interest which was elicited from this witness is that, where applications for new licenses are made by Indians, more than 50 per cent. of the objections come from other Indians.

We had no complaint regarding the grant of new licenses from this licensing officer, the complaints being directed entirely against the administration of the Act in the boroughs and townships. We do not see our way, however, to make any recommendations on this subject. Nothing can be done which would be of any effect except by legislation, and, for the reasons already given when dealing with the grant of licenses in Cape Town, we are unable to suggest any amendment of the laws.

We have now dealt with all the grievances formulated by Mr. Gandhi in his letter to the Minister of the Interior, but before closing, we think that it is desirable to summarise the various recommendations that appear in different parts of the report.

Some of these recommendations will require legislation to give effect to them whilst others can be sufficiently dealt with by administrative action.

They are as follows:—

(1) Section 5 (g) of the Immigration Regulation Act of 1913 should be amended so as to bring the law into conformity with the practice of the Immigration Department, which is: "To admit one wife and minor children by her of an Indian now entitled to reside in any Province, or who may in the future be permitted to enter the Union, irrespective of the fact that his marriage to such wife may have been solemnised according to tenets that recognise polygamy, or that she is one of several wives married abroad so long as she is his only wife in South Africa."

(2) Instructions should be given to the Immigration Officer to open registers in each Province for the registration by Indians of, say, three or more years' residence in South Africa, who have at present or have had in the past, more than one wife living with them in South Africa, of the names of such wives, who are to be free to travel to and from India with the minor children so long as the husband continues to reside in this country.

(3) There should be legislation on the lines of Act 16 of 1860 of the Cape Colony making provision for the appointment of marriage officers from among the Indian priests of different denominations for the purpose of solemnising marriages in accordance with the respective religions of the parties.

(4) There should be legislation for the validation by registration of existing de facto monogamous marriages, by which are understood the marriage of one man with one woman, under a system which recognises the right of the husband to marry one or more other wives.

(5) Section 6 of Act 17 of 1895 of Natal which requires certain Indians to take out year by year a pass or license to remain in the Colony and which provides for the payment of £8 a year for such license should be repealed.

(6) Conditions under which identification certificates under the Immigrants Regulation Act of 1913 are issued should be amended so as to provide that such certificates shall remain in force for a period of three years instead of one year.

(7) An Interpreter should be attached to the office of the Immigration Department in Capetown who should be a whole-time officer.

(8) Application forms for permits, certificates, etc., from the Immigration Department should be filled in by the clerk in the office upon information supplied to him by the applicant, if the latter so desires.

(9) The practice at present existing in the Capetown office of this Department of taking in certain cases prints of all the fingers of both hands, instead of the thumbs only, should be discontinued.

(10) The Resident Magistrate of a district in which there is no immigration officer should have authority to issue temporary permits to Indians residing in his district who desire to travel from the Province in which they are living to another Province of the Union.

(11) The present fee of £1 for an identification certificate or temporary permit should be materially reduced and no charge should be made for any extension.

(12) The present practice of the immigration officer of one Province of communicating by telegraph with the immigration officer of another Province when an application is made by an Indian for a permit to travel from one Province to the other should be discontinued.

(13) Domicile certificates which have been issued to Indians in Natal by the immigration officer of that Province, and which bear the thumb impression of the holder of the permit, should be recognised as conclusive evidence of the right of the holder to enter the Union as soon as his identity has been established.

(14) An arrangement should, if possible, be made with the Government of India for the holding of official inquiries by the magistrate or other Government official in the case of women and children proceeding from India to join their husbands and fathers in South Africa. If, on inquiry, the official is satisfied that the woman and children are the wife and children of the man in South Africa whom they claim as husband or father, a certificate should be given by him to that effect, and such certificate should be treated by the immigration officer as conclusive evidence of the facts stated in it.

Florence Nightingale on India.

In 1874 Miss Nightingale completed the first proofs of a volume dealing with irrigation in India, to which she gave the title of The Zemindar, the Sun, and the Watering Pot, as affecting life and death in India, thereby affirming that salvation may be found for the ryot, provided he has a seasonable supply of the water needed to secure the benefits of an unfailing sun and a fertile soil. While pursuing her health crusade throughout the world, she had realised painfully the responsibility of England towards India, and she was stung with pity for the preventable disease and death which overtake the gentle and industrious Indian peasantry. The deaths were to be counted not by thousands, or tens of thousands, or hundreds of thousands, but by millions; and Miss Nightingale, from her wide experience of sanitary work, was convinced that the remedy was to be found in improving the economic condition of the masses, rather than in any temporary measures of relief. To her mind the logical sequence was clear: the mortality is caused by starvation and unhealthy surroundings; the want of food and the absence of sanitation are the result of the ryot's extreme poverty; in India the "treasure hid in a field" is the wealth that irrigation brings; and the effective means of relieving the ryot's extreme poverty is to be found in the right use of water, which is abundant in India, but needs suitable storage and distribution. Irrigation with drainage; canal and river navigation; and pure drinking water—these were her watchwords; the result for the people to be abundant crops, cheap transit for food, water power for industries, cleanliness, health, comfort, and happiness. Stimulated by such thoughts, Miss Nightingale, a past-master in statistics, studied the facts and the figures contained in Blue-books and official reports; she formed her conclusions in personal consultation with such honoured and experienced administrators as Lord

Lawrence, Sir George Campbell, Sir Bartle Frere, Sir Arthur Cotton, Lord Napier, and Sir Richard Temple; and brought to her advocacy the acumen and boldness that distinguished all her practical activities.

Unfortunately, the "proofs" never received her final revision; and Sir Edward Cook, in his classic Life of Florence Nightingale, tells us that it was "a constant regret in her later years" that she had failed to carry out this work as she had planned it; "some of her friends—Sir Bartle Frere and Sir George Campbell and Sir Arthur Cotton—urged her to revise the book and publish it; and there are in existence a series of proofs in various stages, and belonging to various years, corrected by the three friends just mentioned and by many others. . . . Clearly the book, first written in 1874, required, in 1879, large revision, and she could not bring herself to do it. . . . but she never ceased to regret that she had not been able to leave in permanent literary form her views on the questions discussed in the book."

In her will, executed in 1896, she made special provision for the publication of "such part, if any", that her executors might think fit, of her writings regarding India, and Sir Edward Cook is of opinion that she meant principally this book written in 1874, and he considers that the materials thus collected might profitably be utilised to serve as Tracts for the Times. He further points out that some of the principal irrigation projects advocated by Miss Nightingale have, in subsequent years, been carried out with success; and that the area irrigated by productive canals has increased from $5\frac{1}{2}$ to 9 million acres. Such being the incidents of the case, the question is, How, in accordance with the purpose of its author, can the book be now best utilised to further the cause of irrigation, in the interest of the Indian people?

The executors have been so good as to consult me regarding the course to be pursued, and having carefully studied the proofs, I feel that it would be a grievous pity if India were to lose the benefit of the gifted lady's research, and of the constraining influence which attaches to her name. It is true that some parts of the book deal with controversies practically obsolete, but the main plea for the ryot is as true and vital as ever; indeed, since Miss Nightingale wrote, the urgency seems not less but greater, for the ryot's power of resistance has been shaken by successive disasters, and the mortality in later years has been on a larger scale from both famine and pestilence. Further, as regards future guidance, it is no small matter that the conclusions recorded in this book received the imprimatur of Lord Lawrence and other chief administrators responsible for India during the most critical period of the century just closed. As regards the form in which the case may best be brought before the public, it appears that a beginning may be made by publishing a summary (such as the present contribution) in the form of a magazine article, and inviting those skilled in Indian irrigation work to be so good as to bring the facts up-to-date, explaining to a lay audience, in popular terms, what has been accomplished, and what still remains to be done. Of special importance will be the conclusions arrived at by the Irrigation Commission, appointed in 1901, under the presidency of Sir Colin Scott-Moncrieff.

Miss Nightingale was very anxious to awaken the British public to a sense of their responsibility on this question, which is a matter of life and death to 200 millions of our fellow subjects, and those who realise this responsibility will be encouraged by the narrative in Sir Edward Cook's most admirable memoir, which shows the extraordinary influence for good that may be exercised by one brave-hearted and single-minded lady, though under the disabilities of seclusion and ill-health.

In preparing this summary, it will be convenient to group the materials under a few headings: A. The beneficial uses of water in India, including (1) irrigation, (2) navigation, and (3) drainage; B. geographical features in the different Provinces, and local conditions; and C. finance. Ordinarily, the portions shown in this article, under inverted commas, are Miss Nightingale's own text, where other authorities are quoted, they are extracted from the proofs.

A. THE BENEFICIAL USES OF WATER IN INDIA.

Among the benefits comes, first and foremost, the great fact that the wise use of water in India will preserve the people alive. As Sir John Strachey, Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, said in his Financial Minute of 1874: "Works of irrigation afford, in the majority of cases, the only real security against scarcity and famine." Where there is no water the people perish. People in England do not even now sufficiently realise the horror of Indian famines, and their increasing severity. As Miss Nightingale says, writing in 1875: "We must not suppose that famines in India are decreasing in extent or severity under our rule. On the contrary. The present famine in Bengal appears to be of more awful length, breadth, height, and depth than any before known, except,

"perhaps, that of Bengal a century ago, 1769-70, when 'one-third of the population of Bengal is believed to have been swept away.' She notes the mortality, estimated at a million, in the Orissa famine of 1866; the Rajputana famine of 1868-69, when $1\frac{1}{2}$ millions perished; and the Bengal famine of 1874. But since then her forecast of increasing death and disaster has been sadly verified by the famine of 1878, which cost South India five millions of her population; by the famine of 1897, which was then pronounced the severest on record; and by that of 1900, declared by Lord Curzon to be 'greater in intensity than any previously recorded visitation.' According to Miss Nightingale, if the water supply in India is properly utilised, 'periodical famines ought to be made impossible.'"

(1) Irrigation.

In India there can be no cultivation without water; and the problem of the ryot's salvation depends on the certainty—or uncertainty—of the water supply. In 1875 about one-seventh part of the whole cultivated area of India was protected, and rendered secure, by means of artificial irrigation works, canals, "tanks" (reservoirs), and wells; the remaining six-sevenths, known as "dry crop" land, was dependent for its single annual crop on the natural rainfall, which is in the highest degree precarious, both as to amount and regularity. The great mass of the ryots are, therefore, in perpetual jeopardy; always on the brink of famine, being dependent on the character of each year's season; if the rainfall is either insufficient or unseasonable, the crop is burnt up, and the people, unless relieved at the expense of the State, must perish miserably. This unhappy condition of affairs is little understood in England; and, accordingly, Miss Nightingale emphasises the fatal consequences of the uncertain rainfall, giving the facts and figures regarding various provinces, to show how the harvest in dry crop areas depends not so much on the total rainfall as on the absolute regularity of the showers needed in tropical cultivation. "How" she asks, "compress into few words the explanation that some of the wettest regions in the world, which have a fall of 10 to 30 inches more rain in the year than England, which is a very wet climate, are some of the driest regions in the world? For half the year's supply of rain falls in such regions sometimes in twenty-four hours, separated by fourteen days. . . . We have in the Carnatic 40 inches of rain; but so distributed that it is one of the driest regions in the world. We have several falls of 5 inches in the night, sometimes of 12; 22 inches have been known to fall in two nights, with an interval of a fortnight, so that we have had more than half our year's supply in that time; or equal to a whole year's rain in Norfolk thus falling in two showers. But for tanks such a region could not be made to support man to any extent. . . . The critical period of the season is from the middle of September to the end of October. If the rains cease by the middle of September, the great food harvest of the Lower Provinces (Bengal) is withered and burnt up. . . . Colonel Rundall R. E. (Head of the Indian Irrigation Department), tells us that in Orissa the rainfall reaches 60 inches. In 1865—the year of the famine—nearly 60 inches were registered at Cuttack; but the rains ceased on September 14th; the crops consequently perished. . . . The object of irrigation is to rectify this unequal distribution of water, to arrest that which would otherwise run to waste, distribute it to the lands where it is required, and store up in tanks as much as may be needed for use during the dry season."

Always eager for statistics, Miss Nightingale obtained from Captain Baring (now Lord Cromer), who was then Private Secretary to the Viceroy, an elaborate table of figures, showing how, in the various districts of Bengal, the famine was caused by the irregularity, not the shortage, of the rainfall. This table "shows that returns which only give the total rainfall over a period embracing some months are deceptive, and that it is seasonableness of rainfall, and not mere quantity of rain, that is required. If we compare the rainfall up to the end of August, 1873, with that of 1872 (an ordinary year, in which there was no failure of crops), it will be seen that, generally speaking, rain fell in 1873, taking the year through, in sufficient quantities for a fruitful harvest; but if we examine each fortnight during the important six weeks from September 1st to October 15th, during which the rice is maturing, it will be apparent that the rainfall in 1873 was very short. For instance, in Dinagepore only 1.06 inch fell in the first fortnight of September in 1873, against 6.49 inches in the same period in 1872. In Rungpore the proportion was still more marked, being 0.80 against 8.19. In Durbunga it was 2.86 against 7.08. In Motihari (Champaran) it was 0.65 against 10.23." Figures, again, were supplied by Colonel Greenaway, showing the fatal waste of the rainfall for want of storage and distribution. "The quantity that runs to waste is something enormous. One foot of rainfall on a square mile gives 1,032,532 cubic yards, or 174,239,975 gallons, and the rainfall during a monsoon may be averaged at 30 inches at least. . . . When

"Guntoor lost 200,000 by famine, a river was flowing through it which never fails, and which, in a single day, carries to the sea 4,000 million cubic yards of water; and as 6,000 cubic yards will secure a crop of rice on an acre, water enough was running to waste in one day, in that one river, in that very district, to secure 700,000 acres of rice, the food of 2½ millions of people for a year."

Dwelling on these facts and figures, which proved the deadly peril of so many millions of the peasantry, no wonder that the writer of this book became urgent, and even fierce, in her appeal to the Government to stop this fatal waste, and bring back the water to the thirsty land. Not only safety but wealth is to be found in irrigation, which can transform an uncertain "dry crop" of millet, worth, perhaps, five rupees an acre, into a certain "wet crop" of sugar-cane, worth at least 200 rupees. Stored and distributed the water now running to waste would bring to the cultivator a due reward for his "enduring toil," to the Government an increasing revenue, and to the masses security from a lingering and painful death. The chapter on Irrigation in the book has as its opening motto: "The fate of India, in regard to food, is wholly in the hands of its rulers."

(2) NAVIGATION.

Even in the worst famines there has never been an insufficiency of food in India as a whole. Owing to the wide difference in the conditions of the various great provinces, dearth in one area is usually accompanied by rich harvests in another; so that next in importance to the production of abundant harvests, comes the need for cheap and easy transit, to convey the surplus food to the hungry mouths. Irrigation must, therefore, go hand-in-hand with navigable canals. On this question of economic distribution of food, Miss Nightingale proceeds again by the Socratic method, and asks: "Do not in a poor country bulky goods of a low value form the great mass of traffic? Is not water-carriage generally the cheapest, the working expenses being so exceedingly small? The cost of transit generally on canals is ½d. per ton per mile. If an irrigation canal, connected with a Bengal river, be made navigable, does it not become accessible to the whole of the water system, upwards of 3,300 miles already? That the Bengalee is not slow to take advantage of this opportunity may be illustrated by the fact that, before the Midnapore Canal had been opened six months, native boats were plying on it from such distant places as Benares, Dacca, and Patna. Is not the main feature of Bengal traffic that the boat-owners are petty merchants trading on their own account, thus diffusing a wider trade more quickly than where boatmen are carriers only? The moment an article is in demand, is not the whole river plant set in motion to convey it from where it is to be had to where it is wanted? Boats, too, can stop at the exact place where there is a demand for their article, and can serve as warehouses till their cargoes are discharged. Look at the amount of traffic on the Ganges, even by the side of the railway; 10,000 boats trading to one place, Khagaria, on the Gunduck. An eminent Indian officer told me that he had stood on the Ganges bank, and estimated that there were 10,000 tons of boats in sight within a few miles at one time, equal to fifty goods trains. Such is the wonderful Ganges trade. Transit by canal is cheaper even than by river: Current is a minimum; no storms; no insurance necessary; shorter distances; can be worked by night; smaller crews are requisite. Besides cheapness, canal-carriage has these advantages: any class of goods can go at its own speed in its own manner, without interference with any other class; stations, unlike those of railways, are any where on the journey; boat serves as a warehouse; lockage easily managed; no State rolling stock or establishment; all done by private capital and agency. Seeing the vital importance of intercommunication and that of keeping the cost of transit low it is economy to make all irrigation canals navigable. The additional expense for making irrigation canals navigable is from one-third of the whole cost with a steep fall, to one-tenth of the cost with a flat slope; or, from £3,200 per mile, as on the Midnapore Canal, to between £700 and £1,200 on the Punjab and North West Provinces Canals."

The competing means of communication are by railways and country carts. But carts are slow and expensive, and unmetalled roads are almost impassable in the rainy season: "Mr. T. Login shows us that where grain costs only one rupee a maund, the cost of this grain when transported 800 miles in India would be enhanced in price as follows: By ordinary canals 14 to 20 per cent.; by railway 59 per cent.; by carts on metalled roads 76½ per cent.; by carts on country roads 100 per cent." The advantages of a cheap mode of conveyance in an agricultural country, where the people are poor, can hardly be over-estimated. Speaking at Manchester, when Secretary of State for India, Lord Derby declared that "what was wanted in India was 'not costly (railway) lines for rapid travelling, laid down in a few parts, but a comparatively inexpensive, though slow means of communication extending over the whole face of the country." And, similarly, Sir Bartle Frere said: "Hitherto what has been thought of most has been how to get your goods first to market; now

"I believe, it is becoming more and more a question who shall get them cheapest, and no doubt cheapness is best attained by trusting to water."

(3) Drainage.

To make the system complete, irrigation and navigation must be accompanied by drainage. In the upper provinces want of drainage makes the land waterlogged and sterile; in the lower provinces it causes malarious fever of a virulent type. "For several years past a great extent of country round Calcutta has been 'desolated by fever of such a nature that numbers of villages have been almost emptied by it, tens of thousands having died of it. It seems to have been entirely owing to the want of drainage in the monsoon, and the want of good water to drink in the dry season. It is impossible to conceive the state of those villages in those dead alluvial plains—in the monsoon without a foot of dry ground, and surrounded by pools of water—and in the dry season not a drop of wholesome water to drink—nothing but the remains of these pools a few inches deep, in which filth has been accumulating for months. Compare this with the state of an irrigated tract completely pervaded by drainage channels to carry off the waters in the monsoon, and canals of running water, fresh from the river, flowing through every village."

B. GEOGRAPHICAL FEATURES, AND C. FINANCE.

Having thus set forth the needs of India as regards irrigation, canal navigation, and drainage, Miss Nightingale, in her book, proceeds to deal with the engineering problem in the great geographical areas: the Punjab, with Sind—the land of the Indus, with its five tributaries fed from the Himalayan snows; the Upper Gangetic Valley, including the Jumna and Ganges canals; Bengal, and its vast system of river navigation; and Madras, with the Godavari, Kistna and Cauvery, rising in the Western Ghats, and watering the fertile deltas along the Eastern coast. As regards each of these areas she notes in detail the most immediate needs; the proposed expenditure, in a series of years, amounting to a total of £14,088,000. And as regards finance, she pleads strenuously for the claims of water, as against a lavish expenditure on railways, especially military railways: quoting the authority of the Duke of Argyll in 1873, who declared that "our first choice ought to fall upon irrigation rather than upon railways"; and referring to the testimony of Sir Richard Temple, who said that the great Madras works had been "eminently successful, and abundantly remunerative in the highest sense both to the State and to the people."

CONCLUSION.

The early rulers of India recognised a binding responsibility in this matter. In the Mahabharata a sage asks Arjuna how many of the cultivators are provided with wells and water courses, and how many have to depend on the season's rain? In other words, had the King performed his religious duty, and made the people safe from famine, or had he not? The question asked by the holy man in ancient times must equally be asked—and answered—at the present day; for it is the religious duty of the British ruler to be a good shepherd of the flock, to feed the people in a green pasture, and lead them forth beside the waters of comfort.—(Sir) W. WEDDERBURN in the Contemporary Review.

The Genius of Henry James*.

WHILE one is under the spell of "Notes of a Son and a Brother" one is in no mood for blaming Mr. Hueffer's challenging announcement of his opinion that Mr. James "is the greatest of living writers and, in consequence, . . . the greatest of living men." Certainly, if one were invited to name the literary masterpiece of the twentieth century, one would do well to hesitate before passing further than Mr. James's autobiography. It is not merely that it gives us a unique analysis of everything that went to the making of a characteristic literary artist of our times. It does more than this. It introduces us to the most charming and wonderful family group a novelist ever found to his hand. There are few portraits in fiction to equal that of Henry James, senior, the Swedenborgian, "wise, gentle, polished," as Emerson described him, "with heroic manners and a serenity like the sun." And how the very air and spirit of the novelist's mother are suggested to us in those sentences describing how she used to listen to her husband as he read his "papers" to her! "I see our mother listen, at her work, to the full music of the 'papers.' She could do that by the mere force of her complete availability—could do it with a smoothness of surrender that was like an array of all the perceptions."

What, perhaps, will attract ten readers to "Notes of a Son and Brother" for every one who braced himself up to the psychological adventures of "A Small Boy and Others" is the fact that in the new book Mr. James is more plainly reminiscential—more tenderly eager to give us the large aspect of the urbane persons and days of his early, unworried world. He is still intent, to be sure, upon puzzling out the mystery of the making of a novelist, so that we find him pausing to tell how he never regretted having been put to learn—a thing he could not do—physics and algebra at school in Geneva, since he had a fatalistic philosophy “of which the general sense was that almost anything, however disagreeable, had been worthwhile; so unable was I to claim that it hadn't involved impressions.” Similarly, in his account of what the later school at Concord meant to him, he breaks off to explain:—

“I have to reckon, I here allow, with the trick of what I used irrepressibly to read into things in front of which I found myself, for gaping purposes, planted by some unquestioned outer force; it seemed so prescribed to me, so imposed on me, to read more, as through some over-felt claim for roundness of aspect and intensity of effect in presented matters, whatever they might be, than the conscience of the particular affair itself, was perhaps developed enough to ask of it.”

But those whom such sentences, significant though they are, will scare into thoughts of flight, will be called back and conciliated by the portrait of Emerson—an image hung in light—as an occasional visitor to the James' household in New York:—

“I visualise . . . the winter firelight of our back parlor at dusk and the great Emerson—I knew he was great, greater than any of our friends—sitting in it between my parents, before the lamps had been lighted, as a visitor consentingly housed only could have done and affecting me the more as an apparition sinuously and, I held elegantly slim, benevolently aquiline, and commanding a tone alien, beautifully alien, to any we heard round about, that he bent this benignity upon me by an invitation to draw nearer to him off the hearthrug, and know myself as never yet, as I was not, indeed, to know myself again for years, in touch with the wonder of Boston. The wonder of Boston was above all just then and there for me in the sweetness of the voice and the finish of the speech—this latter through an attenuated emphasis which, at the same time, made sounds more important, more interesting in themselves, than by any revelation yet vouchsafed us. Was not this my first glimmer of a sense that the human tone could, in that independent and original way, be interesting?”

It is always, of course, Emerson seen strangely in relation to Henry James. Just as M. Anatole France speaks of Homer à propos of himself, so Mr. James speaks of the great men he has seen à propos of himself. One is always conscious, not only of the great man himself, but of the “small, vague outsider” who is described for us on another page as being “not a little mildly—though, oh so mildly—morose or anxiously mute.” Mr. James was considerably older—he was “a young person of twenty-four”—when he was invited to go in, after a dinner given to Dickens, and be presented to the novelist. “I saw” he tells us, “the master—nothing could be more evident—in the light of an intense emotion, and I trembled, I remember, in every limb, while at the same time, by a blest fortune, emotion produced no luminous blur, but left him shining indeed, only shining with august particulars”. As for what Mr. James can make of the “august particulars” at this date, it is all in a single sentence:—

“The offered inscrutable mask was the great thing, the extremely handsome face, the face of symmetry, yet of formidable character, as I at once recognized, and which met my dumb homage with a straight inscrutability, a merciless military eye, I might have pronounced it an automatic hardness in fine, which at once indicated to me and in the most interesting way in the world, a kind of economy of apprehension.”

One of the most fascinating things about the present book, however, is not so much that it reminds us of Mr. James's genius as a portrait-painter as that it shows, by numerous quotations from letters, how essentially he is, in this respect, simply his father's son. Might not Mr. James himself have written a good many sentences in this humorous and understanding letter of his father's describing a dinner at which Hawthorne was present?

“Hawthorne isn't, to me, a prepossessing figure, nor, apparently at all an enjoying person in any way; he has all the while the look—or would have to the unknowing—of a rogue who suddenly finds himself in a company of detectives. But in spite of his rusticity I felt a sympathy for him fairly amounting to anguish, and couldn't take my eyes off him all dinner, nor my rapt attention, as that indecisive little Dr. Hedge found, I am afraid, to his cost, for I hardly heard a word of what he kept saying to me, and resented his maliciously putting his artificial person between me and the profitable object of study. (It isn't, however, that I now feel any ill-will to him—I could recommend anyone, but myself, to go and hear him preach. The thing was that Hawthorne seemed to me to possess human substance, and not to have dissipated it all away like that culturally debauched—, or even like good, inoffensive, comforting Longfellow.)”

After relating that “my region was a desert with H. for its only oasis,” the letter goes on:—

“It was so pathetic to see him—contented, sprawling, Concord owl that he was and always has been—brought blindfold in to that brilliant daylight and expected to wink and be lively, like some dapper Tommy Titmouse. I felt him bury his eyes in his plate and eat with such voracity that no one should dare to speak to him. My heart broke for him as his attenuated left-hand neighbour kept putting forth his long antennae to stroke his face and try whether his eyes were open. It was heavenly to see him persist in ignoring the spectral smiles—in eating his dinner and doing nothing but that—and then go home to his Concord deer, to fall upon his knees and ask his Heavenly Father why it was that an owl couldn't remain an owl, and not be forced into the diversions of a canary. I have no doubt that all the tenderest angels saw to his case that night, and poured oil into his wounds more soothing than gentleman ever knew.”

Imagine what it must have been like to live in a house where the father could write like that, and the sons like William and Henry James, and where all the members of the family apparently lived with the same exquisite all-roundness and witty tolerance that marked everything they wrote! It was a family party of genius and geniality—the lofty geniality of the father, the bubbling geniality of William, and the passive geniality, if we may use the phrase, of Henry. It was a house where a fine spiritual atmosphere took the place of the usual didacticism, with the result, apparently, that gaps were left in the imaginative life of at least one of the children. Mr. James tells us how he “found the sphere of our more nobly supposititious habitation too imperceptibly peopled; whereas the religious life of every other family that could boast of any such (and what family didn't boast?) affected my fancy as with a social and material crowdedness.” It was a house where they neither kept the Sabbath nor, in a land of ministers, knew anything about ministers. Clergymen, says Mr. James, were “such creatures of pure hearsay that when late in my teens, and in particular after my twentieth year, I began to see them portrayed by George Eliot and Anthony Trollope, the effect was a disclosure of a new and romantic species.” On the other hand:—

“My father liked in our quite younger period to read us chapters from the New Testament and the Old, and I hope we liked to listen to them—though I recall their seeming dreary from their association with school practice but that was the sole approach to a challenge of our complete freedom of inward, not less than our natural ingenuity of outward experience.”

Humor, philosophy, tolerance, culture as a thing to be pursued like riches, stoicism without its severity, open-mindedness, even open-souledness, if we may use so barbarous a term—all these combined to make an atmosphere exactly such as was needed to produce a novelist who was going to be an inquirer, a student of tones and shades, an interpreter of reticences, rather than a propagandist humanitarian or a dealer in dramatic passions. Fortunately for us, he has shaken off more of his artistic reticence in “Notes of a Son and Brother” than in any of his previous books, and, though some of his sentences are stumbling-blocks to the eye and ear, it is on the whole considerably simpler in statement than “A Small Boy and Others.” It is a book of a warm, as well as of a subtle beauty, and is one of Mr. James's masterpieces in characterization.

Mr. Hueffer's book is not a book for those who require an introduction to Mr. James. It is neither comprehensive nor informing enough for that. For those who already know Mr. James's work, however, it will, in spite of many provoking irrelevances, be full of suggestive criticism. Mr. Hueffer does not criticize Mr. James's novels in detail. He simply converses about Mr. James generally and ramblingly. But the conversation is that of a man whose subject is a part of him, and not merely made up at the request of a publisher. In other words, it is personal criticism. One regrets that Mr. Hueffer has not taken the trouble to pursue his fancies to their charming end, or to give them any kind of logical arrangement. But, such as they are, they call for praise: they have the great merit of awakening new trains of thought.—The Nation.

The Last of the Pharaohs.

It would be impertinence in a mere tourist such as I have been for some pleasant weeks to say in public whether he thinks the Government of Egypt bad or good. But he may, perhaps, be permitted the more limited observation that the political genius of Britain has never invented or adopted anything quite so unlike itself. Here is a country with a popular, interesting, and very humane Englishman as its actual head, which possesses neither a Constitution, nor a true Code of Law, nor a real Parliament, nor a free press. Here, again, is a highly characteristic Eastern soil, which every day yields up some fresh token of its wonderful past, and yet lacks an Oriental Monarchy. Here is a British Governor without even a Council. Here is a sort of a Sultan with little power and with nominal responsibility. Here is a soldier with all power and no responsibility either to British or to Egyptian citizenship. Lord Kitchener's rule may be given many kinds of nick-name. Its Liberal critics style it government by Sergeant-Major. Its native friends think of its head, and are encouraged by him so to think of him, as a Grand Cadi under the Palm Tree. All the pomp of Egyptian rule centres round the Khedivial Palace. All its effective instruments flow to and from the Kasr-el-Doubara. The Khedive has probably shot his last bolt, for Lord Kitchener has crushed his appeal to the Sultan over the reform which transferred the administration of the Wakfs, or ecclesiastical trusts, to Ministerial hands. It is unfortunate that an able, and in early life a promising, man should be so small a factor in the management of his country's affairs. But the fault does not wholly, or perhaps chiefly, lie with the British Agent. In an Eastern country, of all others, unity of control is essential. And unity at least there is. Lord Kitchener exercises it, in the main, by the method of "authoritative advice." He "advised" the Khedive to yield on the administration of the Wakfs, just as he "advises" an authority to hurry up with its road-making and its street improvement, and to cover its stinking "birket" out of sight. And the "authority" obeys.

Such a procedure has its constitutional inconveniences, and it is easy to divine the objections that mere Parliaments, Financial Advisers, to say nothing of minor vessels of wrath like Mudirs or Omdehs, might urge against it. But if you abolish native statesmanship, you must provide an effective substitute. Egyptian Nationalism is dead, and its ungoverned press has gone with it or survives merely in a bitter passing gibe in a Khedivial organ, or a growl in a native journal that no Egyptian now counts in the management of Egypt's business or the spending of Egypt's money. The Egyptian Parliamentary system, such as it was, is hardly re-born as yet. There remains—Lord Kitchener, as a kind of Dynasty by himself. His position is as real as it is indescribable. He is not the President of a Ministry, and his entourage is a staff of able young assistants, inspired by devotion to a great chief, but unconnected, save in one instance, with the nominal Executive. His bond in the country is all personal—it consists in his knowledge of Arabic, his simple, instinctive judgment, his accessibility, his long experience and genuine interest in the peasant-folk who are Egypt, his feeling for its history, even his collector's passion for its antiquities. The Englishman laughs at the zeal which would transplant the giant limbs of Rameses II from the sand and palm trees of old Memphis to the Station Square or the Ezbekiyeh Gardens at Cairo. But there is a flash of sympathy in such thinking and planning which Lord Cromer never could give out or evoke. Lord Kitchener's link with the life of Egypt is a human link, and nowhere does this vein of humanity find easier channels than in the much-governed, much-abused land of the Pharaohs.

For the one strength of the Kitchener régime is that it has a policy. Lord Cromer settled the finance of the country and relaxed the grasp of the bondholder and of all but one European Government. Kitchener's soldiering re-united it to the Soudan, and restored to it the control of the Nile, barring only the all-important Abyssinian source. Now Egyptian policy centres in the Nile. All Egypt talks of the Nile, as all England talks of the weather, for on the full flow and the fair distribution of Nile water depends the life of the tiny thread of green which cuts the interminable brown of her two vast flanking deserts. There the fellah and his woman ply their slave-like toil at the mill-wheel, and pursue their ant-like journeyings between the field and the mud-hut. More, much more, cultivable land—and especially more State land—is wanted, more crops, and more continuous tillage of them. To that end Kitchener has devoted his triple plan of draining the lakes of the Delta, storing the flood water in the years of low Nile (like the present), while letting it through in the flood times, and opening out a new area for cotton-growing in the wide fork of valley country between the Blue and the White Niles. Who can gainsay the wisdom of these ideas? Or of the incidental devices by which the fellah has been assured fair measures for his cotton crop, and swift, easy justice for his country quarrels? Lord Kitchener's peasant policy has now taken a wider scope, and its most sensational incident is the famous Law of the Five Feddans, the most hotly debated subject in Egyptian politics.

Briefly, this new Homestead Law secures the possessor of five or fewer feddans (acres) in the actual ownership of the soil. It enables the creditor to seize his crops, but treats as "insaisissable" his land, his hut, his farming implements, and the two beasts which turn the creaking water-wheel or plough the black soil. I doubt whether any force in Egyptian Nationalism, with its centre in Alexandria or Cairo, would have initiated such a policy, or has even much sympathy with it. Its critics, indeed, are many, and they are not all disinterested. Lord Kitchener's avowed object was to save the peasant from himself, to check his heedless resort to usury for social and ceremonial purposes, the commonest of which were the costly and prolonged wedding feasts. He thus hoped to smother the nests of local money-lenders, mostly Greek, who, for centuries have fastened on the fellahs and converted their nominal ownership into something akin to forced labour. "The law is good for the poor and bad for the rich," said a rather naive young Egyptian landowner, obviously an ardent Nationalist and Khedivist, who paid us a visit of ceremony in a desert camp. But that is not the only ground of objection. The Nationalist inquires why Egypt's land law should be revolutionized without Egypt's leave being so much as asked. The banking community are hostile on the ground that it defeats its author's purpose. The Bill, they say, will not strengthen the peasants' credit, but will destroy it. Who will lend on the mere security of the crops? Not the banks (including the Agricultural Banks), for their rules will not allow them. You cannot cure the peasant of thriftlessness by a single ukase, and in this year of a low Nile he will want money for legitimate purposes—such as seed and labour. Where is he to get it from? Only the Greek with his 25 or 35 per cent. will look at him; the banks, who charge 8 per cent., are all scared away. If Lord Kitchener had been less impatient, more open to criticism and advice, he would have conceived his agricultural policy as a whole and given Egypt a system of co-operative credit before rudely tearing her farmers away from the habits of centuries. As it stands, the Bill merely puts the cart before the horse—even if it does not make the peasant's lot worse than it was before.

There is probably some substance in these complaints, as is evident from the Government's introduction of a Bill for establishing agricultural credit societies. But it is something in Egypt to go to the heart of a people's life, where so much, from Rameses the Great downwards, has ended in a kind of cruel and sordid nullity. One cannot but think that now the peasant has security, the banks will discover that his credit is good enough. Something of the British occupation will stand for ever—aeque perennius—if the fellah can be fixed to his holding half as firmly as the carved masonry of the great dam at Assuan clings to the bed of the Nile. But the root difficulty of this paternal government, this soldier-statesmanship, is not merely as to whether all its devices are well-considered—some of them must necessarily be ill-considered—but that it cannot last. All the institutions left by Lord Cromer were experimental, and his successor has not changed them. Will he remain for ever? None excel him in knowledge of the land he rules or in the power to serve it. But the pen which tells his praises in the Egyptian press usually proceeds to deplore his coming removal to India. If Lord Kitchener goes, the peculiar sources of his influence—influence over the Khedive, influence over the administration, influence over the native mind—go too. He is not a school of British statesmanship. He is a bluff soldier-man, with a genius to be himself and to lead others in the way of his will. His very bigness and burliness are a sort of talisman of power. What in our whole circle of public service is to replace this personality?

Even as things stand, change is inevitable, and is at the door. Lord Kitchener has found it necessary, like an earlier Cromwell, to summon something like a parliament and has discovered, within a short space, that the forces of Opposition—even of a reserved, moderate, and friendly Opposition—excel and outnumber those of the Government. And beyond all Kitchener's improvisations lies the problem of building up a harmonious and enduring structure. Sooner or later, Egypt must have a Constitution. Liberal England owes this debt to her, and paid it must be. Take the Capitulations. They are an insult to a country so peaceful, so secure from external and internal trouble, as Egypt now is. The Government is believed to favour their abolition, though a few months ago an editor was peremptorily told to let the question rest. But when it rises again, there rises with it the question of framing a Code which all the members of this many-coloured, many-languaged nation will be called on to obey. Has it even been considered? British India toiled long and brilliantly at the work of fashioning her present system of law. In Egypt, I was told that we had just lent the most suitable lawyer in the country for the work of Code-making in French Morocco. Yet abuses cry for remedy. Take the legislative functions exercised by the Judges of the Mixed Courts, who have recently drawn up a new Weights and Measures Act. A society with so many elements of civilization as Egypt ought long ago to have been lifted above and beyond the rule of a little Parliament of Judges, sitting to frame the laws they administer. Is Egypt not to be thought worthy to possess the common tools of civilized action, and a clever, adaptable race forbidden to touch them? Ibrahim had a Council; why not Kitchener? cry the malcontents.

It is not much to ask; especially when one knows that with the death of nationalism serious hostility to the British occupation died too. Some may want us to go; many more want us to begin to teach Egypt what to do if, perchance, we are not able to stay there for ever. This task we shall never take in hand if our sole care is for the efficiency of our own Civil Service, regardless of the capital fact that the abler and more devoted it is, the more it stands in the way of self-government. The "note" of much Egyptian criticism seemed to me singularly reticent and qualified, highly sensitive to the "shepherding" virtues of Lord Kitchener's rule. Yet there is discontent, which, lacking its natural vent, is now and then pitched in a sharp, even a malicious and violent key. Is that surprising? There are some things—such as the reform of El Azhar—which only a Mohamedan statesmanship can effect for Egypt. There are other things which we ought long ago to have done for her, if we ever mean to help her to govern herself. It is shameful that we do not give her a real University; and that we let the country limp along with a system which yields about fifty "literate" for every thousand of the population. But above all our duties is the duty of extending to all her people the shelter of a system of equal law, and encouraging them to work it. — H. W. M. in The Nation.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor
of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes: "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

The Week.

The New Delhi.

London, May 11.

In the House of Lords to-day Lord Curzon drew attention to the estimated expenditure on the new Delhi and moved for papers. He said that he welcomed the Viceroy's speech giving an estimate of £6,000,000 and pointed out that this was an increase of 50 per cent on the figures so confidently submitted two years ago. Even the six million estimate was only made possible by cutting out a number of items which were really part of the Government's policy.

Lord Curzon dealt in detail with incidental subsidiary expenses such as the cost of the transfer of the Government, the temporary Delhi Cantonment, railway re-construction, sanitation and the loss on the buildings unoccupied in Calcutta and Dacca. He now thought that his original statement that the total cost would be not less than twelve millions was an under-estimate. The Indian taxpayer would get off cheaply if the Government's policy cost him less than fifteen or sixteen millions. Lord Curzon paid a warm tribute to the Viceroy's courage and devotion to duty in connection with the attempt on his life, which the House applauded heartily. He asked whether the Viceroy was to visit Calcutta only occasionally and whether the salary of the Governor of Bengal would be increased, seeing that he now had to fulfil the duties of Lieutenant-Governor and also largely those of the Viceroy, a difficult and hampering task. If he was convinced that Delhi was the proper seat of Government and that the Government would be able to govern more sympathetically and effectively from that city he would not grudge a rupee, but in his view they were creating an official capital on an arbitrary and artificial site. He quoted Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's view of the new Delhi as identical with his own.

He did not doubt that the general opinion in India was steadily hardening against this policy, while commercial India was seriously questioning the advisability of thus spending all these millions when so much was wanted for social and commercial progress. The provision of only £66,000 this year for railways was absolutely contemptible. The destiny of capitals depended on natural laws. An artificial capital might have mechanical existence but never real vitality unless it represented the need of the Government and the real interests of the people. If it did not, no expenditure could endow it with real substantiality. Nature in time would have her revenge and they would be forced to conclude that the revenues of the Indian taxpayers had been wasted. Lord Curzon spoke for an hour.

Lord Crewe announced that he declined to reargue the question as to whether the change of capital was wise. He protested against the inclusion in the cost of charges of many changes which would still have been necessary had the Government remained at Calcutta. Regarding the estimate of four millions he pointed out that the Indian Government had never stated what its estimate of expenditure really was. He agreed that the actual expenditure on the new Delhi should be made clear each year and he would consult with the Indian Government as to how this could be most clearly done.

It was impossible for any Viceroy to fix the term which he was bound to stay at Calcutta but it was quite clear that any Viceroy would desire to pay a visit to Calcutta for some period in the cold weather. Regarding the salary of the Governor of Bengal, Lord Crewe pointed out that his allowances were far larger than those of the Governor of Madras. Referring to Lord Curzon's assertion that residence in Delhi was only tolerable for five months in the year, Lord Crewe said that the intention was that the Indian Government should be in Delhi seven months but it was impossible to say if this could be carried out. The Viceroy, however, would spend a longer period every year in Delhi than recent Viceroys had spent in Calcutta.

There was, Lord Crewe continued, now very little criticism of the project in India either by officials or non-officials. He had no doubt that the Viceroy would not agree with Lord Curzon that departure from Calcutta meant departure from the main current of Indian life. Lord Crewe could only speak of Calcutta with the highest admiration and respect but to regard it as representing the main current of Indian life or as the natural capital of India, which was to be replaced by an artificial capital, was a view which he was altogether unable to share.

Referring to the alleged unsuitability of Delhi as a meeting place for the Legislative Council owing to the inability of members to attend there, of which Lord Curzon had given two instances, Lord Crewe said that if this was found to be a permanent result of the transfer to Delhi it would be necessary to consider the holding of special sessions for special business in other more commercial centres. No such proposition, however, had reached him officially. He hoped that the desired result could be achieved by the Commercial Department making progress to three or four great commercial centres and the reascertaining what was required with a view to passing the necessary legislation when the Council met.

He was afraid that he had not succeeded in altering Lord Curzon's conviction, but he had not heard anything make to him regret his share in the change and he was certain that the Indian Government was equally content with the results so far as it was able to judge them at present. He hoped to lay papers which would throw more light on the subject.

Lord Curzon withdrew his motion, and in so doing stated that Lord Crewe had not convinced him any more than he had satisfied Lord Crewe.

Albania.

London, May, 7.

The Epirote Government has consented to suspend hostilities on the intervention of the International Commission, which will undertake to supervise and guarantee the continuance of concession by the Albanian Government.

London, May, 7.

Report from various sources confirm the news of crucifixions at Kodra. Nails were driven through chests, hands and feet of the victims. Children were found at Hormova, cruelly tortured. Many had had their fingers cut off. It is also asserted that many Albanians at Vrbecko and other places near Leskovitch have been massacred or burned in their houses by Epirotes.

South Africa.

Cape Town, May, 7.

It is understood that General Smuts has promised a deputation of Johannesburg Mussulmans that the Indian Grievances Commission's recommendations generally will be carried out. He also promised to do everything to settle the marriage question satisfactorily. He said that when the Immigration Act came before Parliament for revision Government did not intend to put any hardships in the way of Indians.

Cape Town, May, 12.

Replying to questions in the House of Assembly, General Smuts announced that he intended to introduce legislation on the Indian question this session.

Indian Finance and Currency Commission.

Lahore, May, 7.

The C. M. Gazette understands that the Secretary of State is about to address the Government of India on the subject of the Report of the Indian Finance and Currency Commission and pending the Report of this Commission no news on the matter is available. It would appear, however, from the appointment of Mr. William Robinson as Financial Assistant Secretary to the India Office that the Secretary of State has accepted the subsidiary recommendation of the Commission that the Finance Department should be strengthened by the appointment of a second Secretary to whom the work of a purely technical financial character should be allotted. It would appear that the fundamental recommendations of the Commission, including the reconstitution of the Finance Committee of the India Office are undergoing further consideration.

Turkey.

Constantinople, May, 7.

The Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee in the Senate has introduced into the Senate a resolution permitting the President to increase the regular army above 1,000,000—the statutory limitation.

Eleven Kurds, including Sheikh Shehabeddin, have been hanged at Bitlis in connection with the recent revolt.

Indian Students.

London, May, 9.

A large meeting of Indian students was held at Caxton Hall yesterday and a Resolution was passed, expressing disapproval of the existence and the increasing activities of the Indian Students' Department as a reflection on their character and capacity and as injuries to their interests and demanding its immediate abolition. It was decided to draw up a printed statement of the students' grievances and to form a Standing Committee. Mr. J. M. Mehta, who presided, complained of the ineffectiveness of the efforts of the Department to overcome racial prejudices against the Indians at educational institutions and urged an absolute boycott of the Department and all the agencies concerned with it. As to the new Hospitality Committee they did not want patronage or hospitality while they were denied educational facilities. The department was a minor edition of the Immigration Department of South Africa and its existence implied inferiority of the section of the community it was looking after.

Turkish Mission to Livadia.

London, May, 12.

Particular importance is attached this year to the annual Turkish Mission to Livadia to convey the Sultan's greetings to the Tsar. The Mission will also proceed to Bukharest. It is stated that the Porte is desirous of obtaining Romanian mediation on the question of Chios and Mitylene. The Mission, headed by the Minister Talaat Bey, was ceremoniously received by the Tsar yesterday evening. At a State banquet, the Tsar drank to the health of the Sultan and the prosperity of the Turkish Empire.

Persia.

London, May, 12.

At question time in the House of Commons, Mr. Pousonby asked whether Great Britain would ask Russia to withdraw her expeditionary force in North Persia in fulfilment of her pledges in order that the Shah might be enthroned as ruler of the country, the sovereignty and integrity of which were not seriously impaired. Mr. Asquith replied that Russia had given assurances regarding her troops, of which recent withdrawals from Tabriz and Kaxvin were practical illustrations. It could hardly be urged that all should be completely and suddenly withdrawn until it was evident that such a course would not be followed by outbreaks in the North, similar to those which had recently occurred in the South.

Ulster.

London, May, 12.

In the House of Commons to-day Mr. Asquith made a statement regarding the "Suggestion stage" of the Home Rule Bill. He emphasised that the speeches of the Opposition revealed a complete aversion to the principle of Home Rule. He made no complaint on that account. It was perfectly logical and consistent. He intimated that if a settlement by consent was to be reached the only proper course was to introduce an Amending Bill for which Government would make itself responsible. This and the Bill itself would become law together. He trusted that there would be a settlement. He would take the third reading before Whitsun.

Mr. Asquith continued that Government supported none of the amendments to the Disestablishment Bill; consequently there was no advantage in halting the "Suggestion stage." (Opposition uproar) The failure to have the "Suggestion stage" did not detract from the ultimate power of the House (Opposition dissent).

Mr. Bonar Law affirmed that such an encroachment on the liberties of the Opposition would lead in any other country to a violent outburst. The minority's only protection was a sense of fair play. He denounced the Parliament Act as wrecking representative government and did not share the Premier's hope that the Amending Bill would bring peace. It was six months since the first conversations and Government had simply drifted and was drifting still. The crux was between Mr. Asquith and Mr. Redmond alone. The Nationalists would be overjoyed at the passing of the Bill, but the Ulsterites would feel that the position was becoming worse. It was impossible to exaggerate the danger ahead.

In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Redmond said that the course which Government was taking was the best if a settlement was to be reached; but he objected to the statement of Mr. Asquith that an Amending Bill would be introduced even if finally there was no hope of a peaceful settlement. The Amending Bill should only be introduced to carry out previous agreement; otherwise he would hold himself free to deal with the situation when it arose.

In the House of Commons an amendment refusing to pass a Resolution restricting time for the discussion of the remaining stages of the Home Rule and Welsh Disestablishment Bills until Government had produced its suggestions for an amendment of these Bills in accordance with the Parliament Act, was rejected by 293 votes to 217.

London, May, 12.

The new phase of the Home Rule situation was opened up by a speech of Mr. Redmond in the House of Commons yesterday evening, disapproving the Amending Bill to the Home Rule Bill unless the previous agreement was secured and holding himself free to deal with the situation when it arose.

Conservative papers consider that Mr. Redmond's threat to government destroys the hope of the settlement. Liberals are of opinion that Government have made a strategic mistake by their declaration on the Amending Bill at the present juncture.

After Mr. Redmond's speech, Sir Edward Carson telegraphed to Belfast:—"Redouble your efforts."

London, May, 12.

Mr. Asquith accepted an Opposition amendment allowing a day for the discussion of the Financial Resolution of the Irish Bill on the ground that the Budget might be regarded as changing the position in this respect. The closure was then carried by 276 to 194.

Congress Deputation.

London, May 12.

The Times says that Lord Crewe yesterday informally received Sir William Wedderburn and Messrs. B. M. Sarnu, M. A. Jinnah, N. M. Sarmarth, Mazar-ul-Haque and S. Sinha, delegates from the Indian National Congress, with regard to Lord Crewe's proposals to amend the constitution of the Council of India.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

The House of Commons has reassembled after the brief Easter recess, but so far there is no substantial evidence of any improvement in the prospects for peace in the Home Rule campaign. Party feeling naturally is running very high, particularly at question-time, but the speaker is always ready for any emergency and controls the excited legislators remarkably well. There is a long list of questions on the paper every afternoon bearing on the Ulster problem and the recent army crisis, but Mr. Asquith, who now answers for the War Office, has proved too strong for his hecklers. In his characteristic style, full of composure and dignity, he replies laconically and precisely and "honourable members opposite," who had hoped to expose some imaginary "plot" or to disclose some mysterious "scheme" on the part of the Government to "subdue" Ulster, eventually find, much to their disgust and disappointment, that the Prime Minister is after all a "hard nut to crack." The White Paper issued this week, containing further correspondence that had been exchanged between the G. O. C. in Ireland and the War Office as well as that passed between the Naval authorities and the Admiralty, has conclusively proved that the steps that had been taken in Ireland—steps that had not only been honestly misunderstood by the Senior Officers in the Curragh, but deliberately misrepresented to the country by the Opposition—were purely of a precautionary character, as had been repeatedly stated in Parliament by the Ministers. Sir Arthur Pigot himself bears ample testimony to this and the nation has at last been given a splendid opportunity for judging the honesty and the sincerity of Mr. Asquith and his colleagues. The country is now convinced—and those who have been impartially observing the course of recent events had been convinced from the very beginning of this wretched business—that all the Ministerial statements on the floor of the House as well as on the platform have been throughout absolutely consistent with the realities of the situation. The Prime Minister had from the very outset taken the House and the Country in his confidence and had in no mistakable language placed the entire case before them. The Unionist leaders, however, had declined or rather pretended to decline to believe in all such authoritative statements. Now at last one would expect them, if they have an atom of patriotism and sportsmanship still left in them, to accept their defeat and honourably face the situation, created entirely and solely by their own misdeeds.

Both the political parties are for the present very hopeful of coming to a peaceful solution of the Irish problem during the "suggestions" stage of the Home Rule Bill, and it is quite possible and indeed very probable that "conversations" will in the meantime be held between the responsible leaders on the two sides. We have, therefore, for the time being, to await further developments calmly and dispassionately.

DR. BAGEE SHAH.

Dr. Bagee Shah, the elder son of the late Aga Zainulabedin Shah of Bombay, has been appointed House Surgeon at the Miller Hospital. He has had his professional training at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in London, an institution of world-wide reputation and fame. During his stay in this country, Dr. Bagee Shah has closely identified himself with the Islamic Society and the London section of the Indian Guild of Science and Technology. It is true he has never taken any official part in the management of these institutions, but he has been acting, specially in the Islamic Society, as the "man behind the scenes" and has always placed his services, though informally and in a private capacity, at the disposal of the Society's officials and that too, it must be frankly admitted, ungrudgingly and disinterestedly. It is no doubt this type of men, whose work and whose services in the sacred cause of Islam cannot but appeal to all those who have the true interests of our great faith at heart, that are to-day needed in the Moslem community. It is this class of private members, whose passion and zeal for earnest work could only be adequately estimated by those in intimate association with them, that really form the very backbone of the Islamic Society. They hate to shine in the limelight of publicity and despise the vanity of self-advertisement. Yet privately and quietly they are daily discharging those noble and sacred duties that have been so emphatically enjoined by the great Prophet upon all true Moslems. Dr. Bagee Shah is to be heartily congratulated on his recent appointment. The Islamic Society, with which he has been so intimately associated for several years, wishes him every success in his future professional career and hopes he will be able to serve the cause of Islam in future as faithfully and as honourably as he has done in the past.

COLONEL AZIZ ALI BEY.

The announcement that Col. Aziz Ali Bey has been pardoned by the Sultan will no doubt be received favourably throughout the Moslem world, particularly in Egypt. The Times, in a leading article, takes a modest pride in being chiefly instrumental in securing the Colonel's release. As a matter of fact, it is nothing of the kind. It is true a very widespread agitation had been cunningly started in this country against the trial and subsequent conviction of Col. Aziz Ali Bey, not really in the interest of justice and fair-play, as it has been pretended, but obviously with a view to strain the hitherto cordial relations that have happily existed between Constantinople and Cairo. We were repeatedly told that, considering the enormous Moslem interests of Great Britain, British prestige would necessitate the ultimate interference of England in this affair. It is indeed a paradox, and I am not going to discuss it again at length beyond just drawing the attention of your readers to the fact that British prestige, so we are given to understand, is said to suffer if a Moslem subject of the Caliph is going to be tried in accordance with the laws of the country. There was not even a shadow of doubt as to the efficiency and impartiality of the Court-martial which had been appointed to try the Egyptian Colonel. Aziz Ali Bey could get as much justice in Constantinople as any British subject can ever hope to get in a British Court. He was found guilty on some of the most serious charges that a military officer could ever be accused of. He was sentenced according to law and now has been finally pardoned by his Imperial Master. The incident, as far as Turkey and Egypt are concerned, is definitely closed and the matter is at an end.

The Times and some other organs of the British Press have attributed Aziz Ali Bey's arrest and trial to Enver Pasha's "jealousy." That accusation puts the whole case in a nutshell. The plain fact, however, is that those who are to-day accusing Enver Pasha of jealousy towards Aziz Ali Bey are themselves keenly jealous of the great Turkish hero. Enver Pasha is an old comrade-at-arms of the Egyptian Colonel and has indeed throughout the proceedings actually shown some partiality in Aziz Ali Bey's favour for the sake of "old friendship." We have fortunately the Colonel's own statement on record to that effect and that is sufficient to expose the falsity of the cruel insinuations that have been made against Enver Pasha in certain newspapers in England.

The Daily Telegraph, however, true to its traditional fairness to Turkey, is an honourable exception and its able correspondent at Constantinople attributes Aziz Ali Bey's pardon to the wisdom, sense of justice and statesmanship of the Cabinet and not in any way due to external influence, as has been suggested by its other less sincere contemporaries. The Times seems to be particularly astonished at the "extraordinary" fact that Aziz Ali Bey has received the Imperial pardon, after having been sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment and hastens to claim it as a victory gained through its own influence. A man actually found guilty and then pardoned! That, of course, would be nothing extraordinary, had it happened elsewhere. It is a matter of common practice elsewhere for prisoners to receive the Royal clemency, after they have been found guilty and sentenced in a court of law. But the moment a similar incident occurs in Turkey, these "good" and "honest" men immediately begin to suspect and doubt. They at once produce various kinds of fables to show that some "powerful factor" has been behind it all.

They may now similarly rejoice over Aziz Ali Bey's pardon and pose as his protectors, but those who are well-versed in modern Ottoman diplomacy know only too well how absurd and how utterly ridiculous such an attitude would be. The fact remains that Colonel Aziz Ali Bey has been finally pardoned and that the Imperial clemency has been exercised solely and entirely on the initiative of the Sultan's own advisers. British influence and British interference had never been, and indeed could never be, entertained in this purely domestic Turkish affair, and there the matter ends.

TETE À TETE

Of course, the man who called Englishmen tartufes (or is it Tartuffes?) was an unspeakably wicked person, and had he lived in these spacious days of Sections 124 A and 153 A, I.P.C. and the Press Act, our alert and wideawake Local Governments would have seen to it that the impudent wretch got transportation for life and had the Press which had the insolence to publish this wicked libel confiscated together with the security of ten thousand rupees. This for a preface. Now let us get to business. Is there a single Anglo-Indian newspaper that has not almost every day accused Indians of recklessness, and sometimes even maliciously, criticising a long-suffering Government and its officials? Have not charges of using unparliamentary strong language likely to bring Government into contempt been levelled against Indian "hot-heads"? From these expressions of horror one would imagine that the English were a race of men with angelic tempers, and even a slight rhetorical exaggeration in criticising their political opponents was as little known to this noble breed as falsehood or "the saying of that which was not" to that other noble breed of Houyhnhnms of Dean Swift's creation. Nevertheless, occasionally there floats over the Indian breeze the distant and dull rumour of the use of strong language and even fisticuffs in "the Mother of Parliaments" where top-hatted and frock-coated humanity assembles to teach political amenities to a world of sable hue. An Englishman has neither the excuse of natural temperament nor of climate to be a Hotspur, which the Indian has, but whenever a question on which opinion is really divided comes up for discussion in Parliament the spectacle of these cold-blooded gentlemen, living far beyond the heat-belt which gives to people living in it a perpetual inferiority, quarrelling with each other in a manner that would shame an Indian schoolboys' debating society. Who does not remember the hoarse eagle's cry (we shall not say the screech-owl's) of "Vide!" "Vide!" that was raised by the Hon. Member for that nursery of good manners, the University of Oxford, and echoed by the whole party of aristocrats, which made it impossible for the House of Commons to hear the Prime Minister? Who can forget the scene when the blue-bloods called the Liberals "rats" as they marched out of the House and were in return reminded of the fact that they prided themselves on being "the gentlemen of England"? If we do not mistake, some one threw a book at Mr. Winston Churchill on one of these occasions. During the recent Ulster debates linguistic temperature was fairly high and shouts of "It's a lie!", "It's a damned lie!" and accusations of this nature were fairly frequent. Mr. Austin Chamberlain openly characterised the resignation of Col. Seely and its non-acceptance by Mr. Asquith as "a put up job". This is what the English Opposition thought of the English Ministers. Unable to censure the Government in the Commons, the Tories wreaked their revenge in mail week on the Earl of Lincolnshire, President of the National Liberal Club, for the resolution which that Club passed last March on the Tory attempt to seduce the Army from its loyalty to the Sovereign, which we may venture to remind them is "the King in Parliament." Even Lord Middleton, whose controversy with Lord Curzon taught some important lessons in discipline to Indians, made his existence felt and characterised the noble but offending Earl as an aristocrat by nature and a Tribune by legislation. We wonder what he would say if, after the President of a Provincial Council had for the hundredth time assured the members of his sympathy with the ideals of the Progressives, some Indian member got up and called him a "Sundried bureaucrat" by nature and a "Labour Member" by calculation? Only last year the Hon. the Home Member had indignantly protested when the Hon. Mr. Vijayraghavaiah had accused him of political "sleight of hand" and performing "tricks," and was not satisfied till "tricks" was withdrawn, though "sleight of hand" was permitted to pass. Who can imagine an Indian Council in which Mr. Gokhale would be found accusing the Viceroy of "put up jobs," or Mr. Bannerjee would be leading the chorus of "Vide!" "Vide!" when His Excellency had risen to make an official pronouncement? Let officialdom thank its stars that the pupil is not as apt as it could be.

We offer no apology for reproducing from the New Witness, the non-party organ of "Clean Government" the following description of the motives and character of each of the two great Political Parties in England according to the other, and that journal's description of the motives characteristic of both as discovered during the present Army Crisis in Ulster. Referring to "the minor history of the grotesque proceedings which led up to the Curragh incident," the New Witness says:—

"It would be difficult to find a better illustration of the working of the Party System than is conveyed in this disastrous and ludicrous story. In order to illustrate our meaning let us take first the Ministerial version of the affair. It runs more or less as follows:—

A number of ardent democrats, raised to power by the direct will and mandate of the populace, and having no thought in their minds save the rescue of the oppressed from all forms of tyranny, resolved to do justice to the people of Ireland. They find their good intentions frustrated by a treasonable conspiracy engineered by a very wicked man called Edward Carson. For a time their delicate humanity urges them to spare the wretched fellow and his unfortunate dupes. At last, however, the matter goes too far, and these men, as brave in battle as they are generous in victory, decide on resolute action. But the infamous Carson has meanwhile entered into an intrigue with a number of haughty aristocratic officers who, hating Liberty and Democracy, refuse to carry out the orders of the People. The Government therefore, appeals to the nation to save itself from military tyranny by rallying to the support of its chosen champions.

"That is one story. Now for the other.

A gang of low-born and low-minded ruffians having obtained power by appealing to gratify the passions of the multitude, wish to gratify the hate and envy felt by the horrible Papists of Ireland towards our nobler race. This they propose to do by handing over to the rack and the stake the loyal Protestant people of "Ulster." These brave fellows rightly resolve to resist and their martial valour instantly strikes terror into the hearts of the conspirators. They see that there is nothing for it but to massacre the whole population of "Ulster" forthwith. This they resolve to do, but their plans are thwarted by the noble British soldier, who declares that he will have no part in the work of blood. The Government retires baffled, and the nation is called upon to exorcise its abortive atrocities and to applaud the noble refusal of the Army to serve it.

"One sees at once how thrilling are both these narratives, how well they fit in with each other, how excellently both are adapted to electioneering purposes, and how absorbing must be the controversy as to which is the true version of the affair. In the excitement of such a controversy (? who) would not forget the paltry matter of having 4d. a week docked from his wages or being fleeced by Government contractors who have let Ministers into a good thing on the ground floor?

"And now, for a change, let us talk about the truth.

A small team of professional politicians, co-opted by other professional politicians and financed by very wealthy men who expect some return for their money, in receipt of large salaries out of the taxes and utterly indifferent to everything but the retention of those salaries, is in considerable distress. These gentlemen are in distress firstly, because they have been paid by the great employers to pass a law for the regimentation of their workpeople which has met with an unexpected measure of resistance, and, secondly, because some of them have been caught taking a secret commission from a Government Contractor and consequently lying about it. The other team of professional politicians, not yet in receipt of salaries, would doubtless like to have its turn at them, but it does not want to fight on either of these issues because in the first case it is paid by the same great employers who ordered the aforesaid unpopular bill from the other team and in the second case because it is known that when once public curiosity as to the proceeding begins it is impossible to say where it will end. Both teams have, therefore, a common interest in diverting public attention from these questions to some other topic. The obvious other topic is Ireland. The two veracious narratives set out above are therefore, devised and the necessary evidence manufactured to support them. In this they derive great assistance from a lawyer belonging to the "Opposition," who had done a good deal professionally to help the members of the "Ministerial" team out of their secret commission difficulty.

"That is the real story. Can either team fight an election on that? Certainly not. Then let it be suppressed."

We cannot say that we altogether agree with the New Witness's description of British politicians; but who can say that our contemporary has in the least exaggerated what one party is saying of the other? And yet we hear that an English tutor of an Indian College not ten thousand miles away from Delhi says he will not shake hands with a member of the Board of his employers because the latter has expressed strong disapproval of the foreign policy of Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Asquith in relation to Turkey and other Moslem states and kingdoms, although the learned professor does not assert that the peccant journalist ever denied to these English Ministers and their more masterful colleague, Mr. Lloyd George, the title of gentleman. In fact, he is prepared to swear before any number of Justices of the Peace that he does not believe the Lord Chief Justice of England and a former Under Secretary of State for India, or, for the matter of that, two former Under-Secretaries, to be low dishonest swindlers. It is quite possible that the peccant journalist is a Radical, and, like all who have undergone even for a year the sundrying process of the Indian sun, the learned Professor is by now a high-born, well-bred, pleasant-mannered Tory!

In a recent issue of Punch its well-known "Charivaria" columns contain the following:—"Oil has been discovered in Somaliland, and it is rumoured that the Government is at last about to realise that its obligations to our friends demand a forward move against the Mullah." We have been noting for sometime the tremendous decline in humour in our jovial contemporary, but that it should have come to this! Does Punch really hope to raise a laugh out of the merest commonplaces of the East? Try another, my friend!

We do not know what purpose is served by Reuter's cabling to India news of accidents involving injuries or loss of life. The latest is not a railway but a tramway collision on Blackfriars Bridge in which fourteen persons received severe injuries requiring attending to in a hospital, besides many others who received minor injuries. But even if such news must be imported into India, what about the export of similar news to England to establish the balance of trade in such news? If tram cars in the English metropolis deserve such publicity, what have the tram cars in our Indian Metropolis done to deserve such neglect? If we had had anything to do with the Delhi Tramways Company we would have knocked down Reuter's man here the first time we met him in a lonely lane, or, better still, we would have invited him to take a ride in one of the Company's tram cars at "owner's risk" rates.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has dismissed the appeal of Mr. Channing Arnold against the judgment of Sir Charles Fox, Chief Judge of the Burmah Chief Court, who had sentenced Mr. Arnold to a year's simple imprisonment on the ground that he had libelled Mr. Andrew, the District Magistrate, over his action in the McCormick case. Our readers would no doubt still remember the case since we had drawn the attention of Government to Mr. Arnold's very serious allegations against Mr. Andrew, and had also published for some time the verbatim report of the proceedings in the Magistrate's Court in the libel case. Although in doing our duty the first consideration with us is not whether it is "safe" to do so, we may take it that even in India it is quite safe to approve of the views of an English Tory newspaper, and whether we would have otherwise hesitated to say the same thing or not, we can have no hesitation now in echoing the words of the Spectator that "Mr. Arnold is a man of conscience and courage, who believed he was standing up for the injured and the oppressed. Therefore, even if he blundered and even if he deserved punishment he also deserves our sympathy. The trade of a journalist would be a very ignoble one if it were not for the spirit which inspired Mr. Arnold." We may frankly state—and we have stated it repeatedly when journals like the Times have contravened against this view quite recently—that we dislike equally with the Spectator the notion of "re-trial by newspaper." But in order to appraise the value of the judgment delivered by Lord Shaw it is only right and just that we should have regard to the circumstances of the case and not content ourselves merely with the decision that their Lordships of the Privy Council "will humbly advise His Majesty that the Appeal be dismissed."

In fairness to Mr. Arnold we reproduce the letter of the junior counsel for him to the Spectator and part of the letter to the Nation. Mr. David Alec Wilson writing to the Spectator says:—"Your readers will see in Wednesday's Times the 'Privy Council judgment, which is what is called in the East the 'last guess' of English Courts of Justice, in the Arnold case. There is little in it so good as the true English declaration that 'no privilege or protection attaches to the public acts of a Judge which exempts him, in regard to them, from free and adverse comment'. Their Lordships may be assured that, for a century or longer, the

"judgement in this case will be subjected to free and adverse comment in Asia. But here I will only mention the logical blunder which vitiate its argument, and which it was my duty to rise and mention when it was delivered. Their Lordships say that 'all the libels, in so far as they were assertions of fact, were admitted to be false.' What I had to remind their Lordships of was that neither 'Sir Robert Finlay nor myself made any such admission, but only 'did not allege the truth.' This correction was accepted, and it makes 'printer's pie' of their argument. The reason why we relied on 'good faith' only, and did not undertake to allege the entire truth, was 'that the evidence to prove the truth of the libels was not on record. It had been excluded by Sir Charles Fox in the Lower Court, and 'he had declined to allow argument about it. Moreover, under the 'Indian Penal Code, 'good faith' was a sufficient defence." He supplements this information in a letter to the Nation in which he states:—"Mr. Arnold was not allowed to give evidence on his own behalf. He might answer questions put by the Court. If a man 'accused makes an additional statement in Burma, the law does not require it to be recorded, and it seldom is. Thus, in the Court 'of the magistrate, Mr. Cooke, who committed Mr. Arnold for trial, 'Mr. Arnold, in addition to answering questions, made a long statement, which duly appeared in the newspaper reports; but not a 'word of it was, or by law was required to be, recorded by Mr. Cooke, 'or considered by their Lordships." As regards the facts of the case itself, Mr. Arnold's conduct and the judgment and their effect in India, he writes to the Spectator as follows:—"The accepted facts, 'on which their Lordships concur with Sir Charles Fox, are that in '1911 Mr. McCormick, a rubber-plantation-starter in Mergui district, 'took to his house a little Mohamedan girl of about eleven, called 'Aina, and detained her till July. 'He admitted,' said Sir Charles 'Fox, 'he had examined the child . . . a thing no man with a 'proper sense of decency should have done. . . . His treatment 'of the mother herself when she went and asked for the child and 'of the relations . . . also was inexcusable.' The child's father 'sent for her in vain, and died without seeing her again. Mr. Buchanan, 'the Sub-divisional Magistrate, issued a warrant for abduction, and 'recorded an opinion that Mr. McCormick should be committed for 'trial for abduction and rape. Their Lordships express confidence 'in the good faith of Mr. Buchanan. Mr. Andrew, the District 'Magistrate, admitted being on friendly terms with Mr. McCormick, 'and refused to commit him for trial, giving as his finding that 'Mr. McCormick's motives had been 'pure and philanthropic.' 'Their Lordships say they do not agree with that opinion, and 'indeed, that is fortunate. It is an insult to common-sense and 'resented accordingly. An indignant European wrote to Mr. Arnold, 'an editor in Rangoon, and after long delay, and when he found 'no further inquiry could be obtained, Mr. Arnold denounced the 'conduct of Mr. Andrew as a 'mockery of British justice.' He used 'strong language which Sir Charles Fox's ruling as to evidence 'prevented his counsel justifying; and, indeed, it is a pity he went 'beyond the notorious facts not now disputed, for they are sufficiently 'scandalous. But even if he did wrong, which I cannot admit, 'his punishment has been out of all proportion to his offence. The 'parity of his motives has never been questioned. If his conduct 'be regarded fairly all round, he has rendered the greatest possible 'service to the Empire by showing to the Asiatics an English gentleman sacrificing himself and going to gaol in his zeal for justice to 'a little Mohamedan girl he had never seen. Asiatics can appreciate 'this even better than we. They believe in family life more than we 'do. The Mohamedans thereabouts in particular are zealous puritans, 'to whom European sexual laxity, such as they see it there, is an 'abomination. If this case does not drive them into sedition, it 'will be in spite of our Courts, and because the martyr for justice 'is an Englishman. What more than any other detail in this case 'has infuriated the Asiatics is Sir Charles Fox's statement that, 'by taking and keeping away a girl as Mr. McCormick did, a man 'commits no offence unless the woman from whose immediate custody 'he takes the child can be brought forward to say she did not give 'consent. This seems little less than, what the Judge certainly never 'intended, free licence to the most shameful traffic in children, a 'crying evil in Burma. If the Judge's law is right—and their 'Lordships do not repudiate it—then there must be legislation at 'once, or we shall lose the loyalty of every clean-minded Mohamedan 'and Burman in Asia. Already we have strained them very sore."

In the course of his letter to the Nation Mr. Wilson makes the following appeal to Government and to journalists, and we hope it will not go in vain. He writes: "Instead of holding a 'fresh enquiry, as they should have done, 'the local authorities wreaked their wrath 'on Mr. Arnold, at the public expense. All the money spent against 'him in the criminal proceedings just ended, and all the money being "spent in the civil suit still pending, come out of the public purse. 'If only the executive authorities knew what the people are saying about them, they would know that the waste of money is a small part of the mischief they are doing; and it is all futile. They cannot paint mud.' I appeal to all the honest journalists and editors in the Empire to stand by Mr. Arnold, and demand that the civil case stop at once, and that a payment of costs in the criminal case be made to him. The punishment he has already suffered cannot be justified. If his fellow-journalists fail to help him, then they will deserve to be called—

"A servile race by folly cursed,

"Who truckle most when treated worst."

We offer our humble but emphatic support to this appeal, and we trust Government would not deny a brave and honest Englishman, whose Imperialism is a thing we can all understand and appreciate, such an act of grace.

LORD CURZON'S recurring assaults on New Delhi seem to have grown a regular item of his Lordship's parliamentary programme. No one, of course, would grudge him the luxury of these performances if they serve to keep his interest in Indian affairs alive. Ex-proconsuls of his super-sensitive temperament can hardly bear the agony of a least suggestion that they are beginning to be forgotten. It is only natural, therefore, that they should clutch at every opportunity to remind the world that they existed, that they knew a thing or two and that but for their presence things might be infinitely worse. Lord Curzon's periodical deliverances against New Delhi reveal the ex-viceroy in a strange and wonderful light. His excessive concern about the "cost" is supremely amusing. He believes it would run up to fifteen or sixteen millions sterling. He thinks it is utterly unjustifiable and the revenues of the Indian taxpayers would be wasted. It should do one's heart a world of good to hear from Lord Curzon a plea on behalf of the Indian taxpayer and his burdens. We may assure his lordship that he is in no danger of being forgotten in this country. India remembers him only too well and cannot for a long time forget that some of the acts and measures of his régime were not exactly conceived in sympathy with the interests of the Indian taxpayer. He held his Durbar at Delhi—perhaps the only place suitable then for that "ritual of the State"—and the pomp and circumstance, with which he surrounded himself, and the display of barbaric wealth and the cloth of gold did cost some little trifle to the Indian revenues. His twelve Labours of Hercules had to be paid for generously, and his "missions" were no beggarly enterprises doomed to starvation at their birth. His elaborately-planned excursion into Tibet and his somewhat inglorious promenade in the Persian Gulf had their bills. The wheels of the administration were ceaselessly oiled and new and costly wheels were created within wheels. The great ex-viceroy had a sneaking wish to play the Grand Mogul, and the traces of his extravagant freaks still testify to his aching desire to crystallise his "Imperial Idea" in some abiding symbol. The Victoria Memorial Hall has yet to be completed and may it grow to be a worthy monument of a great epoch! Lord Curzon did not grudge the cost when he set to conceive, like Titan, a memorial to be associated with his rule.

All these acts and measures cost the taxpayer to the tune of some millions sterling. This expenditure, we may be told, was justified in the interests of internal security and administrative efficiency. Exactly so. Cannot the change of capital to Delhi be justified precisely on this score?

LORD CURZON, however, thinks otherwise and condemns the transfer on higher grounds of policy. He does not think that the Government would be able to govern more sympathetically and effectively from Delhi. In his opinion, an official capital is being created on an artificial and arbitrary site, "which might have a mechanical existence but 'never real vitality unless it represented the needs of Government and 'the real interest of the people.' He did not doubt that "the 'general opinion in India was steadily hardening against this 'policy, while commercial India was seriously questioning the advisability of thus expending all these millions when so much was wanted 'for social and commercial progress.' For a sympathetic and effective government what is really wanted is not so much a particular locality as a particular type of rulers. We are familiar with the Calcutta argument about the Government of India thus shutting themselves away from the main currents of enlightened and progressive opinion. We would, however, like to know what this "enlightened and progressive opinion" in sober fact, amounts to. No one can seriously be asked to believe that the Government in its pre-Delhi days was an obedient instrument of the independent Bengali Press, or that it readily danced to the tunes of public demonstrations in the streets of Calcutta. The noise and tumult of the place might have occasionally got on its nerves and led it to convulsive action here and there. Delhi is at a safe distance from partisan clamour and the Government can, if it so desires, ascertain the direction of Indian public opinion without the least difficulty from this central and detached position. What is really meant by the currents of "enlightened and progressive opinion" are the views and opinions of the European commercial interests in Calcutta. They have lost their close touch with the Government of India and are afraid lest they might lose their old influence over Government policy. They are powerful; some of the most resourceful Anglo-Indian papers in Calcutta are on their back; they have influential friends amongst the Conservative party in England; and the amount of noise and agitation they have been able to create in consequence is out of all proportion to their importance and deserts. Does the Government of India virtually exist that a few prosperous and fat business concerns in Calcutta may grow fatter and more prosperous? Is public money to be poured on construction of new railways and rolling-stock with the sole object that the Calcutta company-promotor and his shareholders may earn huge dividends? Has every policy and measure of Government, which is responsible for the progress and welfare of 810 millions of mere Indians, to submit itself to the jattas of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce? It is such ludicrous doctrines as these that Lord Curzon has been got to advocate in the House of Lords. The bathos of it all becomes all the more glaring when the orator is driven to reinforce his arguments by a solemn reference to the needs of education and sanitation and social progress in India. The Statesman's passion for the growth of primary education and sanitation in India is well-known. Its attitude towards Mr. Gokhale's Elementary Education Bill has not yet passed out of the memories of the people. Its treatment of all non-official demands in the Legislative Councils for larger allotments for sanitary reform has been violently sarcastic. And yet, when the tirade against New Delhi has to be penned, even the Statesman is forced to indite as follows:—"It 'would, we suspect, be highly instructive to the Secretary of State if 'he spent a leisure hour in calculating how many of the millions of 'children in India now doomed to be illiterate could have received 'a sound primary education if only twelve millions sterling were 'available for the purpose, how many waterless villages could be supplied 'with tanks for a like sum, or how many of the sick and ailing could 'have been provided with medical relief." This sudden access of enthusiasm for primary education, village tanks and medical relief in quarters where such absurd and impossible propositions could not be seriously entertained a short time ago, is little short of the miraculous. Lord Hardinge's desertion of Calcutta is having portentous effects. The heresies of yesterday are becoming the articles of a new and liberal creed to-day, and we wish he could devise more coups as sudden and startling as this one about the change of capital, if only to bring more heretics to the racks of the faithful and thus accelerate the pace of true "social progress" in India.

WORKS of varying degrees of merit on India and Egypt have grown to be a distinct feature of the publishing season in England. They furnish in a sense a measure of the interest that the British democracy has begun to take in Indian and Egyptian affairs. Most of these works are not of any abiding value. They are frankly partisan in their views, or record the fleeting impressions of cold-weather tourists who visit these countries to satisfy their craving for the novel and the picturesque. Works of real merit with deep insight and breadth of view are rare. Unless men with abundant imagination and sympathy apply themselves to the study of the Indian and Egyptian problems and state their conclusions with frankness and ability, the British democracy will have but an imperfect idea of its responsibilities towards the races that are under the British tutelage at the present time. The ephemeral mass of literature on the subjects only serves to increase its dislike for outlandish topics; and it is content to leave the conduct of affairs in these countries to the discretion and judgment of that infallible instrument of government, "the man on the spot." Mr. Sidney Low's new book, Egypt in Transition, which has just been published, appears to have been out of the common run. Mr. Low has made an extensive study of public affairs in England and abroad; he is a man of discernment and considerable literary skill. We have not yet seen the book, but according to the various press notices it is considered to be a work of exceptional merit and a valuable contribution to the study of Egyptian problems. Lord Cromer in his Introduction to the volume says that it is a lively and very trustworthy account of the present condition of affairs in the Valley of the Nile. Mr. Low deals with the development of the Sudan under the Anglo-Egyptian rule and with the present condition of things in Egypt. His observations and conclusions in regard to the latter are stated to be somewhat as follows. He is proud of the work of his countrymen. Egypt is still burdened by old debts, and the removal of the fetters of the Capitulations, urgently needed as it is, seems as far off as ever. The people are much more advanced than in the Sudan. A Mohammedan race never likes to be governed by a Christian Power. He speaks of Egyptian Nationalism without sympathy, he nevertheless accepts the programme of training Egypt for self-government; but he contends that it will take long time to carry out. He rejects the establishment of a Protectorate as "an act of bad faith and a gratuitous insult to our Mohamedan fellow-subjects throughout the Empire." He notes the immense material progress achieved by irrigation and the general financial prosperity. Female education is becoming popular. He speaks in high terms of Lord Kitchener, and of his two chief measures, the Five Feddan Law and the new Constitution. On the other hand, he is impressed with a remarkable increase of serious crime, a large part of which goes unpunished. He thinks that it is in some ways a rather thankless task that confronts England in Egypt. "We are not popular in Egypt. Feared we may be by some; respected by many others; but 'really liked by very few. It has been a difficult experiment, which 'seemed foredoomed to failure; it is creditable to many Englishmen 'and some Egyptians that it has been, on the whole, a success." Mr. Low's observations and conclusions are not very original, nor do some of them accord with more independent testimony. His aversion to Egyptian Nationalism reveals his angle of vision, which is almost identical with that of the Tory Imperialism. How far a writer, who is unable to appreciate the most hopeful sign of a country's vitality, can give us a true insight into its affairs we need not pause to judge. Lord Kitchener seems to have created a host of his admirers and Mr. Low burns incense at his feet after the prevailing fashion. But the "Constitution" that the modern "Pharaoh" has been pleased to confer on Egypt is, according to some independent English observers, not much better than a farce.

Reuter had informed us some days ago about the "discovery" of some remarkable documents containing variants on the text of the Koran which were to be published by the University Press of Cambridge. The entire Muslim World must be on the tiptoe of expectation and waiting with consuming anxiety for the great "discovery" to see the light of day. In the meantime they may console themselves with the following account published by the Times in its issue of the 25th April:—"In a few weeks the University Press of Cambridge will publish some remarkable documents belonging probably to the beginning of the 8th century, or to the end of the 7th, containing variants on the text of the Koran; they are contained in a palimpsest MS. purchased by Dr. Agnes Lewis in 1895, in which the upper or later writing consists of extracts from the early Christian Fathers. The handwriting of this book has been pronounced by the experts of the British Museum to belong to the end of the 9th century. The text of the Proterangelium Jacobi and the Transitus Mariæ in Syriac underlies the greater part of it. This was published by Mrs. Lewis in 1902, as No. XI. of the series entitled Studia Sinaitica. In her introduction she gave an account of five quires—i.e., 23 leaves, whose under-script is undoubtedly portions of the Koran, resembling the script of Plate LIX. in the Palæographical Society's Oriental Series. Mrs. Lewis thought that they were parts of two MSS., one of which she named Koran I.; the other, Koran II. She contented herself with copying four lines from every page, the top and the bottom ones, and two in the middle, which were generally free of the upper writing. She thought, not unnaturally, that as it is said, 'there are no variants in the Koran'; and as the remaining 17 or 18 lines on each page were only appearing dimly through the closely-written Arabic of the Christian script above them, she judged that nothing she could gain from them would repay her for the strain on her eyes while deciphering so difficult a text. So the MS. lay in the owner's library, until last November Dr. Alphonse Mingana, for 13 years Professor of Semitic Languages in the Syro-Chaldean Seminary at Mosul, began to read No. XI. Studia Sinaitica. He saw at a glance from the number of *sic*s which adorn the margin of the Quranic pages that the undeciphered lines might be well worthy of his attention. The *sic*s referred, with one exception, merely to the archaic spelling of single words: but Dr. Mingana's laborious decipherment of the text has had surprising results. He has established beyond doubt that these leaves are from three sources or more: some of them written before the Mahomet's amanensis, Zaid Ibn Thabit, compiled the textus Receptus of the Koran, after the Prophet's death (A. D. 632), and before the Caliph Othman ordered the destruction of all earlier copies or fragments of the sacred book of Islam (A. D. 652). The 35 pages which Dr. Mingana has deciphered show at least the omission of four interpolations, most of them being decided improvements on Zaid's text. For instance, Sura 17 begins "When we knelt" (not "When we blessed") "round the Harâm." A hope has been raised that we may yet see a lamentable gap filled up in the history of one of the world's most famous books; and that the beginning of a kind of criticism has been made which will bring us nearer to the real thoughts of the great Arabian Prophet."

The Comrade.

The Privy Council and Indian Criminal Appeals.

LUCKILY or unluckily not all of us are lawyers, and to many in India it will come with a shock of surprise that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is not a Court of Criminal Appeal for India. And so long as there is no separation of the Judiciary and the Executive, so long as the Judges of the Chief Courts are appointed by the Executive, so long as all High Courts except one are under the Local Governments and so long as even that one exception, the High Court of Calcutta, is under the Home Department of the Government of India, the re-affirmation of Lord Shaw in the Arnold Case judgment, that the Privy Council is not a court to which those dissatisfied with the judgments of Indian courts in criminal cases can appeal, would cause no end of apprehensions.

Lord Shaw quotes the words of Lord Kingsdown in the case of The Falkland Islands Company v. The Queen (1 Moore N. S. 312) that: "It may be assumed that the Queen has authority by virtue of Her Prerogative to review the decisions of all colonial courts, whether the proceedings be of a civil or criminal character, unless Her Majesty has parted with such authority. But the inconvenience of entertaining such appeals in cases of a strictly criminal nature is so great, the obstruction which it would offer to the administration of justice in the colonies is so obvious, that it is very rarely that applications to this Board similar to the present have been attended with success."

Again, after citing the words of Lord Watson in re Dillet (12 A. C. 459) to which the counsel for the appellant had referred, his Lordship said: "If they are to be interpreted in the sense that wherever there has been a misdirection in any criminal case, leaving it uncertain whether that misdirection did or did not affect the jury's mind, then in such cases a miscarriage of justice could be affirmed or assumed, then the result would be to convert the Judicial Committee into a Court of Criminal Review for the Indian and Colonial Empire. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that no such proposition is sound. This Committee is not a Court of Criminal Appeal. It may in general be stated that its practice is to the following effect: 'It is not guided by its own doubts of the appellant's innocence or suspicion of his guilt. It will not interfere with the course of criminal law unless there has been such an interference with the elementary rights of an accused as has placed him outside the pale of regular law, or, within that pale, there has been a violation of the natural principles of justice so demonstratively manifest as to convince their Lordships first, that the result arrived at was opposite to the result which their Lordships would themselves have reached, and secondly, that the same opposite result would have been reached by the local tribunal also if the alleged defect or misdirection had been avoided.'"

Referring to another case, Lanier v. The King (L. R. 1914 A. C. 221), Lord Shaw goes on to say: "It was pointed out that the interference was not on any matter of form, but because of matters lying at the very foundation of justice (the Judge had been a Judge in his own cause), justice had 'gravely and injuriously miscarried' Lanier stands as a fair type of almost the only case in which the Board would advise the interposition of His Majesty the King with the course of criminal justice in the colonies or dependencies. That extreme case is this, that it must be established demonstratively that justice itself in its very foundations has been subverted, and that it is therefore a matter of general imperial concern that by way of an appeal to the King it be then restored to its rightful position in that part of the Empire."

We have very carefully read these passages of Lord Shaw's judgment over and over again, and compared them with the passage from Lord Kingsdown's judgment cited by his Lordship, and we humbly submit that his Lordship has distinctly narrowed down the grounds on which alone he would accept a criminal appeal from the colonies and the dependencies. Compare again the words of Lord Shaw with those of Lord Watson in re Dillet. Lord Watson observed that "the rule has been repeatedly laid down and has been invariably followed that Her Majesty will not review or interfere with the course of criminal proceedings unless it is shown that by a disregard of the forms of legal process or by some violation of the principles of natural justice or otherwise substantial and grave injustice has been done." Do these words convey the same meaning as Lord Shaw's interpretation of them? Before interfering His Lordship would almost invariably require the trying Judge to act as shamelessly as the Judge did in Lanier's case when "he . . . was a "member of the family council which instigated the proceedings and 'himself was a party to appointing two barristers to conduct the 'prosecution and arranged about their fee,' and, as the report states, 'the Council for the Crown very properly admitted that he could 'not contend that any jury upon the evidence submitted would have 'convicted the appellant of crime.' If Lanier's, then, is 'a fair 'type of almost the only case' in which the Privy Council would interfere, we must clearly understand that for almost all those who honestly and with good reason believe that injustice has been done to them the highest Court of Appeal, even in a case in which the Local Government is directly concerned as a party, would in several Provinces be a Court of which the Judges are appointed by the same Local Government.

But we submit that in the "extreme case" when "Justice is 'in its very foundations has been subverted,' and 'it is there- 'fore a matter of general Imperial concern that . . . it be 'then restored to its rightful position in that part of the Empire'", surely it is the duty of His Majesty's servants to draw His Majesty's attention to such a grave situation suo motu instead of waiting for the appeal of one of His Majesty's subjects who may be too poor or too much afraid to present it. Criminal justice is in its origin nothing but private revenge; but in all civilized states it has now become necessary for the vindication of the might and dignity of the State itself. This the basis of the distinction between cognisable and non-cognisable, compoundable and non-compoundable cases. If the Police can take cognisance of certain cases without a complaint from the party aggrieved, and the Magistrate and Judge can proceed to deal with the accused in spite of his having been forgiven by the aggrieved party, so that the dignity and puissance of the State be vindicated, is it right to wait for a criminal appeal from a person unjustly accused and unjustly punished in India by a Judge "who had been a Judge in his own cause" before justice, itself subverted in its very foundations, could be restored by His Majesty to its rightful position in that part of the Empire, or, in the words of Lord Morley in "their Lordships' only Empire?" We trust the matter will not be left here, but will be taken up by the political bodies of India and by all those who are interested in the maintenance of justice which is the bedrock of the British Empire in this country.

Taking the very extreme case mentioned by Lord Shaw in his judgment, let us examine whether there may not arise circumstances in India very analogous to the case of the judge being a judge in his own cause. "Love thy neighbour as thyself" is no doubt a counsel of perfection; but the altruism on which it is based is universally accepted as an ideal. Such altruism is more difficult or less according as the love of one's neighbour coincides or conflicts with the love of oneself. For instance, if our neighbour also claims some land that we claim as ours, it is not easy to accept our neighbour's claim as just on the ground that we should love him as we love ourselves. On the other hand, if a third person also claims some land which our neighbour claims as his, and we fear that this third person may subsequently also lay claim to some land that we regard as ours, then the counsel of perfection comes well within the pale of "practical politics", and we can easily love our neighbour as ourselves. To come to closer grips with reality. Is it or is it not a fact that there is a strong esprit de corps among Anglo-Indians which generally gives them a strong bias in favour of Anglo-Indians? In spite of the Hon. Sir Harry Stephen's opinion, Sir John Rees apparently believes that Bengalee juries have such a rooted racial prejudice that they are "unwilling to convict Bengalis of so called political crimes," and we do not see why a Bengalee may not say the same thing of Anglo-Indians in cases in which the parties are Indian and Anglo-Indian. We know that many members of the Indian Civil Service accuse Sir Henry Cotton of being a renegade simply because he honestly criticises some of the inevitable failings of the Service. In the Cawnpore Mosque case, to many Anglo-Indians and Indian Civilian the case of Messrs. Tyler and Sim was their own case. In this very case, already "An Official" has become indignant at the sympathy of the Spectator for Mr. Arnold though it is qualified by the assertion that Mr. Arnold has got what he deserved. He writes to that journal:—"What Mr. Arnold did was to accuse a public official of disgraceful 'conduct without sufficient reason to believe that the accusation 'was true and with some reason to believe that the accusation was 'false. All the Courts have held that the refusal of that public 'official to take the line which Mr. Arnold advocated was justified. 'In these circumstances I regret to observe your opinion that 'Mr. Arnold strove to follow a high standard of journalistic conduct. 'In my opinion, that high standard should include due care and 'attention before publicity is given to scandalous accusations. No 'amount of alleged sympathy with the oppressed can excuse the 'reckless use of the power of publicity. And in the estimation of 'motives, the desire to make a sensation and to gain impor"tance cannot be overlooked." We ourselves experienced that the publication of the proceedings of Mr. Arnold's case by the Comrade was distasteful to many Anglo-Indians who plainly showed it in their conduct in a way injurious to us. We are, therefore, right in saying that circumstances may, occasionally arise in which judges and juries may become prejudiced against a man like Mr. Arnold who shows that he has both conscience and courage.

In such cases would it be altogether wrong to suspect that a judge was the judge in his own cause? Technically, he would not be a "member of the family council which instigated the "proceedings," and the action of Government itself would save him from being "a party to appointing two barristers to conduct "the prosecution and arrange about their fee." We do not suggest in the least that Sir Charles Fox was actuated by such motives. But if he had been, would there have been anything so obviously on the surface as in Lanier's case which could have induced Lord Shaw to restore justice, itself subverted in its very foundations, to its rightful position in Burma? We wish we were satisfied that their Lordships of the Privy Council understand any more than other Englishmen who swear by "the man on the spot" the actual state of affairs in this part of the British Empire. There is, no doubt, an eminent Indian who sits on the Bench of the Judicial Committee; but we cannot say what share he has in influencing the judgment of his colleagues. We do not refer here to a particular case, but to the general conditions governing the administration of justice in criminal cases in India, and we feel that if their Lordships of the Privy Council knew them as well as we do, they would certainly feel inclined to modify even the words of Lord Kingsdown in the case of The Falkland Islands Company v. The Queen, let alone the modification of their own more rigid views. Far from offering any "obstruction" to the administration of justice in India, it is "obvious" that the frequent interference of His Majesty in cases like the one under review would facilitate the administration of real justice. As for the "inconvenience," surely the appellant has to bear far more of it than the Privy Council and the Crown, even if convenience and inconvenience can be regarded as words which are in their proper place in matters of such grave moment.

Young India.

III

THE Indian college, whether controlled by the State, or by a public or a denominational body, is the hard, material setting in which the thought-struggles of Young India reach a crisis and in many cases end in catastrophe. The Young Indian, who has passed out of the college can never forget the intoxication of the moment when he first entered the Mecca of his intellectual hope. It marks the consummation of a desire that had been the tumult of his blood ever since he came under the spell of the "B. A." of his town or neighbourhood and was lost in rapt admiration of his immaculate views and ways. His parents show some hesitation at first and naturally count the cost and risks of the "adventure", but he overrides all considerations by his persistence, and gains his way in the end. He packs his things and, armed with his matriculation certificate and other "chits" about his character and school conduct, appears one fine morning within the precincts of the college. If he is a Hindu the range of his choice of a college is wide, and he generally abides by the advice of his parents or his friends. If he is a Mussalman, his gaze is usually fixed at Aligarh. In any case he goes to the college of his choice with feelings akin to one's entering a sacred shrine. For the first week or two the youthful pilgrim is the victim of a huge bewilderment, and he takes in his impressions with a series of gasps. His mental picture of the place was a dignified abode of grave, sedate young-men filled with patriotic sentiment and spending their lives in ceaseless rounds of lectures on communal topics, on religious and social reform. What he actually sees are scattered little groups in the rooms and verandahs of the college hostels, engaged in indolent gossip, which is punctuated at intervals by hissing sounds of mockery or peals of irreverent laughter. His animal spirits may be roused by the hearty bounts of hilarity characteristic of youth, but his earlier picture is shattered for ever. From the first moment of his arrival he feels ignored—nobody seems to care a scrap for that portentous event. Things go on shamelessly as before, as if nothing had happened so epoch-making as his coming to the college. He feels an alien and out of tune. However, he soon gets over this feeling—generally within a fortnight—as he begins to pick up the various threads of the inner relations of things around him and learn the freemasonry of the undergraduate talk, allusion and gesture. He even speedily lives down the smart of anger and insult that goes to his heart when the merciless college wits poke fun at his dress and appearance and hit off his angularities by some flaming phrase on a scandalous nick-name, which sticks to him for the rest of his life and which renders his days empty of sunshine and his nights sleepless and hideous for weeks. Before he is formally admitted to the college he sees the Principal—generally a European gentleman of brief and snappish discourse and scrupulously correct and reserved in manner. The interview does not usually last beyond a couple of minutes, but it leaves a lasting impression on the youth's mind.

When the "fresher" is thoroughly acclimatised with his surroundings—the process does not usually take more than a couple of months—his intellectual and moral sensibilities come under vital stimuli through a multitude of new suggestions. They drink in the elixir of their life at every pore. Fresh waves of thought and feeling flood his consciousness in his new atmosphere; and in the classroom, the library, the debating-hall, the play-ground, the dining-hall and in the free, daily intercourse with his fellows he sees glimpses of a sunnier and more gracious spirit than the spirit of the public school, which seems to pervade the life around him and reflect its radiance on all human things. A feeling of real intellectual freedom is born within him, and he casts off, with a sense of mutinous joy, the numerous invisible chains that had held his spirit in thrall. This intellectual self-confidence would be perilously near anarchy but for the inexorable limits imposed by the psychology and previous training of the youth. It could be the real creative force in the development of his personality, but it is very short-lived—it usually dies, after a year or two of intermittent energy, for sheer want of nourishment.

In the whole problem of Indian education no question can be of graver import than a careful and searching study of the causes that usually undermine the intellectual self-confidence of Indian youths before they reach the end of their college career. That such a catastrophe actually happens in the majority of cases there can be no manner of doubt. What this catastrophe means in essence we will try to make clear presently; but before passing on to its discussion we wish to draw to it the utmost attention of every intelligent student of the Indian educational environment. Young India is the product of Western education. It is no doubt full of hope. To all outward seeming it does not lack energy or the vigour of conviction. It seems to be confident of India's future and trying to gather up its forces for pushing on full steam ahead. But is its heart really stout with the courage that never quails? Is it not torn with doubts? Is not its faith as yet a mere expression of the instinct of self-preservation? Is it absolutely sure of its path and its goal? Frankly, Young India is not only half-hearted and nervous with strange fears, but its faith has not also struck roots into the soil and its ideals have not yet emerged from the cloudland. It yearns for faith, certitude, conviction, for some sure and straight path. It is crying for direction and not for the moon. But its yearning is not passionate enough, its cries do not ring with the confidence and courage of the fanatic. There is some sense of inadequacy, some element of inertia, sticking to the mind and character of Young India. It has not passed out of the college without losing an irretrievable something of its spirit and feeling.

Before trying to measure this loss it is of infinite importance to see how the loss occurs. As we have seen, the fresh undergraduate, soon after he finds himself at peace with his new surroundings, feels an illimitable freedom of mind. The old restraints of habit, of convention, of innumerable prohibitions imposed by tradition, authority and usage, gradually fall off as the heady ideas of the West begin to career through his mind in full blast. The vast English literature with its remarkable range, beauty and power, the romance of history and of modern science, the thrill and fascination of the world politics, the scope of modern effort and achievement in art, invention, industry and commerce, the modern thought and modern philosophy, the dreams of the elect of humanity, the griefs and doubts of its afflicted sons, the wonder, the beauty, the joy of things that have nourished the spirit of man through the ages and keep it in full trim of battle under the stress of modern conditions—all these burst upon his vision through the dense opacity of the college atmosphere and he scales dizzy heights of feeling and thought. Every undergraduate goes through this exhilarating experience to a more or less degree. Temperaments and intellectual sensibilities, of course, differ, and there are undergraduates whose period of romance is brief and whose inner flame is soon extinguished by the first blast of cold wind that blows from the conditions and circumstances of their actual lives.

The undergraduate displays, naturally, a variety of type. There is, for instance, the undergraduate whose mind never flowers, so to speak; whose aspiration withers away early in the bud. Little, calculating "wisdom" of the worldling, learnt in a hard, matter-of-fact family environment, or derived from a superficially clever and shrewd companionship, chokes his founts of lofty desire and bounds him up within a tough, material crust for life. He values nothing but the "degree" of B. A., and he knows its price. After a dull, dreary toil he is at last punished by his success at the University examination and quietly passes off into the ranks of those who earn honest livelihoods in Government service or some other hard-worked, frugally-run establishment.

There is the undergraduate, easy-going fancy free, with a fastidious sense for appearances, to whom one serious thought about life and its problems is a perfect boredom. He makes the "smart set" and sometimes degenerates into a fop. He is usually active in his habits and makes the life hum in the college. The ceremonial and showy aspects of college life owe much to his energy and devotion. He is keen, intelligent, with untapped reserves of character within him, but some defect of early training combined with a lively temperament has switched his mind off to seeking social distinction and scenic effects. His quest is for the plums of life, for light and juicy things, for easy, personal conquests, and he goes to England as soon as he can to turn his intellectual acquisitions into current coin by taking on the veneer and polish of the West. When he comes back he generally settles down to unlearn much that he had fondly acquired before, and becomes a useful solvent in social life. There is, again, the undergraduate endowed with great mental stamina and strength of purpose, whose power of application and industry is remarkable. The fates, however, have played him a cruel trick by robbing him of the saving grace of imagination. His college attendance is regular, he is never known to have broken any rule of discipline, he is the pet of his professors, the envy of his less industrious classmates, the butt-end of the wits and idle gossips of the college. The text-book is his treasure, his love, his all. He wins distinction in house and University examinations and goes out into the world as a "brilliant" passman, encumbered with a load of certificates and other vehicles of encomia and good will from his teachers. He gains a "respectable" post in the service of Government and thrives and prospers as far as his worldly desires go. He usually forms the respectable, regular-tax-paying class that is the repository of all social conventions, the vindication of the State and the chief concern of the Legislature.

But the type with which we are concerned is the idealist, the child of imagination and of faith, whose mind roves with eager wonder over vast, unexplored realms of mystery and whose heart is free from petty personal cares and little prosaic selfishnesses—free to grieve for impersonal wrong, to love right and justice and to devote itself to the worship of the true and the beautiful. The sense of freedom that comes to the fresh undergraduate, as a divine breath from heaven, lasts according to the strength of his personality. It is at once a wonderful stimulus and a test of character and mind. The college is a microcosm, however imperfect, of the Indian world with its cross-currents of diverse thoughts, ideas, social purposes, its hopes of rekindled faith, its grave doubts and unsettling problems. The youth's mind feels the first flush of dawn as the spell of its earlier environment dissolves under the wholesome pressure of the college atmosphere. Thought becomes easy, ideas flit in hosts across his brain and feeling grows natural as appetite. When he was at school his sense of communal patriotism had come to birth. In the college he discovers the whole cosmos and claims it as his bride. The process of discovery is swift—the mind rushes with lightning speed through the ascending stages till it comes to dwell in the glory of its recovered heaven. The communal feeling becomes for a while the bedrock of his cosmopolitan emotion. His first discovery is, of course, the boundless world of books. He gets brief, hurried glimpses from them of what has been thought and done and suffered since the birth of creation. He discovers humanity, its essential unity and brotherhood, its sorrows and joys and triumphs. He is held in thrall by the vision of mankind marching with laborious and weary steps through the centuries, still marching on, in spite of its heavy load of sorrows, the sufferings that it has undergone, the unmerited and dull misery of persecuted generations in various climes and at various epochs, the selfishness, cruelty and murderous greed of individuals, the mute distress of unnamed millions who perished unaccountably on the way and whose silence is heard only of God. He feels this with a sinking of his heart, and yet he recovers instantly his joy and confidence through the spectacle of the race manfully battling with fate and circumstance, its hope never flagging and its energies being always refreshed by its inner faith, by the courage and devotion of its martyrs, by the angelic purity of its saints, by the fiery optimism of its prophets who have never failed it in its darkest hour, rekindled its enthusiasm and urged it on to its life-long quest. He probes the eternal riddle, and even without getting a complete and definite answer, he feels sure that the universe is a place worth living in and life is not all a mistake. His sense of justice becomes preternaturally alive, his vision of truth grows brighter. He surveys the modern world and is impatient of the dull, lethargic fellows who can still allow wrong and suffering to exist in the life of mankind. The character of the past ages was immeasurably worse, because they knew so little. Should, however, the modern age, that knows so much and is endowed with such powers and resources as were never dreamt of by the earlier generations, let the old absurdities and obstructions go on? It is monstrous for him to have to think that statesmen and men of power should have neither faith nor ability needed to recast the life of the world in the light of modern thought. Their petty rivalries and quarrels, their insane waste of great personal gifts in violent struggles over trivial matters, their vile schemes and plots to check-mate and thwart their rivals, their levity and cynicism and their indifference to the essential needs of humanity, scandalise him and outrage his sense of the fitness of things. He is puzzled by the strange inconsistencies of the modern civilization, by the sterility of effort and the boldness and fertility of social thought and speculation, by the colossal issues involved in the problems of life and the paucity measure of practical energy devoted to their solution. Surely, the amelioration of the lot of man ought to be the highest ambition of the big men in power. It seems to him so easy and simple. Why do they not attempt it? He is sure he could do it if he had the necessary opportunity and power. He would at any rate try to do his part of the work nearer home. India needs a reconstructed society. He has a clear vision of what it should be. There shall be no rivalries of creed and sect, no caste privileges, no cruelties and injustices upheld by custom. The rank growth of weeds in the social and religious systems shall be swept into the dustbin. Every individual shall have an opportunity to live a clean and beautiful life. His own life and its settings would be a model of perfection. And he then thinks of the sort of wife he should have—a sweet, lovable companion fully responsive to the inner music of his soul. He must really work with vigour for the emancipation of Indian woman. He thinks of education and follows with consuming earnestness the fitful progress of the organised educational and social movements of his community. The old communal wiseacres seem to him to be palsied creatures fumbling nonsense in a jejune spirit. He would put more heart and vigour into the undertaking when the time comes.

But before these glorious fancies have time to settle into a clear purpose and practical lines of conduct, the heavenly vision begins to grow dim, until it finally disappears leaving not a rack behind. Youthful dreams feed the springs of purpose and the roots of character only when they have some relevance, however remote, to outward circumstance. The conditions of actual social life in India are in a hopeless muddle. The dreams of the undergraduate are in fact no more than the phantasies of a pure, abstract aesthete or intellectual anarchist. They run in a detached orbit of subjective emotional experience and fade into oblivion at the first touch of the spirit of reality. The process of disillusionment begins in the classroom. The text-book starves the undergraduate mind. The food he hungers for it does not give. The root-evil is that the type of college education is not based on the national needs of India, or on her race consciousness and experience. Then, the teacher, who has more of the politician in him than of the preceptor of youth, completes the disillusionment by his treatment, example—by his harsh, unsympathetic ways, his irksome impositions, his ceaseless attempts at systematic suppression of the boy's personality. The intellectual self-confidence of the undergraduate is ruined before he passes his B. A. This is the handiwork of the expert educationist who is chosen instrument of a blind and blundering system. The graduate takes his degree and descends from empyrean heights—where he was permitted by fates to play as a god for a dreamwhile—to the ordinary world of men—at best as a Deputy Collector or a Vakil of the High Court.

Verse.

A Vision.

From out the golden dawn of vanished years
She gilds into my dreams, a form divine
Of light and love, to soothe the thoughts that pine
For what has been, to stem the tide of tears
That inward flows upon the heart and sears
Its inmost core Her countenance benign,
Where chastened Pity's softest graces shine,
Reflects the hallowed light of other spheres.
Then to my yearning soul, with care outworn,
Come, like a strain on aerial wings upborne,
This message from her soul—"Bid sorrow cease:
Love dies not; 'tis the immortal life above;
And chastened souls, that win eternal peace
Through earthly suffering, know that Heaven is Love!"

Ghasita: a Budmash.

I.—The Escape from Jail.

I have little sympathy with the European who indulges in ceaseless diatribes on the subject of the Indian climate. He avails himself somewhat too freely, methinks, of the recognised right of his nation to grumble, though as his service grows to an end the same individual will wax wroth concerning the fogs and too sudden changes of his native land and admit that life in the East is by no means the worst form of human existence.

Those fortunate individuals who can afford to go to Cashmere, or a hill station, from the middle of March till the middle of October, and spend the remaining portion of the year at some station situated in the Punjab or the United Provinces, enjoy the rare felicity of living in an unsurpassable climate throughout the twelve months. Even the luckless person, whom a small salary and a large family compel to reside on the plains during the hot weather need not—if ordinary precautions are observed—have his health seriously affected. There is, however, one month in the year when life down below becomes particularly trying: when most of us crawl about under "that inverted Bowl we call the Sky" feeling wretchedly limp and too deficient in energy to enter with any real zest on either work or play. I allude to September on the plains, and at that period the following story opens. A "break" in the rains had occurred, one of those lamentable lacunae of nature which are common enough in the majority of Monsoons, when the firmament assumed a deep blue colour, as crude as it is cruel, differing widely from the bright clear skies of winter and spring, and more depressing, on the whole, than the dull heavy dust-laden clouds that cover the heavens for the fortnight immediately preceding the advent of the rains. If the stifling heat and general mugginess of atmosphere were a severe trial to the official and non-official communities living at Agra, the same conditions were still more sadly resented by compulsory inmates of the Central Jail in that Station. The gang of prisoners, each man with close convict crop, a wooden label descriptive of his sentence and what section of the Penal Code he had broken hanging round his neck as a sort of infernal chaplet of (un) holy beads, clad in a long loose garment of hideous grayish hue, and working under the supervision of warders, moved as lazily as they dared from one end of the ward enclosure to another, performing their allotted tasks in a rather perfunctory fashion. The annual carnival of white and colour washing—called "Repairs"—was in full swing and free labourers were aided by their captive brethren in cleaning up the walls and buildings of the Jail, so that Inspecting Officers on their winter tours might not have cause to find fault or be ashamed of the spick-and-span appearance of the Government building under their charge. Personally I do not believe the majority of Indian prisoners find much of a deterrent nature in the existing state of Jail management. The lower classes do not incur obloquy from having "done time", while in days of scarcity and famine, the temptation to secure regular and wholesome food, have your bodily health carefully attended to, be able perhaps to earn a certain sum from your toil at the loom or other branch of prison industry in return for a fair day's work, must often lead a man to commit comparatively menial breaches of the law in order to share the advantages of a sojourn in the house of the father-in-law, as an Indian Jail is wittily nicknamed by the mass of the population.

In one of the several gangs thus employed, a man might have been noticed who evidently had no taste for confinement within four walls and whose sullen aspect marked him for a character of more dangerous criminal type than most of his companions. His short but sturdy frame, the low forehead, the coarse features, among which a nose of undue width attracted attention, and the sunken eyes, resembling those of a beast of prey without the startling brilliancy of the latter optics, combined to distinguish Ghasita from the rest of his gang. Suddenly the sight of a ladder, left resting against the outer wall of the Jail by some careless workman, prior to his retirement for a couple of hours to eat the midday meal and smoke the hugga forbidden within Jail precincts, created a change in the savage apathy reigning on the countenance of my hero—for such must Ghasita, as chief actor in the events to be narrated, claim to be considered, albeit there was a brutal, rather than a heroidal, strain in his composition—and he forthwith proceeded to study the situation in much the same way as a General Commanding examines the strategical points of a battle-field and determines on the best sort of tactics to employ.

The warders knew that the dinner hour was close at hand and were thinking of that repast and temporary cessation from their duties with natural interest such matters invite. Armed only with short batons, they would not be able to render grave resistance to a desperate man, making a rush for liberty, and the rarity of attempted escapes from Jail would make them slow to grasp an unexpected departure from the ordinary routine of prison discipline. With few exceptions—Ghasita being one of these latter—the Indian qaidi is too great a fatalist to seek in flight his freedom from the sentence awarded him by a court. He calmly accepts the inevitable, and, if a professional criminal, finds opportunities during enforced absence from his calling as a burglar, dacoit, or common thief, to pick up useful "tips" from fellow convicts and leisure for concocting "felonious little plans" to be put in practice as soon as he emerges from Jail and is at liberty to resume his former mode of livelihood.

In the eyes of Ghasita the forgotten ladder seemed a direct boon from Providence and one he would be a fool not to take advantage of. The drop on the far side of the wall might be a trifle risky, yet he was accustomed to jump from high roofs in his burglarious expeditions. The thing was worth trying, and for such attempt the man was ready as soon as the time arrived. The last notes of the big prison gong summoning the convicts to their respective barracks, where dinners were about to be served out, had scarcely died away when each warder proceeded to marshal his little troop of black sheep, and hold a roll-call ere marching them out of the large enclosure where they had been at work. This was a suitable chance for Ghasita, and he managed to loiter behind his comrades, pretending to have hurt his foot by treading on some sharp substance, so had halted to remove it before coming forward with the other members of his gang. The warder did not notice anything strange in this delay, so he commenced shouting out the men's names in monotonous tone, receiving the usual hazir from the convicts in reply. A shout from one of the regular Jail Guard—men armed with smooth-bore muskets and on a quite distinct footing from the ordinary warders, who are selected from the better behaved prisoners, which frequently means those who have had previous convictions, consequently "know the ropes" of prison life and are able to make themselves generally useful to a Darogah and his subordinates—created a stir among both the prisoners and warders, which rose to wild excitement when Ghasita was seen scaling the wall with wonderful rapidity and almost at the top rung of the convenient ladder. The Guard in question hesitated to shoot as he would have been perfectly justified to do by his orders—till just too late, the charge of buckshot rattling against the wall when the fugitive had surmounted the coping and dropt down on the other side. Of course a scene of hubbub and confusion ensued. The Darogah—a stout personage, whose girth of waist testified to the excellent emoluments connected with the post he held, waddled out of the office in the main gateway; the armed Guard fell in and stood awaiting instructions, the warders hastened to place their charges under lock and key in the long barracks inhabited by prisoners and the gangs commented on the (to them), extraordinary audacity of Ghasita in thus taking French leave of Jail without first having obtained the permission of the Sikar. Meanwhile that worthy was running for all he was worth down the road that passes the lofty tower of the Roman Catholic cathedral at Agra, with the hope of discovering a safe hiding place from the pursuit that was bound to come after him. Paradoxical as it may appear to a European unacquainted with India, the fact of his escape being effected at midday was greatly in favour of the convict. Unless compelled by business of an urgent nature, none of the citizens were stirring abroad between the hours of noon and 5 p. m., so intense was the stifling heat, so total the absence of the slightest breeze.

Shop-keepers had ceased to expect customers and had taken refuge in the "honey-heavy dew of slumber"; reclining on the small wooden platforms which stood a foot or two above the level of the street and served as common vantage ground for purchaser and seller to engage in the art of bargaining. Passing a stall where an array of round caps—of the kind affected by young men studying for an Entrance Examination—caught the eye of Ghasita, who adroitly substituted his headgear of the standard pattern in use in Jails for a smarter article of head dress and had already managed to untie the string whereby the wooden label had been suspended from his thick neck. He looked eagerly round for some convenient place to hide himself in till evening came and the inevitable pursuit would have been abandoned for the present. Turning sharply to the right, he skirted the large compound of the Agra College and venturing to enter the grounds—where not even a muli was to be seen at work—he spied an outhouse that might serve his purpose. Going into the shed, he found one corner of it occupied by a stack of old beams, probably removed as unsound when the annual repairs were in progress, and behind these bullis he devised a fairly comfortable retreat, unlikely to be examined by the Police, who, moreover, would hardly suspect him of seeking so apparently open a spot for concealment, the shed not boasting of a door and being well in view from the highroad and College buildings. Ghasita evinced considerable sagacity in his choice, for twenty minutes later he had the satisfaction of watching a mixed party of Jail Warders and Constables from the Police Station of Hariparbat hurrying along the road and questioning the very few persons they met as to whether the latter had seen anything of the runaway convict. Their quest proved a fruitless one, for the owners of shops and stalls had—as I remarked above—abandoned business for repose, and were in too much drowsy a state to worry themselves about escaping Jail-birds.

The vendors of native sweets—usually on the look-out to get the pice in exchange for their sugary wares—dozed placidly in the scanty shade afforded by the awning of a booth, their weighing scales deposited at their feet, and themselves quite indifferent to the swarms of yellow, tapery wasps and fierce hornets with brown bodies relieved by an orange band, that hovered over the pile of jallebis, batashas, and the thick slabs of peta: a toothsome delicacy for which Agra is famous. Ghasita, therefore, lay perdu in perfect safety till nearly sunset, when he hoped to make his way to the adjoining mohulla of Lohamandi, where some relatives of his resided and where he could get a new outfit in lieu of the prison dress he had on. It will be necessary to make a short digression here, before continuing the story of Ghasita, in order to give our readers a fuller insight into the personality and past career of that most unprepossessing personage. He was Kachi and belonged to one of several families of that caste who lived in the Lohamandi bazar and earned money by growing and selling the common kinds of vegetables to soldiers in the neighbouring Cantonment, and people in the Civil Lines and the city. When a young man of twenty, or thereabouts, he had been annoyed by a British soldier who resented being charged more than the fair price for some onions of inferior quality and who accordingly had driven Ghasita from the barrack-room with a hearty cuff and shower of military abuse. Tommy Atkins attached no importance to the episode, so was taken unawares an evening or two after this event when he found an Indian rushing at him with a sharp knife in hand, which weapon he plunged into the side of the soldier. The crime was committed in the Sudder bazar—where most of the British rank-and-file did their shopping, so the arrest of Ghasita was quickly accomplished, and before a month elapsed he found himself in Jail for seven years: a sentence that obliged his journeying to the Andamans to serve the greater portion of his term of confinement there. Released on the expiration of the period mentioned, and not having won any remission by good behaviour while in prison, Ghasita first tried Calcutta as a good field for his talents in the housebreaking line and "conveyed"—"a fie for the phrase"—a fair amount of property from its rightful owners to the dirty lodgings he occupied in a Calcutta slum. The proceeds of his crimes were speedily dissipated, for Ghasita felt that his stay in the Andamans required to be compensated for by a round of pleasure, and spent his rupees in the pursuit of wine and women almost as rapidly as he made them. Unluckily he became a subject of strong suspicion to the Bengali policemen and was "wanted" in a notorious case of robbery with violence. His record was hunted up and inquiries made from Agra as to the antecedents and general character of our friend; unpleasant curiosity on the part of the authorities that showed him it was time to quit the City of Palaces for a season and seek new worlds to conquer by the aid of his trusty "jemmy" and resolute daring. Accordingly he took a ticket for his native home and shook off the dust of Howrah as he entered that terminus of the E. I. Railway. Not being what is termed a "family man"—his wife dead some years ago and no children to share his ill-gotten gains or worry him by questions regarding his mode of life,—Ghasita lost no time in getting in touch with the local bad characters of Agra; a criminal community whose numbers they make up for their want of social status. He chose the Rikabgunge mohulla in preference to Lohamandi where his caste-fellows chiefly resided, and this course endangered his liberty from surveillance, since one of the Constables belonging to the Municipal Police had sufficient length of service to retain lively memories of Ghasita, the Kachi who had severely wounded a soldier and been sent to jail for that offence. This fact, coupled to the knowledge of his being a close associate of habitual thieves, receivers of stolen property, and other bad characters, led to proceedings being started against Ghasita under the provisions of section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code and—to shorten the tale—he was duly arrested and sentenced to three years imprisonment. Nobody came forward to stand surety for his good behaviour, for the most careless student of human nature would have shrunk from reliance on any hopes of amendment from so desperate and hardened a ruffian as the man who stood in the dock, scowling with impartial hatred at the Magistrate, the Police and, especially, at the Constable whose reminiscences had formed a strong point in the prosecution. He allowed his rage to overcome his prudence where that person was concerned, for—on the order for his committal to the Central Jail being read out by the Court—he fiercely shouted out his avowed intention of having his revenge directly he was a free man again. Such threats are usually treated as a mere piece of idle bravado, a sort of sign that the utterer of them dies "game," but coming from Ghasita they ought to have been paid serious attention to, as the sequel will serve to show.

The sound of the Azan, wafted by the gentle evening breeze from the lofty minarets of the Jama Masjid just opposite to the red sandstone fortress built by the mighty Akbar, awakened him from an uneasy slumber he had fallen into, and he impatiently waited till it was sufficiently dark to permit of his proceeding on his way without grave risk of attracting notice by the manner in which he was dressed. The street lamps in those days—perchance at the present time—did not do much more than cast a feeble light on the surrounding gloom, and the majority of people were too busied in their own affairs to notice the actions or appearance of a stranger. The hum of reviving traffic and mercantile activity rose from the thronged bazaars of the city with increasing volume, and Ghasita experienced no difficulty in making his way unobserved to Lohamandi and the cluster of humble huts inhabited by the little colony of Kachis. His advent, when he stood from outer darkness to where several members of the caste were seated in a circle, discussing the prospects of trade and smoking by turns—the fragrant huqqa passed from man to man as the conversation progressed—caused as much consternation as it did agreeable surprise. Ghasita affected to ignore. He briefly related his escape from the Central Jail and made known his wants in the shape of garments and a "square meal." A general desire to get rid of their visitor as soon as possible led to both requests being complied with. The prison garb was carefully hidden away, to be burnt later on in the night, and replaced by a soiled kurti and a dhoti that had evidently seen better days and which had not been acquainted with soap and water for a lengthy period. None of the party seemed interested in the returned prodigal, except a girl of about sixteen years of age, called Nasibun, in whose eyes the escaped convict figured as an oppressed hero of romance. His scaling the prison walls seemed to her a feat worthy of Hanuman, the Monkey God who assisted mighty Rama when Lanka was attacked and stormed. His looks were certainly not calculated to inspire tender passions in the female breast, still one must not forget the case of Othello and Desdemona, and the exploits of Ghasita—told while greedily devouring the chupatties and vegetable curry set before him—exercised as potent a spell over the mind of Nasibun as did the tale of "Moving accidents by flood and field;"

"Of being taken by the insolent foe,"

"And sold to slavery;"

influence the daughter of the Venetian Senator in favour of the Moorish warrior. Ghasita was bound for the cantonment railway station,—when he intended to travel to Saiyan, a place about 17 miles from Agra, and from which he could make his way into the hilly tract of country between the Native States of Dholpur, Bhartpore, and British territory. He had learned from talks with dacoits in Jail that the region in question was a capital hiding place from the officers of justice; without any fixed population save in tiny hamlets, situated in recesses of the hills and mainly inhabited by "broken men;" outlaws from British law or sought for by the State authorities. Before leaving he perceived with grim satisfaction the manner in which Nasibun regarded him and his past doings and mentally resolved to make use of the girl as a spy or carrier of information should occasion for employing her in such capacity ever arise. It was close on midnight before the convict left his anxious hosts and stole away to the railway, where he caught his train and before another day dawned was several miles on his road to the hills of the robbers.

Indians in South Africa.

The Commission's Report.

THE MARRIAGE QUESTION.

THIS is the most difficult of all the questions into which we have to enquire and it raises several separate and distinct points.

(a) The first is as to the right of entry into the Union, of the wife and minor children of an Indian resident in South Africa. Section 5 (g) of the Immigration Regulation Act, 1913, excepts from the definition of prohibited immigrant "any person who is proved to the satisfaction of an immigration officer, or in the case of appeal to the satisfaction of the Board, to be the wife or the child under the age of 16 years, of any person exempted by paragraph (f) of the section (that is to say any person with certain exceptions, domiciled in any Province) including the wife or child of a lawful or monogamous marriage duly celebrated according to the rites of any religious faith outside the Union." Judging from the debates in Parliament on the Bill and the evidence before us, the intention of this clause appears to have been to admit freely into the Union the wife and the children by her of any domiciled Indian, if she were in fact his only wife, even though she had been married to him according to the rites of a religion which recognises polygamy. Natal Courts held, however, in the case of a woman named Kulsan Bibi, that under the words "lawful and monogamous marriage" are included only such marriage as are recognised as valid in South Africa as well as in England, that is to say "the voluntary union of one man with one woman, to the exclusion, while it lasts, of all others," and that consequently the marriage of a man with one woman under a system which recognises the right of the husband to marry another woman, was in law not monogamous but polygamous.

Seeing that the Act of 1913 is a general Act and does not deal with Asiatics en nomine it is impossible to question that decision. Unfortunately the effect of it clearly is to defeat the apparent intention of the legislature, and to stigmatise as a prohibited immigrant the only wife of a domiciled Indian if she were married to him according to the rites of a religion which recognised polygamy.

There is abundant evidence, however, to show that it has never been the intention of the Government in the administration of the Act to place upon the words of Section 5 (g) their strict legal meaning. Accordingly when Mr. Gandhi, in his letter to the Minister of the 2nd July, 1913, required from him an assurance that "the present practice of admitting one wife of the Indian immigrant, so long as she is the only one in South Africa, irrespective of the number of the wives that he might have in India, should be continued," that assurance was readily given.

In the letter of the Secretary of Interior to Mr. Gandhi, dated 19th August, 1913, he says "the present practice of admitting one wife of an Indian now entitled to reside in any Province, or who may in future be permitted to enter the Union, irrespective of the fact that his marriage to such wife may have been solemnised according to tenets which recognise polygamy, or that she is one of several wives married abroad, will be continued so long as she is his only wife in South Africa."

In the case of Kulsan Bibi, already referred to, the reason why her entry into Natal was prohibited, was, according to the evidence of the immigration officer, because her reputed husband already had a wife living with him in Natal. There was therefore no departure in that case from the recognised practice of the Department, with regard to which no complaint had been made to us. Inasmuch, however, as the practice is contrary to the express provisions of the Act, which recognises the right of entry of only the wife of a lawful and monogamous marriage, and as no other women, therefore, could legally claim the right, it is desirable in our opinion that the section of the Act in question should be amended so as to bring the law into conformity with the practice.

(b) The next point raised by Mr. Gandhi in his correspondence with the Minister on this subject was with regard to the right of entry into the Union of the plural wives of Indian resident in South Africa.

It is not altogether clear what is the exact extent of the claim made by him on this point. In his letter to the Minister, dated 24th August, 1913, he says, "All I contend is that in continuation of the practice hitherto followed, existing plural wives of domiciled residents should be allowed to enter. And this was the assurance given in the letter quoted by me in my correspondence with you."

The letter referred to by him is one of the 10th July, 1913, written by the Chief Immigration Officer in reply to one received by him from Cachalia, the Chairman of the British Indian Association, drawing attention to a recent judgment of the Transvaal Provincial Division, and enquiring "whether it will affect the practice hitherto followed of allowing more than one wife of Mohammedan residents of the Province to enter it." "By the judgment referred to it was laid down that under the Transvaal law only one wife of an Asiatic was entitled to enter that Province. The reply of the Chief Immigration Officer is as follows:

"With regard to your letter of the 5th instant I am instructed to inform you that the ruling of the learned Judge in the case of Adam Ismail versus the Registrar of Asiatics regarding the immigration of the wives of Indians has been noted, and to state that if any case involving hardship is brought to the notice of the Hon. the Minister it will receive consideration." This letter is decidedly non-committal, and certainly does not bear the construction placed upon it by Mr. Gandhi in his letter of the 24th August already quoted. It is unfortunate that he did not himself appear before the Commission to explain exactly what it is that he desires in this connection. From Sir Benjamin Robertson and others, however, we gathered that the general principle as recognised in the practice of the Immigration Department of "admitting one wife of an Indian immigrant so long as she is the only wife in South Africa, irrespective of the number of wives that he may have in India" is generally accepted by the Indian community, but that it was desired that an exception should be made in favour of a limited number of men of long residence in South Africa, who have now or have had more than one wife living with them in this country, so that these wives should be allowed to go backwards and forwards to India without question. Sir Benjamin Robertson stated that he understood that there were only from 40 to 50 of such persons in Natal, that a list of them could be made, and that it would be regarded as a graceful concession if this privilege could be extended to them. Mr. Dick, the Chief Immigration Officer in Natal, was examined on the subject. He informed us that up to with in the last seven to ten years the practice in Natal had been to admit more than one wife of a husband resident in that Province, but that of late the right of entry had been restricted to only one wife. Where more than one wife had been admitted by the Department, the right of such wives to go backwards and forwards to India was also recognised. He thought that there might be in Natal from 50 to 100 old residents to whom this privilege had been accorded, and if it was to be continued he thought that a register should be made of them, that a period of 12 months should be given them within which to register their names and those of their wives, and that the right should be limited to those so registered and to their minor children. The period of twelve months was suggested, inasmuch as that is the time for which an identification certificate which is given to Indians visiting their native land remains in force. Consequently there would be sufficient time for any of such persons who might be absent from the country when the register was opened, to make application for registration after their return to South Africa.

The evidence goes to show that a similar state of affairs exists in the Cape Colony and Transvaal, though we have no accurate information as to the number of the persons concerned in these Provinces.

The concession asked for in respect of the limited number of Indians resident in South Africa is a comparatively small one, and should in our opinion be granted. With regard to plural wives who are at present lawfully living with their husbands in any of the Provinces, their case will seem to be met by Section 25 (2) of the Act, and we understand from Mr. Cousius, the Chief Immigration Officer of the Province of the Cape of Good Hope, that there would be no objection to granting them identification certificates if they desired to go to India for a visit with the intention of returning to this country. The only point that could arise as to them would be with reference to the period of their absence, inasmuch as identification certificates lapse after the period of one year. If, however, the recommendation which is hereafter made that the period should be extended to three years is adopted, no difficulty need be anticipated regarding them. It may very well be, however, that there are women who have been in South Africa with their husbands, but who are at present in India, and in their case we are of opinion that they with their minor children, should be allowed to join their husbands again at any time that may please them. It is chiefly with view to these that we recommend that instructions should be issued to the Immigration Department to open registers in the various Provinces as suggested by the Chief Immigration Officer of Natal.

(c) The third point that arises in connection with the marriage question has reference to the celebration in South Africa of marriages between Indian men and women in conformity with the rites of their respective religions. In his letter to the Minister of the 2nd July, 1913, Mr. Gandhi writes: "As to the marriage question, in view of the Searle judgment, it is absolutely necessary to legalise Indian marriages celebrated or to be celebrated within the Union. This can be done by amending the marriage laws of the different Provinces authorising the Government to appoint marriage officers for different denominations, whose certificates as to the celebration of marriage according to the rites of the respective religions of the parties would be recognised as proper proof of marriage."

It is necessary to point out here that as regards Mohammedans provision has been made in the Cape Colony by Act 16 of 1860, and in Natal by Act 19 of 1891, for the appointment by the Governor of marriage officers for the purpose of solemnising the marriage of persons professing the Jewish faith and of persons professing the Mohammedan faith. We are informed, however, that, though both in the Cape and in Natal, after the passing of the Acts, Mohammedan priests were appointed as marriage officers, the Mohammedans have not availed themselves of the privilege to any great extent, and that for years past no appointment of marriage officers has been made. The difficulty, according to the evidence before us, is that their religion recognises the right of a man to marry as many as four wives, and they consider that they should be false to their faith if they renounced that right. A marriage contracted in South Africa before a marriage officer would necessarily be monogamous and not polygamous, and they prefer not to enter into such unions, but to accept the position that in law their marriages are not valid rather than renounce the doctrines of their religion. This is the attitude which has always been taken up by the Malays in the Cape Colony, and, as far as we know, there has been no agitation on their part for an amendment of the law so as to recognise polygamous marriages as valid.

Whether the Indians who profess religions other than the Mohammedans hold the same views on this subject seems doubtful. A witness named Aiyar, who is the editor of the Indian newspaper called the African Chronicle, and who gave evidence before us, stated that the Indians would be quite willing to contract marriages before a priest who had been appointed a marriage officer, with full knowledge of the fact that by so doing they were entering into a monogamous and not a polygamous marriage. Whether the witness speaks with authority and represents the views of the Indians generally, we unfortunately had no opportunity of ascertaining, as the Indian community in general, other than the Mohammedan section of it, persistently ignored the Commission. From the fact, however, that Mr. Gandhi, in the letter already quoted, made a request for the appointment of marriage officers for the different denominations, we gather that he is of the same opinion as Aiyar for he must have realized that a marriage celebrated before a marriage officer would necessarily be in accordance with the laws of South Africa, or, in other words, would be monogamous. And that this was his view at the time when this letter was written is further indicated by the following passage in it: "With reference to the marriage amendment in the new Act, I understand that only monogamous marriages will be registered, and I appreciate that nothing more can be done in law at present, but an assurance is necessary to the effect that the present practice of admitting one wife of an Indian immigrant, so long as she is the only wife in South Africa, irrespective the number of wives he may have in India, will be continued." In that passage he apparently accepts the position that only monogamous marriages can be recognised in law as valid. Whether Mr. Gandhi is still of this opinion was have had no opportunity of ascertaining from himself.

As regards the indentured Indians, however, we do not anticipate that any difficulty will arise. They apparently are quite content to contract monogamous marriages. By the Indian Immigration Act 25 of 1891 of Natal, it is provided by Section 66 "that no polygamous marriages which may hereafter be contracted by Indian immigrants in this Colony shall be considered valid as far as this Colony is concerned, and that no polygamous marriage shall be registered by the Protector of Indian immigrants or by any Magistrate."

Provision is then made in Section 70 for the marriage of all Indian Immigrants, except those professing the Christian religion, before a Magistrate or before the Protector of Indian Immigrants. Such marriages are registered by these officer, and are necessarily monogamous.

According to the evidence of the Protector of Immigrants the indentured Indians have no scruples against contracting such unions. During last year, he informed us, that 1,075 marriages were solemnised before himself and different Magistrates in Natal. Many of these persons are first married according to the rites of their own religion, and subsequently go through the ceremony of marriage before the Protector or a Magistrate. In respect of these Indians, therefore, there appears to be no necessity for making further provision.

When, therefore, Mr. Gandhi applied for the appointment of marriage officers amongst Indian priests, he probably had in mind Indians other than indentured labourers, who might have scruples about contracting marriages before any such official. We are informed that amongst their priests in Natal and other Provinces there are educated men of good character, by whom marriage registers could be kept. If that be so we see no reason why the request for the appointment of marriage officers from amongst their number should not be granted. The Minister, indeed, in his reply to Mr. Gandhi's letter, entirely approved of the principles. In the letter of the Secretary of the Interior of the 19th August, 1913, he writes: "Fourthly, General Enmuts is prepared, when some suitable occasion presents itself for dealing with the consolidation of the Union, to make provision for the appointment of special marriage officers, for denominations other than Mohammedans, upon its being shown that there is a demand by the members of such denominations for such appointment, and that there are suitable persons in the different communities on whom the appointment could be conferred." We would recommend that the necessary legislation on the lines of the Cape Act 16 of 1860 should be passed as early as possible, so that those who are desirous of availing themselves of the privilege of contracting a valid marriage before their own priests, whether such persons be many or few, should have the opportunity of doing so without further delay.

(d) And that brings us to the fourth and last point which is raised on this question, and which presents greater difficulties than any of the preceding.

The point is not brought out very clearly by Mr. Gandhi in his letters, but it has been elucidated by the evidence given before us, especially by that of Sir Benjamin Robertson. It has been held in more than one case in the South African Courts, and notably in what is spoken of throughout the evidence as the Searle judgment, that where a man had married only one wife under a system which recognises polygamy, such a marriage is in law a polygamous and not a monogamous marriage. The result is that, as polygamous marriages are not recognised by our law, the wife in such a case has no legal status as a married woman, and the children are illegitimate. It appears from the evidence that the Searle judgment, which was delivered in 1910, caused intense feeling in India as casting a slur upon Indian women. That judgment, however, merely laid down the law in accordance with previous decisions of the Courts, both in England and in South Africa.

In the Cape Colony it was decided, so long ago as 1860, in the case of Broun and Fritz Broun's executors, that children born of a marriage celebrated according to Mohammedan rites in the Colony, were illegitimate, as no valid marriage had been contracted. It was in consequence of that decision that Act 16 of 1860 of the Cape of Good Hope was passed authorising the Governor to appoint marriage officers for the purpose of celebrating the marriages of persons professing the Mohammedan faith, but, as already explained, the Malays in the Cape Province have failed to take advantage of the provisions of that Act, preferring to accept the legal position that their marriages are invalid than to renounce the right which is recognised by their religion, of marrying more than one wife.

It is almost unnecessary to point out that on this subject our law is identical with that of England, and that the status in that country of a woman married under a system which recognises polygamy is no better than it is in South Africa. So far as we know, however, there has been no demand for a change in the laws of England with the view of validating such marriages. The probable explanation is that there is no large Indian population settled there, so that the question is not brought home to them as regards that country. But, however that may be, we are bound to consider the subject on its merits, without regard to the position in other parts of the world.

Now the suggestion, as we understand it, is that some provision should be made by legislation for legalising what are called de facto monogamous marriages, that is to say, the marriage of one man with one woman under a system which recognises the right of the husband to take one or more other wives. Such marriages are the rule amongst Indians of all denominations. It is the rare exception for an Indian to have more than one wife. It is more often amongst the Mohammedans that that number is exceeded, but even with them it is a matter of only occasional occurrence. And in all cases where in fact a man is married to only one woman we can see no objection to legislation validating such marriages from the date when they were contracted, on certain conditions.

The first condition is that such marriages should be registered before a marriage officer, whether he be a priest or a Resident Magistrate or an official specially appointed for that purpose. It is important in our opinion that a complete register of all marriages should be kept and that Indians both men and women, who have been married according to the rites of their respective religions and who desire to avail themselves of the proposed law to validate such marriages should be required to appear before a marriage officer and apply for registration. It is not suggested that they should go through any ceremony but merely that they should satisfy the officer that their marriage is a de facto monogamous one, and should supply him with particulars of their names and ages as well as of the time and place of their respective marriages.

It is unfortunate that in India there is no system of registration of marriages, otherwise all that would have been necessary would have been to produce to the officer a copy of the register. As that, however, is impossible the necessary information for filling in the register must be obtained from the persons applying for registration. When the particulars have been entered in the register and when it has been signed by the officer the marriage should be taken to have been validated from the date when it was contracted. Provision should also be made for the filling of a duplicate original register in the office of the Minister of the Interior as is required in respect of all marriages celebrated in South Africa.

It has been suggested that a law should be passed simply validating all de facto monogamous marriages and not insisting upon registration. The objections to that course are obvious. In the first place registration of marriages is important from the point of view that it provides a simple means of proof of the fact that a marriage has been solemnised. In the absence of registration the only way in which a marriage can be established, when that fact is in issue, is the evidence of witnesses who were present at the ceremony or who can prove it in some other way. Serious difficulties might often arise in such cases, particularly if the marriage had been contracted many years ago, or if one of the parties chose to deny the fact.

In the second place it may very well be that there are many Asiatics who have no desire that their marriages should be validated except on their own terms and their wishes should be respected. All persons therefore, should be entitled to elect whether they should come under the provisions of the proposed law or not, and an application for registration would be conclusive evidence of such election.

The second condition which in our opinion is essential to the validation of such marriages is that they should by registration become monogamous in law as well as in fact. All the legal consequences therefore which flow from marriage under our common law, should follow upon such registration, except in so far as it may be deemed necessary to make special provision by legislation. One result would be that thereafter the husband could not enter into any relations with another woman which would be recognised by law.

If, however, he desired to go through a form of marriage with another woman before a priest, who is not a marriage officer, according to the forms of his religion, we see no reason why such a proceeding should be prohibited by law. It clearly would not amount to bigamy, inasmuch as a marriage solemnised before such a person would not be valid by our law, and consequently the legal requisites which are necessary to constitute the crime of bigamy would be wanting. Inasmuch, therefore, as such marriages would not transgress the provisions of the criminal law, there is no necessity for interfering with those who desire to contract them. But it must at the same time be clearly understood that the relation so created is an irregular one, which is not recognised by law, which would not confer any rights upon the woman and her offspring, and of which the first wife, if she is so disposed could take advantage.

Nor do we recommend that any legislation should be passed to recognise and legitimise such an intercourse. To do so would be to ignore the principles underlying monogamous marriages and partially to recognise polygamy. In our opinion, however, there can be no convenient half-way house between monogamy and polygamy. If the latter is to be recognised at all in respect of Asiatics, we must be prepared to go the whole length and accept it to its utmost extent. We are not prepared, however, to recommend that legislation should be passed to legitimise polygamy. That would be so serious a departure from our principles and law that we do not think that it would be endorsed by public opinion. The position is that the Asiatics have of their own accord migrated to a country where monogamy is the rule, but nevertheless they have never been restricted in the exercise of their religious rights. The Malays have accepted the situation for many years past and there has been no demand on their part for a change in the law. In truth the agitation on this subject has arisen rather in India than in South Africa. It has already been pointed out that the indentured Indians have in practice accepted the principle of monogamy, and have no scruples about contracting such marriages. Moreover, Mr. Gandhi himself in the letter already quoted above, says that he understands that only monogamous marriages will be recognised, and that he appreciates that nothing else can be done in law at present; while in another letter of the 22nd September, 1913, he says "With regard to polygamy, I have not asked for legal recognition." The demand indeed for recognition of polygamy comes only from the Mohammedan section of the Indian community. That claim is distinctly formulated in the evidence given before us by the three delegates of the Natal Indian Congress. When asked the question whether they claimed that polygamous marriages should be recognised, the answer was:—"That is the only thing we could ask." They also stated that they would object to registration of a de facto monogamous marriage if the husband was thereby to be limited to one wife, as by so doing he would be false to his religion.

They also object for the same reason to becoming subject to our laws with regard to divorce. According to the doctrines of their religion, there is no necessity to apply to a Court of Justice for the dissolution of a marriage. In fact, as regards divorce the husband is the judge in his own cause. If he is satisfied in his own mind that his wife is misconducting herself, he is entitled, after warning her three times, at an interval of a month taking place between each warning, to go to the priest and write out before two witnesses what is called a "Divorce Paper" setting forth his reasons for divorcing his wife.

He then utters a special word signifying "I leave her alone," and thereupon the marriage is dissolved. The paper is handed to the wife as evidence, to enable her to contract another marriage. The priest himself, it will be noted, makes no investigation into the charge, and all that is necessary is that the husband himself should be satisfied of his wife's misconduct. On the other hand the wife has no similar right to divorce her husband. All she can do is to lay a complaint before the priest who enquires into the matter and, if satisfied that the charge is true, he summons the husband before him, and if he persists in his misconduct, the priest can bring pressure upon him, to divorce his wife.

This is the effect of the evidence given before us on this subject, and this is the law which we are asked to recognise. It needs only to be stated, however, to realise how open to abuse it is, and how impossible it would be for us to accede to the request of the Mohammedans that we should recommend legislation, recognising and legalising the Mohammedan law of marriage and divorce.

It is possible, however, that, if they clearly understand that there will be no prohibition against their going through the form of marriage with one or more women after their first marriage has been registered, and that by so doing they would not be incurring any penalties, they would be prepared to accept the suggestion already made as a solution of this question. What they apparently object to is the renunciation of the rights, which they enjoy under their religion, of marrying more than one wife. Such a registration as we have suggested, however, would not require any renunciation of their rights, nor would they be debarred by law from marrying other women in accordance with the rites of their own religion, though these women could not be recognised as having any legal status as married women.

The solution which we have suggested is approved of by Sir Benjamin Robertson in his evidence. Moreover, there is precedent for it in the Natal laws with regard to the indentured Indian immigrants.

By the Consolidation Act 25 of 1891, section 68, provision is made for the registration by the Protector of Immigrants of persons who are described as married in the Immigration Lists, and such registration has the effect of validating the marriage. There is a distinct prohibition, however, in section 66 against the registration of any polygamous marriage, though by an earlier Act, 12 of 1872, provision was made for the registration of such marriages, and section 68 provides for the validation of those which had been registered at the time of the passing of the Act of 1891. A later Act of 1907 departs from the principle laid down in section 66, "That no polygamous marriage shall be registered by the Protector of Indian Immigrants or by any Magistrate," for by section 6 it is enacted that "The provisions of section 68 of the Indian Immigration Law 1891 shall, as regards Indian immigrants arriving in the country after the commencement of this Act, apply to all marriages shown in the certified copies of their marriage certificates notwithstanding that any such marriage may be a polygamous marriage." And in section 7 provision is made for the registration of polygamous marriages of Indian immigrants who had arrived in the Colony prior to the commencement of the Act. The section then sets forth, "That the registration of a marriage under this section shall have the same validity and effect as the registration of marriages under the 68th section of the said Law 1891." In this Act, therefore, it will be seen that there is a distinct recognition of polygamy in the case of a limited number of indentured Indian immigrants, but as immigration from India has now been stopped this Act is no longer of any effect. The principle embodied in it, however, is one of which we do not approve, and we do not feel justified in recommending that it should in any way be extended.

There is another precedent in South Africa for the validation by registration of marriages which were invalid by law in the regulations for the Native Territories made in 1879 under the provisions of the Transkeian Annexation Act of 1877, which regulations have the force of law in those territories. Regulation 31 provides that "Any marriage celebrated according to ordinary Kaffir or Fingo forms, provided that it is registered within three months from the date of such marriage in a book to be kept for that purpose by the Resident Magistrate of the district, shall be taken to be in all respects as valid and binding.....as a marriage contract under the marriage laws of the Cape Colony."

The recommendation which we have made on this subject, therefore, is one which not only commends itself to our sense of what is right and proper in the circumstances, but it is also supported by precedent, and we feel justified, therefore, in submitting it for favourable consideration.

Studies of Extravagance.*

The Writer.

EVERY morning when he awoke his first thought was: How am I? For it was extremely important that he should be well, seeing that when he was not well he could neither produce what he knew he ought, nor contemplate that lack of production with equanimity. Having discovered that he did not ache anywhere, he would say to his wife: "Are you all right?" and, while she was answering, he would think: "Yes—if I make that last chapter pass subjectively through his personality, then I had better—" and so on. Not having heard whether his wife were all right he would get out of bed, and do that which he called "abdominal cult," for it was necessary that he should digest his food and preserve his figure, and while he was doing it he would partly think: "I am doing this well," and partly he would think: "That fellow in 'The Parnassus' is quite wrong—he simply doesn't see—" And pausing for a moment with nothing on, and his toes level with the top of a chest of drawers, he would say to his wife: "What I think about that Parnassus fellow is that he doesn't grasp the fact that my books—" And he would not fail to hear her answer warmly: "Of course he doesn't; he's a perfect idiot." He would then shave. This was his most creative moment, and he would soon cut himself and utter a little groan, for it would be needful now to find his special cotton wool and stop the bleeding, which was a paltry business, and not favorable to the flight of genius. And if his wife, taking advantage of the incident, said something which she had long been waiting to say, he would answer, wondering a little what it was she had said, and thinking: "There it is, I get no time for steady thought."

Having finished shaving he would bathe, and a philosophical conclusion would almost invariably come to him just before he doused himself with cold—so that he would pause, and call out through the door: "You know, I think the Supreme Principle—" And while his wife was answering, he would resume the drowning of her words, having fortunately remembered just in time that his circulation would suffer if he did not douse himself with cold while he was still warm. He would dry himself dreamily developing that theory of the Universe, and imparting it to his wife in sentences that seldom had an end, so that it was not necessary for her to answer them. While dressing he would stray a little, thinking: "Why can't I concentrate myself on my work; it's awful!" And if he had by any chance a button off, he would present himself rather unwillingly, feeling that it was a waste of his time. Watching her frown from sheer self-effacement over her button sewing, he would think: "She is wonderful! How can she put up with doing things for me all day long?" And he would fidget a little, feeling in his bones that the postman had already come.

He went down always thinking: "Oh! hang it; this infernal post taking up all my time!" And as he neared the breakfast room, he would quicken his pace; seeing a large pile of letters on the table, he would say, automatically, "Curse!" and his eyes would brighten. If—as seldom happened—there were not a green-colored wrapper enclosing mentions of him in the press, he would murmur: "Thank God!" and his face would fall.

It was his custom to eat feverishly, walking a good deal, and reading about himself, and when his wife tried to bring him to a sense of his disorder, he would tighten his lips without a word, and think: "I have a good deal of self-control."

He seldom commenced work before eleven, for though he always intended to, he found it practically impossible not to dictate to his wife things about himself, such as how he could not lecture here; or where he had been born; or how much he would take for this; and why he would not consider that; together with those letters which began:—

"My dear—,

"Thanks tremendously for your letter about my book, and its valuable criticism. Of course, I think you are quite wrong. . . . You don't seem to have grasped. . . . In fact, I don't think you ever quite do me justice.

"Yours affectionately,

When his wife had copied those that might be valuable after he was dead, he would stamp the envelopes, and exclaiming, "Nearly eleven—my God!" would go somewhere where they think.

It was during those hours when he sat in a certain chair with a pen in his hand that he was able to rest from thought about himself; save, indeed, in those moments, not too frequent, when he could not help reflecting: "That's a fine page—I have seldom written anything better;" or in those moments, too frequent when he sighed deeply, and thought: "I am not the man I was." About half-past one he would get up with the pages in his hand, and, seeking out his wife, would give them to her to read, remarking: "Here's the wretched stuff—no good at all;" and taking a position where he thought she could not see him, would do such things as did prevent his knowing what effect the pages made on her. If the effect was good he would often feel how wonderful she was; if it was not good he had at once a chilly sensation in the pit of his stomach, and ate very little lunch.

When in the afternoons he took his walks abroad he passed great quantities of things and people without noticing, because, he was thinking deeply on such questions as whether he were more of an observer, or more of an imaginative artist; whether he were properly appreciated in Germany; and particularly whether one were not in danger of thinking too much about oneself. But every now and then he would stop, and say to himself: "I really must see more of life, I really must take in more feel;" and he would passionately fix his eyes on a cloud, or a flower, or a man walking, and there would instantly come into his mind the thought: "I have written twenty books—ten more will make thirty—that cloud is grey;" or: "That fellow X—is jealous of me! This flower is blue;" or: "This man is walking very—very—. D—n 'The Morning Muff,' it always runs me down!" And he would have a sort of sore, beaten feeling, knowing that he had not observed those things as accurately as he would have wished to.

During these excursions, too, he would often reflect impersonally upon matters of the day, large questions of Art, Public Policy, and Human Soul; and would almost instantly find that he had always thought this or that; and at once see the necessity for putting his conclusion forward in his book or in the press phrasing it, of course, in a way that no one else could; and there would start up before him little bits of newspaper with these words on them: "No one, perhaps, save Mr.—, could have so ably set forth the case for Baluchistan." Or, "In the 'Daily Miracle, there is a noble letter from that eminent writer, Mr.—, pleading against the hyperspiritualism of our age."

Very often he would say to himself, as he walked with eyes fixed on things that he did not see: "This existence is not healthy. I really must get away and take a complete holiday, and not think at all about my work, I am getting too self-centred," and he would go home and say to his wife: "Let's go to Sicily, or Spain, or somewhere. Let's get away from all this, and just live," And when she answered, "How jolly" he would repeat, a little absently, "How jolly!" considering what would be the best arrangement for forwarding his letters. And if, as sometimes happened, they did go, he would spend almost a whole morning, living, and thinking how jolly it was to be away from everything; but towards the afternoon he would feel a sensation, as though he were a sofa that had been sat on too much, a sort of subsidence very deep within him. This would be followed in the evening by a disinclination to live; and that feeling would grow until on the third day he received his letters together with a green-colored wrapper enclosing some mentions of himself, and he would say: "Those fellows—no getting away from them!" and feel irresistibly impelled to sit down. Having done so he would take up his pen, not writing anything, indeed—because of the determination to, "live," as yet not quite extinct—but comparatively easy in his mind. On the following day he would say to his wife: "I believe I can work here." And she would answer, smiling, "That splendid"; and he would think, "She's wonderful!" and begin to write.

On other occasions, while walking the streets or about the countryside, he would suddenly be appalled at his own ignorance, and would say to himself; "I know simply nothing—I must read." And going home he would dictate to his wife the names of a number of books to be procured from library. When they arrived he would look at them a little gravely and think: "By Jove! Have I got to read those?" and the same evening he would take one up. He would not, however, get beyond the fourth page, if it were a novel, before he would say: "Muck! He can't write!" and would feel absolutely stimulated to take up his own pen and write something that was worth reading. Sometimes, on the other hand, he would put the novel down after the third page, exclaiming: "By Jove! He can write!" And there would rise within him such a sense of dejection at his own inferiority, that he would feel simply compelled to try and see whether he really was inferior.

But if the book were not a novel he sometimes finished the first chapter before one of two feelings came over him; either, that what he had just read was what he had himself long thought—that, of course, would be when the book was a good one; or that what he had just read was not true, or at all events debatable. In each of these events he found it impossible to go on reading, but would remark to his wife: "This fellow says what I've always said"; or: "This fellow says so and so, now I say——" and he would argue the matter with her, taking both sides of the question, as to save her all unnecessary speech.

There were times when he felt that he absolutely must hear music, and he would enter the concert hall with his wife in the pleasant certainty that he was going to lose himself. Towards the middle of the second number, especially if it happened to be music that he liked, he would begin to nod; and presently, on waking up, would get a feeling that he really was an artist. From that moment on he was conscious of certain noises being made somewhere in his neighbourhood causing a titillation of his nerves, favorable to deep and earnest thoughts about his work. On going out his wife would ask him: "Wasn't the Mozart lovely?" or, "How did you like the Strauss?" and he would answer: "Rather!" wondering a little which was which; or he would look at her out of the corner of his eye, and glance secretly at the programme to see whether he had really heard them.

He was extremely averse to being interviewed, or photographed, and all that sort of publicity, and only made exceptions in most cases, because his wife would say to him: "Oh! I think you ought," or because he could not bear to refuse anybody anything; together, perhaps, with a sort of latent dislike of waste, deep down in his soul. When he saw the results he never failed to ejaculate: "Never again! No, really—never again! The whole thing is wrong and stupid!" And he would order a few copies.

For he dreaded nothing so much as [the thought that he might become an egoist, and knowing the dangers of his profession, fought continually against it. Often he would complain to his wife: "I don't think of you enough." And she would smile, and say: "Don't you?" And he would feel better, having confessed his soul. Sometimes for an hour at a time he would make really heroic efforts not to answer her without having first grasped what she had said; and to check a tendency, that he sometimes feared was growing on him, to say "What?" whether he had heard or no. In truth, he was not (as he often said) constitutionally given to small talk, Conversation that did not promise a chance of dialectic victory was hardly to his liking; so that he felt bound in sincerity to eschew it, which sometimes caused him to sit silent for "quite a while," as the Americans have phrased it. But once committed to an argument he found it difficult to leave off, having a natural, if somewhat sacred, belief in his own convictions.

His attitude to his creations was, perhaps, peculiar. He either did not mention them, or touched on them, if absolutely obliged, with a light and somewhat disparaging tongue; this did not, indeed, come from any real distrust of them, but rather from a superstitious feeling that one must not tempt Providence in the solemn things of life. If other people touched on them in the same way he had, not unnaturally, a feeling of real pain, such as comes to a man when he sees an instance of cruelty or injustice. And though something always told him that it was neither wise nor dignified to notice outrages of this order, he would mutter to his wife: "Well, I suppose it is true—I can't write"; feeling, perhaps, that—if he could not with decency notice such injuries, she might. And, indeed, she did, using warmer words than even he felt justified, which was soothing.

After tea, it was his habit to sit down a second time, pen in hand; not infrequently he would spend those hours divided between the feeling that it was his duty to write something, and the feeling that it was his duty not to write anything if he had nothing to say; and he generally wrote a good deal; for deep down he was convinced that if he did not write he would gradually fade away till there would be nothing left for him to read and think about, and though he was often tempted to believe and even to tell his wife that fame was an unworthy thing, he always deferred that pleasure, afraid, perhaps, of too much happiness.

In regard to the society of his fellows he liked almost anybody, though a little impatient with those, especially authors, who took themselves too seriously; and there were just one or two that he really could not stand, they were so obviously full of jealousy, a passion of which he was naturally intolerant, and had, of course, no need to indulge in. And he would speak of them with extreme dryness—nothing more, disdaining to disparage. It was, perhaps, weakness in him that he found it difficult to accept adverse criticism as anything but an expression of that same yellow sickness; and yet there were moments when no words would adequately convey his low opinion of his own powers. At such times he would seek out his wife and confide to her his conviction that he was a poor thing, no good at all, without a thought in his head; and while she was replying: "Rubbish! You know there's nobody to hold a candle to you," or words to that effect, he would look at her tragically, and murmur: "Ah! you're prejudiced!" Only at such supreme moments of dejection, indeed, did he feel it a pity that he had married her, seeing how much more convincing her words would have been, if he had not.

He never read the papers till the evening, partly because he had not time, and partly because he so seldom found anything in them. This was not remarkable, for turned there leaves quickly, pausing, indeed, naturally, if there were any mention of his name; and if his wife asked him whether he had read this or that, he would answer, "No," surprised at the funny things that seemed to interest her.

Before going up to bed, he would sit and smoke. And sometimes fancies would come to him, and sometimes none. Once in a way he would look up at the stars, and think: "What a worm I am: This wonderful Infinity! I must get more of it—more of it into my work; more of the feeling that the whole is marvellous and great, and man a little clutch of breath and dust, an atom, a straw, a nothing!"

And a sort of exaltation would seize on him, so that he knew that if only he did get that into his work, as he wished to, as he felt at that moment that he could, he would be the greatest writer the world had ever seen, the greatest man, almost greater than he wished to be, almost too great to be mentioned in the press, greater than Infinity itself—for would he not be Infinity's creator? And suddenly he would check himself with the thought: "I must be careful—I must be careful. If I let my brain go at this time of night, I shan't write a decent word to-morrow!"

And he would drink some milk and go to bed.

—JOHN GALEWORTHY
in The Nation.

Byron in Rome.

The half-identification of the house—66, Piazza di Spagna—where Byron lodged in Rome during April, 1817, for barely three weeks recalls us to that unfading compelling personality. There he finished "Manfred" and dashed off those wonderful stanzas of "Childe Harold." This was the sole visit that he paid to the capital of the Caesars, and it was after it, at the Venetian carnival of the ensuing year, that he was to send Murray that thrilling and Roman sentence, "I will work the mine of my youth to the last veins of the ore, and then—Good night. I have lived and am content." A few years longer he lived, never content—ever the mad bull in the Dresden china shop of society; finally a hero intercepted by a fever—and a hero for the future of a nation that mainly appealed to him through their past. He deemed himself a fallen spirit. A spirit he certainly was, and the strange light (or lightning) of him still shoots and flashes.

What did he see in Rome? Very few letters survive, and an important one from his sister is missing. "Childe Harold" communicates his inmost thoughts, but from passera-by he concealed the depths. Rather with infinite curiosity and insouciance he surveyed the modern things in their majestic setting, and he surveyed them with ironic mirth as well as with his ironic melancholy. The British tourists who made him one of their gazing-stocks were his abomination. But he loved all queeresses, even the queeresses of coiffure.

I perceive [he tells Murray] you are publishing a Life of Raffael d'Urbino. It may perhaps interest you to hear that a set of German artists here allow their hair to grow and trim it into his fashion, thereby drinking the cummin of the disciples of the old philosopher [Latro the rhetorician, who recommended it for a "studious complexion"]. If they would cut their hair, convert it into brushes, and part like him, it would be more "German" to the matter,—"I'll tell you a story. The other day a man here—an English—mistaking the statues of Charlemagne and Constantine, which are Equestrian, for those of Peter and Paul, asked another which was Paul of these same horsemen?—to which the reply was, I thought, Sir, that "St. Paul had never got on horseback since his accident!" I'll tell you another; Henry Fox, writing to someone from Naples the other day, after an illness, adds—"and I am so changed that my oldest creditors would hardly know me."

These stories of their kind would be difficult to better; the last is worthy of Sheridan.

After "Childe Harold" perhaps the next except may fall somewhat flat. Byron, unlike Goethe, indulged in no Roman erotics, and he had left a lady-love behind him. But his realization of a "sixth sense" is extremely interesting.

I am delighted with Rome—as I would be with a bandbox, that is, it is a fine thing to see, finer than Greece. . . . As a whole, ancient and modern, it beats Greece, Constantinople, everything—at least that I have ever seen. But I can't describe, because my first impressions are always strong and confused, and my Memory selects and reduces them to order, like distance in the landscape and blends them better, although they may be less distinct. There can't be a sense or two more than we have, as mortals . . . for where there is much to be grasped we are always at a loss, and yet feel that we ought to have a higher and more extended comprehension.

And, again, in another letter: "Of Rome I say nothing; it is quite indescribable, and the Guide-book is as good as any other." Did Murray take the hint, has Baedeker taken it? At any rate, Childe Harold has become a cicerone. He met Lord Lansdowne, he had met the Jerseys and Lady Jersey (Disraeli's "Zonobia") was one of the very few who had been kind to him at the last. He rode most of the day—a picturesque figure. Always he rode, at Constantinople, on the Lido facing Venice; it is the exercise of poets. He called Rome the "elder sister" of Byzantium—the elder "and the finer." The "top of the Alban Mount" he pronounced superb. As for the Vatican, only one statue figures in his letters—that of the Appollo Belvidere. And why? Because it reminded him of a lady to whom once he had nearly proposed. Lady Adelaide Forbes—"I think I never saw such a likeness." So was it ever with Byron, all was living to him. That is why his appeal is European more than English-European, and beyond. His last words on Rome are a commentary. "I have seen the Pope alive and a Cardinal dead—both whom looked very well indeed."

If the numbering be unchanged, this lodging in the Piazza di Spagna is the house, and if so, it has a strange fitness, for it fronts the rooms where Keats died—where the "fiery particle" flickered and was quenched. And it points to whence by night

The soul of Adonais, like a star,
Beacons from the abode where the Eternal are.

Rome has indeed changed since then, yet is she not still unchangeable. Let us hear Byron once more. He is on the palantive:—
Cypress and ivy; weed and wallflower grown
Matted and massed together, hillocks heaped

On what were chambers, arch crushe'd, column strown
In fragments, choked up vaults, and frescos steep'd
In subterranean damp, where the owl peep'd,
Deeming it midnight:—Temples, baths, or halls?
Pronounce who can; for all that Learning reap'd
From her research hath been, that these are walls—
Behold the Imperial Mount! 'tis thus the mighty falls.
And soon follows that magnificent passage beginning
Admire—exult—despise—laugh, weep—for here
There is much matter for all feeling.

—a passage that has in it the ruins of the world and the cenotaph of the centuries—lines that ring, as if, so to say, they were a Napoleon in rhyme. That is the real Byron, the Byron in Rome. Lady Adelaide Forbes and the Appollo Belvidere retreat. The "edict of earth's rulers" resounds and the man who Byronized others, the centrally self-centred, appeals to "The Niobe of nations" and sobs forth,

Oh Rome, my country! city of the soul,
The orphans of the heart must turn to thee.

—The Times.

Does Conquest Pay?

An old world chronicle would have had some words of resigned and puzzled fatalism at the end of the chapter in which it recorded the sequel of the Russo-Japanese War. By the mysterious workings of an inscrutable Providence, the power which won in that terrific conflict is to-day humbled, distracted, and nearly bankrupt; the power which lowered its proud flag and admitted defeat, seems, from a distant view, more prosperous than before, less deeply riven by the cleavage of revolution, and better able to arm and to consolidate its military forces. Nor, with all our modern grasping at scientific sociology, is it easy for the contemporary chronicler to avoid imitating the medieval monk. A touch of piety would make the confession that we do not understand what is happening, so much more graceful and reposeful. The really odd fact about the contrast between Russia and Japan, is that we do not clearly see where, in fundamentals, their situation differs. Both peoples are, by European standards, dimly poor. In Japan, income-tax is paid on incomes over £30, and it is only a small minority of families which pays. In Russia the average yearly income is said to be only between £5 and £6 per head of the population. Famine is now raging in the poorer Northern districts of Japan, but it is chronic in some parts of Russia, and the fact that harvests have latterly been abundant does not mean that the peasantry is really on the road to prosperity. In both Empires the burden of taxation is crushing, and in both it is the supposed necessity for great armaments which explains them. In neither is representative government a reality, and though Japan probably has the advantage here, both are swayed by a sacrosanct autocracy, and both are driven to repress the modern phase of revolt by the persecution of a struggling Socialist movement. Each attempts to foster the transition from an agricultural to an industrial form of civilization by high protection, and in each the new factories show a ruthless exploitation of the wage-earners which could not be paralleled in Western Europe. Over the finances of them both, cool critics shake their heads, and predict the inevitable catastrophe. Corruption in the public services is a plague in both.

But where so much is the same, everything none the less is different. Russia can afford to startle Germany by re-arming her artillery, building Dreadnoughts and strategic railways, and now, for climax, by a proposal to increase her "peace" army by 400,000 men. Japan is shaken by a popular revolt against reckless expenditure complicated by shameless corruption, and a Ministry, dominated by the Satsuma clan, which lives by controlling the fleet, must acquiesce in a reduction of its naval estimates by the relatively vast figure of £7,900,000. Defeat has brought a seeming prosperity; conquest has led to ruin, and this paradoxical result has come about where both Powers followed a similar policy in not very dissimilar conditions. It is a pretty puzzle for social science.

To the modern school of pacifists one-half of this pair of facts will not seem surprising. We have before us a collection of Mr. Norman Angell's essays and addresses ("The Foundations of International Policy," Heinemann), which restates his familiar position, not perhaps with all the freshness and force of his earlier writing, but with unshaken conviction and the same formidable combination of logic with faith. Is there here, in the plight of Japan, a striking confirmation of his central doctrine that conquest does not pay, and that the accumulation of force is not so much a crime as an irrelevance in modern States? Here, indeed, it would seem that conquest, so far from enriching the victorious nation, has actually impoverished it, so that it finds itself unable to maintain the forces which its rulers think necessary to secure its acquisitions. The main conclusion is evidently sound in this instance when the facts are broadly viewed, but we doubt whether this particular illustration goes far on a close view to prove the detailed thesis. Mr. Angell's argument is addressed to peoples of a more advanced civilization than either Russia or Japan. It is true to say of us, or of the Germans, that if we were to embark on a European war, though we annexed territory, we should not acquire land. Neither the fields nor the factories of the conquered territory would change hands. A profitable conquest on Norman lines is to-day for us impossible. Our ruling class does not think of land as the typical form of wealth. But that is hardly true as yet of Russia and Japan, which are still partially in an agrarian phase of development. When they expand, they do take land. Even in Northern Persia, which has not yet been annexed, thousands of Russian settlers have followed the army of occupation, and have acquired Persian lands at a nominal price. In Korea the Japanese certainly began to carry out a scheme of military colonization at the expense of the Korean farmers, which called forth indignant protests from some English observers on the spot. How far it has gone we do not know. In the Balkans there has been an ominous movement of great masses of the population. Albanians have fled before the Serbs, Bulgarians have quitted Greek territory, some Greeks have fled from the new Bulgaria, and Turks have everywhere abandoned farms and villages. It will be found when the process is complete and a balance struck, that the victorious races have added to their landed wealth, and a Balkan Domesday Book will record that the fortunes of countless Serbian and Greek families have been advanced by conquest. Force at this level of civilization is rather a brutality than an irrelevance. The Norman epoch is not yet quite ended. Even in the British Empire there are Matabele and Zulus and Massai who have seen something of it.

On the higher level of civilization with which Mr. Norman Angell chiefly deals, the order of facts which his thesis fails to cover is subtler and more elusive. We have no difficulty in accepting his main premises. A modern people does not "own" its colonies and dependencies, and therefore cannot as a nation be enriched by conquest. The spoils of Empire do not go to the masses at home, who are unaffected by the process of expansion, save in so far as they bear the burden of taxation and see the resources of social reform squandered upon armaments. The Norman of to-day is not a military adventurer, but the financier and the investor who is concerned in the various dependencies, protectorates, and spheres of influence or penetration which a modern Empire attaches to itself. The export of capital has come to be, from the standpoint of the moneyed class, immensely more important as a direct source of profit and income than the export of goods. Trade does not follow the flag, but the flow of capital on the whole does so. It is a quasi-political process, and it long ago harnessed diplomacy to itself. Nations are not in business as a joint-stock concern, as Mr. Angell puts it; but that is a misleading assumption, unless we recognize also that capitalists do act in national groups abroad, and do receive from diplomacy, not merely protection, but active support in their schemes of expansion. The cruder cases, where this pressure leads to a territorial change, are, of course, easily recognized. Everyone knows that the real motive of the Franco-German struggle over Morocco was the rivalry of French and German capitalists to exploit its virgin mines and to supply it with public works. We all take it as a matter of course that railway building in India or irrigation works in Egypt should be in the hands of British contractors. What is not so readily grasped by the General public is that in countries like Turkey and China the competition among financiers for concessions invariably involves their governments. Everyone knows that the Bagdad Railway, financed and controlled by private German citizens, is a semi-official enterprise. But rather less directly, rather less overtly British diplomacy stands behind British railway ventures in China. The fact is avowed where we claim a sphere of monopoly, and one gathers from a telegram a few weeks ago in the Times that our pretension to a "place in the sun" in the Yangtze Valley is about to be enforced against rival Powers. The diplomacy which stands behind the exporter of capital is far from relying exclusively on its conversational charm. The shadow of a British ambassador, when he visits the Porte or the Tsung-li-Yamen, is apt to shape itself into the semblance of a Dradnought. Armaments stand behind this competition for economic opportunity, and play their part alike in over-awing dying empires and in impressing rival competitors. The struggle for a balance of power has its motive and its impetus largely in this singular modern relationship between the State and finances.

It is the omission of this puzzling and repugnant set of facts which explains a certain want of co-ordination between Mr. Angell's thesis and our modern problem of armaments. Force is not yet an irrelevance, though the ends which it serves are not European ends, or even national ends. Nations struggle no longer over their hearths and homes, their national liberties and their national faiths. They can be induced to struggle for the right to dig iron ore in the Alps and to dump it in the form of steel rails at Bagdad. Pacifists are sometimes apt to assume that the armament firms alone have an interest in armaments, and that all the rest of the world is their dupe. It is rather the whole world of finance, restlessly seeking outlets in regions which have yet absorbed but little capital, which has this interest. Its power depends in every modern State on the failure of democracy to organize its control over diplomacy. The direct attack on armaments is probably destined to be thwarted until this pervasive and subtle influence has been studied and undermined.—The Nation.

The Balance of the Balkans.

The various States in the Balkan Peninsula have now adjusted their respective frontiers, and, after a suitable period of introspective examination, have made reports as to their size and population. The most recently published official figures give the following results:—

	Square Kms.	Inhabitants.
ALBANIA	32,000	...
BULGARIA—
Old territory	96,345	...
Territory lost	7,525	...
Territory gained	26,257	...
Present area	112,077	...
GREECE—
Old territory	64,657	...
New territory	56,611	...
Present area	121,268	...
MONTENEGRO—
Old territory	9,080	...
New territory	5,876	...
Present area	14,956	...
ROUMANIA—
Old territory	131,353	...
New territory	7,525	...
Present territory	138,878	...
TURKEY IN EUROPE—
Former area according to Treaty of London.	9,168	...
Territory regained by Treaty of Constantinople	16,201	...
Present area	25,369	...
SERBIA—
Old territory	48,303	...
New territory	39,047	...
Present area	87,350	...

The arable area in the acquisitions of the various States is said to be as follows:—

	Acres.
Bulgaria	...
Greece	...
Montenegro	...
Roumania	...
Servia	...
Turkey	...

Thus the total arable area of Bulgaria at present, including her acquisition of territory, is actually less than it was before the wars by some 760,000 acres!

These figures of population may tend to fluctuate—apart from the normal increase to be expected from the surplus of births over deaths—on account of emigration. There is a certain flow of Bulgars out of Servian and Hellenic Macedonia into Old Bulgaria and the Provinces of the Littoral. Moslems are leaving Macedonia for Asia Minor, as many as 8,000 having passed through Salonika in one week, and Greeks are moving from Ottoman Thrace into Old and New Greece. Albanians and some Bulgars are passing out of New Servia into Albania. Epirotes are leaving Albania in order to move into New Greece. A certain number of Salonika Jews have left for South America, and others are likely to follow. The Balkan races are in process of sorting themselves, and within a few years the astonishing ethnological and ecclesiastical diversities of Macedonia will have been very largely obliterated in favour of the nationality, and its State Church under the political denomination of which any given area may find itself.

Bulgaria's share of the cost of the Balkan Wars has been reckoned up by Professor Tsankoff, of the University of Sofia. The heavy bill which she will have to foot is analysed as follows:—The credits voted amounted to £12,400,000. The requisitions are estimated at £6,000,000. The deficit in the revenue due to the hostilities was £2,000,000. On munitions and transport service £6,000,000 has been, or will have to be, expended. Strategic railways and other miscellaneous items account for £7,200,000. For the pensions promised to soldiers incapacitated by their wounds a capital sum of £16,000,000 will be required. That makes a grand total of close upon £50,000,000; while the value of the territory which Bulgaria had to cede to Roumania is estimated by M. Tsankoff at another £60,000,000. The number of lives lost was somewhere between 55,000 and 58,000—between 6 and 7 per cent. of the adult male population of the country.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor
of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1918, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (15s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

The Week.

Ulster.

One thousand Nationalist Volunteers were drilled last night at Carrick-on-Shannon. Two hundred of them carried rifles. The Police were not present. It is stated that large quantities of rifles and ammunition for the Nationalists have been landed on the west coast of Ireland.

The Limerick County Council have unanimously adopted a resolution supporting the Nationalist Volunteer movement. Speaking in support of the motion, Mr. Landon M. P. said that when Home Rule was on the Statute book, two hundred thousand Volunteers would parade in Dublin in order to prevent the withdrawal of a measure which had been dearly won.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling, speaking at an anti-Home Rule demonstration at Tnaubridge Wells yesterday, warmly denounced the "crooked work" of the Cabinet which, he said, had corruptly bought the Nationalist vote. The price thereof was Home Rule which broke the faith of generations and sold a province of Britain to its enemies. The British electors had been muzzled, but the Army to its eternal glory had saved the Empire.

Speaking in Queen's Hall, Sir Edward Carson declared that so far as he knew no offer or counter-offer of any kind regarding Ulster and Home Rule had been made except a hypocritical sham of offer made in the House of Commons.

Speaking at Ipswich, Mr. Marston said that Government had been advised that it would be impossible to obtain a conviction of Sir Edward Carson as his offence was a hypothetical one.

Mr. Herbert Holman, insurance broker, the prospective Liberal candidate for Mid-Devon in a speech at Abbotswickwell disclosed the fact that the Government had seized two ships concerned in the Ulster gun-running. The charterer of one, said the speaker, was an Earl who would probably have to pay value to the owner.

The Nationalists claim to have discovered a great Unionist plan to bring Londonderry and other districts under Ulster's Provisional Government in the immediate future. Consequently the Nationalist Volunteers have offered to assist the police and military in resisting such an attempt and have asked Nationalist Members of the House of Commons to assist Mr. Asquith that thousands of drilled Volunteers will assist the forces of the Crown.

Turkey.

The Turkish Parliament has re-assembled after twenty-one months' recess.

In a speech opening Parliament the Sultan referred to the mortification caused throughout the country at the military disasters of the war the responsibility for which a high military tribunal would determine.

He regretted the Powers' decision to transfer to Greece the islands so necessary to the development of Anatolia and pointed to the continuance of the Government's efforts to obtain recognition of his sovereignty over the islands. The Sultan urged upon the country the necessity of making good the losses of the military resulting from the war and of creating a strong navy. He appealed to the spirit of self-sacrifice of the nation and emphasised the necessity of drafting a budget having that end in view.

Hakil Bey has been elected President of the Chamber. In a speech he enjoined the Deputies not to forget that they had brothers to save and territories to retrieve beyond their frontiers.

South African Indians.

The All India Moslem League has made representations at the Foreign and Colonial Offices that the recommendations of the South African Commission regarding the recognition of marriages if carried out would seriously encroach the rights of Mussalmans and be a disastrous interference with the laws relating to their religion guaranteed by the proclamation of 1858. The Union Government, says the League, whilst entitled to declare monogamy the prevailing rule in South Africa, has no right to declare that the issue of a valid marriage in India confers no rights in and be excluded from entering the country of the father's domicile. It suggests that the recommendations shall be carefully examined by competent Indian lawyers so that no unnecessary hardship shall result from their practical application.

The Oriental Languages School.

London, May 17.

The Oriental Studies Committee, of the India Office, the London Chamber of Commerce and Sir Montagu Turner's Committee have issued a joint appeal on behalf of the Oriental Languages School, pointing out that in addition to the grants of £4,000 and £1,250 per annum, promised by Government and the India Office respectively, and £2,000 per annum expected from the London County Council a further sum of at least £6,700 a year is required. They ask for an endowment fund of not less than £100,000. The Committee mention that plans for buildings have been approved and that contracts will be settled directly the building strike, which to-day was entering on its seventeenth week, has been settled.

Albania.

London, May 16.

The Albanian Premier, M. Turkhan, is visiting Rome and is being received with great honour. He starts to-day for Vienna to confer with Count Berchtold, the Austro-Hungarian Minister for foreign affairs regarding the difficulties of the new State.

London, May 18.

The Albanian Government has made extensive concessions to the Epirotes regarding the formation of their own gendarmerie, language, education and the appointment of Christian governors with locally elected administrative council—all under the guarantees of the Powers.

London, May 19.

Grave complications have arisen in Durazzo. Some two thousand Mussalmans and insurgent peasants have reached Sika near Durazzo to demand exemption from military service and use of Albanian tongue in schools. They accuse Essad Pasha of breaking his promises. Meanwhile an Italian squadron has arrived hastily at Durazzo. Essad Pasha and his wife have been arrested, it is not certain by whom, and taken aboard Austrian warship. Marquis Di San Giuliano, Italian Foreign Minister, is preparing to proceed to Durazzo. The whole situation for the moment is most obscure.

Buda Pest, May 19.

Count Berchtold to-day informed the delegations that during the last few days the antagonism between the followers of Essad Pasha and his opponents had become more acute and had led to the formation of bands around Durazzo and the consequent anxiety their. Commanders of Austrian and Italian guardships there had agreed to land seamen for the protection of the Princely Court. Essad Pasha was now on board an Austrian guardship.

Vienna, May 20.

Prior to the capture of Essad Pasha the Dutch gendarmes bombarded his house. The "Neue Freie Presse" states that at the request of the Prince, Austro-Hungarian and Italian warships landed detachments which attacked Essad Pasha's house with machine guns. Essad Pasha asked for safe conduct on board the Italian ship, but this was refused.

Rome, May 20.

Signor Giolitti, ex-Premier, has left here for Durazzo.

The situation in Albania is clearing somewhat. The Prince suspecting that Essad Pasha who was largely increasing his body-guard and following generally, was playing a double game sent gendarmes under officers with quickfiring to arrest him.

Essad Pasha was eventually handed over to the Austrian and Italian naval commanders who meanwhile, at the instance of the Prince, landed a considerable force which is now guarding the palace. Essad Pasha is supposed to have encouraged the march of armed peasants upon Durazzo, but this is not certain.

The Albanian Cabinet has resigned.

Essad Pasha has been transferred to the Italian steamer and deported to Italy. He has promised not to return to Albania without the Prince's permission.

Replying to a question in the delegation Count Berchtold recounted the recent incidents at Durazzo. He added that so far he was unable to judge of their significance, but such incidents were to be expected in a newly organised Balkan State and there was no reason to draw far-reaching and unfavourable conclusions from the events in Durazzo.

Our London Letter.

London, May 1.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

The political situation, if anything, has undergone a change for the better during the last few days. In fact the improvement became very marked on Wednesday during the concluding stage of the House of Commons debate on the Unionists, "censure" motion. The tone of the speeches of Sir Edward Carson, Mr. Balfour and Mr. Bonar Law was surprisingly conciliatory. Mr. Balfour contributed a new and valuable definition of Ulster—"the North-East Counties of Ireland;" Mr. Bonar Law offered to "stand aside" if there were a renewal of conversations—it sounded like abdication—and Sir Edward Carson expressed "hope and prayer" that a Parliament for the rest of Ireland would be "such success that it would be to the interests of Ulster to come in under it."

Mr. Asquith having castigated his critics on the personal issue involved, expressed sympathy with the spirit of Sir Edward Carson's speech, and declared that the door would be kept open till the last moment for a settlement by consent.

The "censure" motion was defeated by a majority of 80. The general impression in political circles, as a result of Wednesday's developments, is that there will be a prompt renewal of "conversations." In such a case, it is understood that Mr. Redmond will take part in them.

As to the position of the Cabinet towards peace, the statements made in the Daily News that Mr. Churchill's suggestion was thrown out on his own responsibility, and that the Government's original offer to Ulster still stood, have now been borne out by the Prime Minister's pronouncements. More was read into Mr. Churchill's words, not only by his political opponents, but by a good many of the Government's supporters, and especially the Irish Nationalists, than the words strictly warranted. The Government, as the Prime Minister has repeated, have closed no door on peace.

Though sharp censure had marked both Mr. Churchill's and Mr. Asquith's speeches, yet everybody in the House, during the recent debate, felt that the most important part of what they said was the new "offer" which the First Lord made and upon which Mr. Asquith commented. Again, though the Opposition were pledged by their motion to demonstrate that the Government are guilty of plotting a massacre and attempting to conceal it by falsehood, nevertheless nobody, not even the speakers themselves, attached any importance to this self-imposed and vain task. Sir Edward Carson, who may be counted in this connection as the most important man on the Opposition side, ignored it completely; and, though Mr. Balfour and Mr. Bonar Law were more faithful, it was only to their comments upon Mr. Churchill's "offer" that anybody lent a listening ear.

It is a strange paradox that, when the conflict should be at its hottest and the words at their bitterest, both Front Benches should suddenly discover a change of temperature and a transformation and take to talking of peace. The plain man, who has no special information and is limited for the forming of a judgement to what is common property, must be content not to understand all the inwardness of this sudden change. He must be content with that and hope that this swift transition from conflict to conciliation, from threats of war to hopes of agreement, turns upon something solid. The phrase in Mr. Churchill's speech, which is the ostensible explanation of the movement towards optimism, is so vague that one may be pardoned the surprise that so much should have been read into it, and that it should have produced such considerable consequences. Mr. Churchill said that the political situation would be transformed if Sir Edward Carson would say:

"Give me the amendments to this Home Rule Bill which I ask to safeguard the dignity and the interests of Protestant Ulster, and I, in turn, will use all my influence and goodwill to make Ireland an integral unit in the federal system."

Read quite strictly this phrase contains no offer and no undertaking at all on the part of the Government. That, however, is not the interpretation which Sir Edward Carson and his friends, without any repudiation from the Government, put upon it.

Sir Edward Carson sees in it an offer to drop the time limit until Ulster decides of her own free will to enter as an integral part of Ireland under some future federal system of Government for the United Kingdom. Mr. Balfour's own comment is that nothing except the absolute and unconditional exclusion of Ulster will meet the case. Between the spirit of his presentation and the spirit of Sir Edward Carson's there is the difference between the spirit of one who denies Irish nationality and the spirit of one who feels himself an Irishman. That, as the official Liberal organ says, is important, but after all the important thing is: Do their practical suggestions really differ? Is there much difference between exclusion unconditionally and exclusion until (a) a Federal system is established, and (b) Ulster feels inclined to join the rest of Ireland as an integral unit in such a federal system? A federal system will come ultimately, but it has little pertinence to the present situation; and division which lasts for an indefinite term may very easily become permanent. If it be said, "but we should have Sir Edward Carson co-operating to bring about federalism, and to induce Ulster to join the rest of Ireland," the answer is obvious. If Sir Edward Carson were now, instead of widening and deepening the differences between Ulster and the rest of Ireland, to apply the same zeal, devotion and energy to bringing the two together, there would be no need to wait for a problematical federation and to sever North from South in order ultimately to unite them. This present Home Rule Bill as it stands and here and now would do all that was needed. For these reasons it is wiser not to rush into an optimism which may prove quite futile and to welcome Mr. Asquith's closing words. In reply to a suggestion by Mr. Bonar Law of the renewal of "conversations," he insisted that it is no use trying to settle this question behind the backs of the people of Ulster and without the consent of the members for the rest of Ireland. There must be the assent and the honest assent of those who are mainly interested. These are wise words. Admittedly there is as yet no public opinion about federation, and by general consent Ulster is hardly less averse than the rest of Ireland to exclusion. The danger to which Ireland is exposed, as the Daily News truly says, is that, to get party leaders out of an embarrassing predicament, a "settlement" may be thrust upon Ireland, which the Irish do not want. Mr. Asquith's words are to be taken as a guarantee against that disaster.

[We regret that in our last week's London Letter the name of Dr. Baqer Shah was wrongly printed as Baqee Shah, for which we offer our apologies.]

GUN-RUNNING IN ULSTER.

The tone of Unionist comments on the latest Ulster episode—the smuggling of arms into Belfast—would be appropriate to some schoolboy exploit. It is wholly inappropriate to one of the gravest events since the beginning of the present Home Rule conflict. What happened in Belfast Lough during Friday night of last week cannot fail to make the Government reconsider the policy it has hitherto pursued towards the Ulster movement, and it is as well to indicate precisely why. It is not because, the Daily News seriously argues, so many thousand rifles and so many thousands of cartridges have been added to the armament of the Ulster Volunteers. So far as the Ulster Volunteers are a military problem, they were not serious before Friday week, and they are very little more serious to-day. It is the circumstances under which the rifles were smuggled which make the event so grave.

Putting together the official and the unofficial accounts, it is evident that in two or three parts of Ulster the Volunteers, apparently led by two members of Parliament, blocked the roads and forbade the use of them to the King's subjects engaged in lawful business; seized the telephones and the telegraphs, which are the King's property; occupied the railway station; assaulted and imprisoned the coastguards, who are the King's servants; and caused the death of one coastguard. We must wait for further details before we decide the exact degree of criminality involved in this last act, which, of course, can as little be removed from the jurisdiction of the courts as it can be blotted from the minds of men by the verdict of a jury composed of the friends of the criminals and pronounced with indecent haste.

For the present, however, it is enough to recall that when an officer died of heart disease while running away from riotous Denashawa peasants, it was thought just to hang four Egyptian villagers, in an exceptionally brutal manner, and that when at Manchester a policeman was accidentally killed during an attempted rescue of prisoners it was thought just to hang three Irish Fenians. When men engage in lawless conduct, from which there flow consequences, which are natural even though not desired, the law of this country holds those men responsible both for the conduct and the consequences.

It is not a jest to make military occupation of the King's cities. It is not a jest to seize the King's highways. It is not a jest to assault and imprison the King's servants. It is not a jest to cause the death of one of the King's servants under circumstances which may possibly amount to manslaughter or murder. These are positive crimes, the seriousness of which it would be as difficult to exaggerate as it would be foolish to disregard. The organisation of the Volunteer movement in Ulster from the beginning involved very grave criminal acts. But hitherto all these crimes had these characteristics—they have been technical offences preparatory to active rebellion, but they have not involved in themselves the annihilation of the King's authority, attack upon the King's property, interference with the King's servants, or the death of the King's servants. In the crimes committed last Friday night each and every one of these offences was included. They were no more technical breaches of law; they were rebellion with all the circumstances of rebellion, not excluding death.

There need be no surprise that Mr. Asquith was summoned back to town to consider these momentous happenings. For more than two years the Government has suffered the Ulster movement to continue without intervention, although it was manifestly and avowedly a conspiracy against the authority of Parliament and the Crown. That policy of tolerance has very naturally from time to time excited criticism from those who doubted its wisdom. But it could be persisted in by the Government so long as the plea could be urged that active rebellion was still a thing of the future, and there had been no definite attacks on property, life and authority. Now that plea falls to the ground. On Friday night for many hours and over a large stretch of country a force of armed rebels swept away the authority of the Crown, terrorised the King's loyal subjects, seized the King's property, imprisoned the King's servants, and caused the death of one of the King's servants. Crimes such as these could be disregarded only at the price of surrendering all authority in Ulster, and admitting that there Parliament and the Crown are phantoms of which every lawless rogue may make mock. Of course, everybody recognises the insolent vanity, after such events, of the talk about a "plot" against the law-abiding men of Ulster, with which the Opposition have taken two days of Parliament's time. What every man who has any sense of the sanctity of law wants is an assurance that every person will be punished who took part in Friday's rebellion, and that the Government is determined to vindicate the authority of the Crown and of Parliament in Ulster as in the rest of the King's dominions.

Mr. Asquith announced last Monday in the House of Commons that the Government would deal without delay with "the grave and unprecedented outrage in Ulster." Subsequently he paid a visit to the King and returned to a prolonged meeting of the Cabinet, which had been summoned to deal with the situation. The nature of the measures to be taken can at present only be assumed, but it is certain that they will be commensurate with the seriousness of the occasion. The time has come in Mr. Churchill's phrase to put these grave matters to the proof. At all costs the authority of the law must be established, and it will be the duty of the Government to punish without delay those who have insulted the authority of the King, and to prosecute the ringleaders of the outrage, to send into Ulster such armed force as will be adequate to deal with the rebel movement, to seize all weapons and to forbid the armed drilling of those who are now openly at war with society. If the Government are wanting in courage now, then Government has ceased to exist, and the reign of anarchy is established. The right to arm against the State will not be limited to Ulster. It will be asserted by every body of men who think they have a grievance and who choose to repudiate the authority of Parliament by violent means. The issue at stake is nothing less than the existence of this country as a civilised society.

The events of last Friday have made it clear that the Government, if they were to blame at all last month, were to blame, not for excessive measures, but for insufficient measures of precaution. Had the naval arrangements which Mr. Churchill contemplated been carried out, there would have been no gun-running raid on Friday night. As for the attempt of the Times to represent that outrage as a sequel to the "plot," there is indisputable evidence to the contrary in the fact that the "Fanny" left Hamburg before the Curragh episode took place. It is clear that the attempt to spread sedition in the Army was going on concurrently with the scheme for supplying the rebels in Ulster with arms.

The whole scope of the conspiracy, in short, is now revealed and it is for the Government to deal with it with all the resources at their command. It is probable that Mr. Bonar Law still relies upon the Army proving disloyal. He will find himself mistaken; in any case the Government will not flinch from putting this to the proof. And if they have to deal with disloyalty in the Army as well as with treason in Parliament they will have abundant strength in the country for their need. Liberty is too old a growth in this land to be lightly uprooted, and the party that attempts to substitute the veto of the Army for the veto of the House of Lords is a party which is doomed for a generation. The Government have at no period had better reason to take a cheerful view of their position than they have to-day, or to regard the prospects of the Home Rule Bill with more confidence.

MR. CHURCHILL'S REFERENCE TO THE INDIAN ARMY.

Mr. Churchill has done well to draw attention to the extraordinary dictum that has been so emphatically laid down by Mr. Bonar Law as to when an officer or even a private soldier should or should not obey the orders of his superiors. The Unionist Leader has made it perfectly clear that he would leave the question entirely to the conscientious discretion of the Army, and that he for one would not blame them for refusing to obey orders, when that involves the shooting of their fellow-citizens and fellow-countrymen even if the latter are prepared to go to the length of offering violent opposition to the administration of any particular measure, which has been sanctioned by the King and Parliament, and of breaking the peace of these realms. Supposing a situation may arise in India, which heaven forbid, that may necessitate the shooting of the Indian people or those who may have become revolutionary and dangerous to the stability of law and order, and the Indian officers or Indian soldiers for obvious conscientious reasons decline to obey the orders of their superiors to shoot their fellow-countrymen and fellow-citizens, the results of such an episode would be disastrous for the maintenance of British rule in India, but, all the same, such officers would have the hearty support of Mr. Bonar Law, who might possibly, at the very moment of such a calamity happening in the Eastern Dependency of the Crown, be himself the Prime Minister of England! How could he then or anybody else differentiate between the situation in Ulster and that in India, as far as military discipline is concerned, is beyond understanding. It is indeed a great pity that leading statesmen in this country, on both sides it must be frankly admitted, are occasionally overcome with such heated and bitter party feelings that they become liable to overlook the significant fact that the British Empire consists of other countries and dominions beyond the shores of the United Kingdom as well. But this particularly sorrowful exhibition of lack of statesmanship on the part of the Unionist Leader cannot but be specially distressing and painful to all those who, irrespective of party, have the true interests of the Empire at heart.

MR. SARFARAZ HUSAIN IN LONDON.

Mr. Sarfaraz Husain, who has come over to England to assist Mr. Khwaja Kamaluddin in his missionary work in this country, was amongst the worshippers at last Friday's Namaz at Lindsay Hall, held under the auspices of the Islamic Society. Some of your readers are no doubt aware that Mr. Sarfaraz Husain has already visited the Far East and the United States, entirely at his own personal expense, with the sole object of spreading Islam in those parts of the world. He has now come over to London to work "at the feet of my chief, Khwaja Kamaluddin"—as he put it himself—and his assistance will undoubtedly be of immense value to the Khwaja Sahib. The latter, in welcoming Mr. Sarfaraz Husain, briefly expressed his keen appreciation of and sincere admiration for Mr. Husain's true Moslem spirit and the devotion and energy with which he has been for the past several years advocating the sacred cause of Islam in foreign lands. Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, who is an old college-fellow of Mr. Husain in their Aligarh days, also cordially endorsed the sentiments that had been so eloquently expressed by Khwaja Kamaluddin towards that gentleman and wished him every success in his noble work in this country.

The fact that Mr. Sarfaraz Husain has personally declared at Lindsay Hall his intention of assisting and helping the Khwaja Sahib in his religious work in England is very significant and very strongly emphasises my remarks in your columns a few weeks ago that Khwaja Kamaluddin has been advocating the great cause of Islam in this country on absolutely non-sectarian lines. Those who have been merely accusing him of sectarian instincts are either perfectly ignorant of the position or else are doing so with ulterior motives. Nothing could be further from the truth, and Mr. Sarfaraz Husain's generous acknowledgment of the Khwaja Sahib's "chiefship" must for once and for all dispose of any doubts or fears in that direction. Khwaja Kamaluddin's work in England deserves the unanimous support of all true Moslems, irrespective of sect.

TEN YEARS OF THE ENTENTE CORDIALE.

The Press of this country has been lately full of the benefits that have been obtained by England and France as a direct result of the Entente between the two countries, the tenth anniversary of which has been just celebrated on both sides of the Channel with extraordinary enthusiasm. The King's recent State visit to Paris has been recognised in certain quarters as a fitting culmination of the decade of Anglo-French "understanding", which has just ended, and the brilliant success that has happily marked the royal sojourn in the French capital has obviously and naturally produced an excellent impression on His Majesty's loyal subjects in these islands. I am sure the Indian Moslem subjects of His Majesty are equally impressed with the successful issue of their sovereign's visit to France and share in common with their other fellow subjects no little satisfaction and delight at the growth and development of the entente cordiale with the great neighbouring Republic.

They cannot, however, be reasonably expected to read through the pages of the past ten years' Anglo-French history with anything like unmingled pleasure. They cannot, and will not lose sight of the fact that the entente cordiale, that came into existence between Great Britain and France ten years ago, was the evil precursor of the "grouping of the Powers" in Europe, which has been instrumental in shattering the independence and integrity of so many Moslem States in Asia, Europe and Africa. Egypt, Morocco, Persia, Tripoli and Turkey have each in turn suffered. In days gone by, Great Britain's "splendid isolation" was indeed a guarantee for the safety and well-being of smaller countries abroad. Disinterestedly and fearlessly, she could then champion the cause of the oppressed States. She was not in those days involved in any European agreements or "understandings," and could thus adopt independent action in the cause of humanity, nationality and freedom. Under those conditions, as is a matter of history, she could assert herself effectively. How different the position is to-day! Sir Edward Grey's association with the Foreign Office has produced nothing but annihilation and disaster for the Moslem States abroad, some of which had for years been bound by traditional ties of the closest friendship with this country. The abominable partition of Persia at the very birth of her freedom, the wicked expropriation of European Turkey, the outrageous and unprovoked raid on Tripoli and the conquest of Morocco can all be traced directly or indirectly to the entente cordiale. Great Britain, now intimately concerned in European politics, has been forced to sacrifice her former freedom of action. As a member of the Triple Entente, she is unable to move in any way without "sounding" and indeed securing the consent of the other two Powers in the Entente Group. The Triple Entente policy as a whole is being shaped in relation to that of the Triple Alliance. In short, Great Britain is not to-day enjoying that unique position in the Concert of Europe which was her unquestionable right in the past. Moreover, even in the Group of Powers with which she is associated, she is in reality playing a secondary or even a tertiary part. We have seen how humiliating and degrading a part she has taken in the Persian question, in which the despotic Government of the Tsar has openly and deliberately ignored her and has throughout had it all its own way, without even a feeble protest from Whitehall, in spite of solemn pledges and sacred promises. The German invasion scare has practically reduced British foreign diplomacy to the state of impotency. The whole country is so deeply overcome with the fright of a German invasion that it is prepared to sacrifice all her best traditions, her past glory and good name in the interests of brutal Russia and mercenary France. The obvious result is that to-day Great Britain is not a partner in the Triple Entente, but is in reality a slave to the whims and fancies of her two "friends" in the Entente Group of Powers.

In consequence, Russia and France are eating Persia and Morocco respectively, as they feel convinced that their other colleague in the Entente would not dare to interfere with their ghastly plunders of these two ancient Moslem States, or that if she would in any way attempt to stop their ravages in those innocent and powerless countries, the mere threat of dissolution of the Entente, with the German bogey always staring her in the face, would be more than sufficient to silence her. The Triple Alliance is similarly convinced of the inability of Great Britain to interfere or even protest against any action it may feel disposed to take. The Italian raid on Tripoli could never have occurred without such conviction as to the unavoidable and necessary attitude of England. Bosnia and Herzegovina likewise could never have been lost to Turkey, had Austria not been fully alive to the helplessness of the British position. The Triple Alliance knows that no Great Power could to-day declare war on the Continent without causing a European War, which in itself is a sufficient restriction of, or, indeed, a formidable reason against any such procedure. The awful consequences of the grouping of Powers in Europe have thus proved most fatal and destructive to the several Moslem States, which unfortunately may happen to be situated near any great European Power.

The Anglo-French entente cordiale, as I have said before, is mainly responsible for the gradual and successive loss of so many Moslem countries and it will remain in Moslem history as a landmark, not of progress, prosperity or freedom, but of ruination, disaster and damnation.

THE CORONATION OF THE SHAH.

The Persia Committee met at the House of Commons yesterday under the chairmanship of Lord Lamington. It was unanimously resolved that the Government should be asked, in view of the approaching coronation of the Shah, to urge upon the Russian Government the withdrawal from Northern Persia of the Russian expeditionary force.

THE AUTOCRAT OF CHINA: ABOLITION OF CABINET AND SENATE.

According to the Peking correspondent of the Times, the Convention appointed to amend the provisional constitution has completed its task, and it is expected that the document will be promulgated shortly. Extensive powers are conferred on the President Yuan Shih-Kai, but that is hardly worth considering, since he has wielded dictatorial authority since the dissolution of Parliament. The amended constitution is of little importance, since it can be torn up or re-amended ad infinitum merely at the convenience of the Government. The essential feature of the political situation in China remains entirely unchanged—namely, that Yuan Shih-Kai is dictator.

The amendments, however, provide some formal changes not without interest. The Cabinet and Premier disappear and also, apparently, the Senate. Departmental Ministers hereafter will be responsible directly to the President, who will be served by a Secretary of State instead of by a Premier. An Advisory Council will be formed upon which the President will depend for sanction in dealing with Parliament. Some sort of an elective assembly is provided for, but as the constitution will be arranged by a body nominated by the Government its powers are not likely to be extensive nor would its character be seriously representative of the people. The Advisory Council will, of course, be nominated as also the Convention which will draw up the permanent constitution.

Whether Yuan Shih Kai is wise in practically excluding Young China from any voice in the affairs of State remains to be seen. The Constitution as amended bears not the slightest resemblance to the charter casually prepared at Nanking two years ago and will certainly embitter the feelings of the whole revolutionary party against the President and may before long lead to a further rebellion. Yuan Shih-Kai can justify his arbitrary assumption of power only by the successful use of that power in the future.

TETE À TETE

SOMETIME ago we published certain startling facts and figures about the decline in the circulation of the Comrade since we migrated to Delhi, and it induced some of our readers to work as canvassers for us in order to make up the number we had on our books when we left Calcutta and even go beyond it. The result is that in two months and a half nearly 200 fresh subscribers have been enlisted, and even comparing it with the conditions existing two years ago it is not quite unsatisfactory. But what will our supporters say to the fact that the net result of their efforts and ours is a decline of exactly 200? The Comrade is not now a newspaper that owes the enlistment of fresh subscribers to curiosity. It is not yet three and a half years old, but even its infancy has been more crowded with incidents than the youth and old age of many of its contemporaries, and it is safe to say that hardly one of the 200 fresh subscribers now enlisted has made its intimate acquaintance only after enlistment. Why then the paradox of the enlistment of fresh supporters combined with a withdrawal of support by twice as many as have enlisted? Well, we regret once more to have to deplore publicly the ethics of those who continue to receive the paper but ignore its claims for a modest subscription. They either like the paper or they don't. If they don't like it, a postcard, frankly telling us that they don't like it, would be a business-like arrangement, and with our recent experience even this would be a great relief to us. But if they do like the paper what excuse have they for being defaulters when the time comes to pay their quarterly or annual subscription? What comfort can the earnest efforts of our supporters bring to us when their biggest haul in a day is eight or ten new subscribers and the same day the names of some fifty defaulters have to be removed by us?

With the experience which we have related our readers can well imagine our feelings when we get a communication so flattering as this from a far-off but ardent supporter. He writes:—

Another Picture.

"Most of us find it pretty hard to get the Comrade once a week only and then to wait anxiously for full seven days for the next issue. You may have your own reasons for not making it a daily paper, but we see none, perhaps because everyone can't be expected to have the same patience and forbearance as Mr. Mohamed Ali has. As a compromise, I beg to suggest the following alternative courses, which I sincerely hope you will not have any objection to put before you readers, and inviting their opinions on the suggestion. If the majority is overwhelmingly on my side, perhaps you may also bend, though you have got an indomitable will of your own. The alternative courses are:—1. A daily 2-or 4-page supplement may be issued giving us the latest news, for which most of us, very reluctantly have to subscribe to other papers. 2. The Comrade may be made bi-weekly. (a) A Saturday Edition dealing mainly with Indian and other topics of Mohamedan interest. (b) A Wednesday Edition dealing solely with the affairs of other Mohamedan countries besides India. It is unnecessary for me to say that with the new awakening we have begun to take interest in places and things which we never thought of in the 'Dark Ages,' and once begun, it is improper, nay, sinful, to check our curiosity to see what our co-religionists are doing elsewhere. In both cases, the subscription should be raised to double its present amount and some who has the slightest love for Islam will, I am sure, grudge it." Look on that picture and on this! It reminds us of the poet's plight—

نور عرش بر می اور سرمی پای سانی بی

غرض کچه زور دهن من اس کمڑی میخوار ریختن من

(The imagination has soared to the Seat of the Almighty, while the head is lying at the feet of the wine-giver. Verily the wine-bibbers are in a strange and powerful stupor just now).

Our of his affection and generosity our kind correspondent talks of bending our "indomitable will". Perhaps The Hunger-Strike. it is already bending, though not in the direction in which he would like to bend it.

"Patience and forbearance" to which he refers equally generously have also their limits and evidently he little knows how near their limits ours have reached. The community represented in politics by the Moslem League would denounce its office-bearers the moment it found them submitting to the dictation of the rich instead of voicing the opinions of the masses; but we shall be surprised if even a small fraction of the community has realized the fact that even to this day the All-India Moslem League cannot defray half its annual expense out of its income from the contribution of its "democratic" members and has to depend on the annual "subsidy" from the much abused "aristocracy". Do our readers desire the Comrade to publish their righteousness at the expense of those whom they are only too eager to denounce? Well, it does not matter much what they desire, but it is just as well that they learnt to understand that defaulters cannot be dictators. We have received generous assistance from the "aristocrat" as well as the "democrat", but always on the strict condition that with us there is no buying and selling of opinions, and it is bare justice to say that the "aristocrat" has tried much less to dictate our policy to us than the "democrat". Now, however, the latter has got used to a paper voicing his opinions without having to incur the cost of this political necessity, and just as the constancy of an Indian wife gives birth to a security in the husband which soon degenerates into indifference, our fidelity to the popular cause has bred in our people an inertia not unlike indifference. Even the most callous husband would be a very different man if the poor wife who had fallen from the days of caresses on the days of kicks showed signs of loving her neighbour as herself and her neighbour's husband as her own. The indifferent husband need not, however, undervalue the faithful wife, for even if in his eyes she has shed the attractions of an earlier day, other eyes may yet discover in her more than a slight remnant of charm. But the Indian wife prefers the kicks of her own husband to the caresses of another, and reluctant as we may be to confess it, we must say the analogy certainly extends as far as this. Nevertheless, hunger-strike, as Mr. G. K. Chesterton has truly said, is the old weapon of the discontented dame, and our readers perhaps do not know that we are about to commence a hunger-strike ourselves. Only ours may not be voluntary! These are facts. What our ardent supporter suggests about a daily or a bi-weekly with double the present subscription is a fancy. And the more ugly the facts the more they insist on ousting out pleasant fancies. We hear of a big journalistic enterprise about to be launched in the Punjab and wish it all success. But our own fate is not the best of omens for others.

public to comprehend fully the duties, the privileges and the limitations of journalism. It is true that the first duty of a newspaper is to publish news, and the consequences of a wide publication are so great that a journalist has to take far more care than an ordinary citizen to satisfy himself about the correctness of the news he publishes. But everything need not be published even if its correctness is beyond dispute. Every citizen must do that which is for the public benefit and must refrain from doing that which is against public interest. One of greatest moralists of the East, a man to whom Indian Mussalmans owe at least three-fourths of their moral maxims and a good deal of their observance went even so far as to prefer the "expedient lie" to "inexpedient truth." Of course Sa'di's expediency was only altruistic and not the low egotism of intriguers. This much will be admitted on all hands that even the most patriotic Ministers of modern States have on occasions declined to supply certain information to their Parliaments on the ground of its being against public interest. They recognise that their Parliaments are not their slaves but their masters, and that they cannot honestly be used as the instruments of their masterful wills when they are themselves the creatures of their Parliaments. Nevertheless, they withhold important information from their Parliaments believing that "the safety of the State is the highest law." This lesson must be carefully taught to our infant democracy and both newspapers and newspaper readers must learn it. We have been tempted to explain what must be only too obvious to many of our readers because we are occasionally asked why we had not published a certain news before a certain time, and why we had not published another news at all. To all these questions we have only one answer: public interest is with us the only consideration. This is our answer to those of our friends also who ask us why we have been silent so long about sectarian differences among some Mussalmans concerning Aligarh affairs. It is our belief that the Trustees of Aligarh, both Shi'ahs and Sunnis, conscientiously desire to do full justice to the claims of all Moslem sects; but that they are as determined as their great master Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, and his friends and collaborators, Khalifa Syed Mohamed Hasan and Khalifa Syed Mohamed Hosain to give no asylum in the nursery of Moslem manhood at Aligarh to the sectarian spirit that is now doomed throughout the world of Islam. The Trustees appointed a strong and fully representative Sub-Committee of their own some time ago to deal with complaints made in certain quarters, and we can regard it as nothing short of a misfortune that the Committee did not meet before a most deplorable incident, which was sure to provide fuel for the sectarian flame, happened at Aligarh. Thanks to the good sense and determination of all concerned, and of none more than Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami, Maulana Abbas Hosain, Professor of Arabic, Persian and Shi'ah Theology, and the Shi'ah students of the College themselves, that most regrettable controversy is now closed. But complaints of a more permanent character have still to be dealt with and we have every hope that the deliberations of the Trustees' Committee which meets on the 26th instant will result in recommendations to the Trustees which would prove acceptable to them and to all sections of Mussalmans. When the Trustees, who ought to know, and do know, the nature of the problem better than those who are in no way connected with the management of the College, and do not so well appreciate its character and aim, are alive to the situation, we think the Moslem public should reserve comment till the Trustees have formulated their own solution of the problem. There will then be time enough to criticise and the criticism is then likely to be both informed and useful. We hope these views will commend themselves to all sections of Mussalmans and that their good sense will be fully equal to the delicate nature of the work which the Trustees have in hand.

Our readers must be familiar with the name of Mr. Syed Hasan Abid Jafry. He is an Old Boy of Aligarh and did great credit to himself and to the training he had received at his Alma Mater when he and some of his friends then in England organised the first Indian Red Crescent Medical Mission for Turkey during the Balkan War. This was done, so far as we know, entirely at their own cost, and of this Mr. Hasan Abid Jafry had, we understand, borne at least a very great share. Even a more notable feature of this Mission was that it was composed entirely of Shi'ah gentlemen. To our mind the significance of this noble effort was so great that when we heard of it from Dr. Ansari we felt that Islam had not lost a hundred battles in the Balkans but had won the greatest victory of many centuries! Imagine, then, our great grief when we read in the Zamindar of the 12th instant that Mr. Hasan Abid Jafry had presided at a meeting of a society called "The Anjuman-i-Imania," of Shahgunj, Agra, which passed certain resolutions concerning sectarian differences about Aligarh to which we have alluded which were decidedly of an unfortunate character. We are, however, happy to learn that it cost Mr. Hasan Abid Jafry no less grief to read the report of the meeting which the Zamindar published over the signature of a "Syed Riza Ahmad Rizawi" who calls himself the Secretary of the Anjuman. We are thankful to Mr. Syed Alay Nabi, himself a resident of Shahgunj, Agra, for forwarding to us a letter of Mr. Hasan Abid Jafry contradicting some very important allegations and suggestions contained in Mr. Syed Riza Ahmad Rizawi's report of the meeting and explaining the true character and position of those who attended it. We publish it in our correspondence columns and are sure that it will be read with the great interest and appreciated by all those who desire to see the fast growing solidarity of Indian Mussalmans fully maintained.

An Important Contradiction.

Even the Statesman will not we think doubt the fact that we do not wish to come in the way of the building of New Delhi. But we certainly wish to come in the way of those who wish to disturb her old saints in their resting places. The

"The City of Tombs" and New Delhi.

Hon. the Chief Commissioner appeared to not be very sympathetic when the question of mausoleums, graves and graveyards situated inside and outside the present Delhi was being hotly discussed here last year, and we have no reason to believe that anything has occurred since then to make him any the less sympathetic. We, therefore, wish to draw his attention to the rumour current in Behar that the authorities here contemplate to demolish the grave of Sheikh Nuruddin Malik Baz Farran one of the ancestors of Haji Shah Badruddin Sahab of Phulwari Sharif, who is held in great esteem in Behar. The tomb is said to be situated on the left side of the road that runs from the Dargah of Nizam-ud-din Aulia to Shahjahanpur. The tombstone bears an inscription stating that the saint died on the 18th of the second Jamadi in the year 680 of the Hijra, that he was a great saint endowed with extraordinary powers and that the "Sultan of the Shaikhs" (Nizam-ud-din Aulia) himself used to visit his mausoleum to pay his respects and in his lifetime had also inquired about him. Evidently the Shaikh was a man of great piety and saintliness, and this is confirmed by a reference to his life as well as the reproduction of this inscription in the Akhbar-ul-Akhar fi Asrar-ul-Abrar of the great Traditionist of Delhi, Shah Abdul Haq, whose mosque had been demolished by a mistake and, thanks to the sympathetic attitude of the Hon. the Chief Commissioner, has, we understand, now been restored. We trust he will be pleased to order that this grave be left untouched. Its demolition will certainly cause great grief and pain to Mussalmans generally, and to the Mussalmans of Behar particularly who visit the Khankah in Phulwari Sharif in large numbers and hold Shah Badruddin Sahab who presides over it and his saintly ancestor in great veneration.

It is too late in the day to explain the doctrine of trusting the "man on the spot". It is the favourite theme of our bureaucrats and their advocates and partisans. It is insisted upon in season and out of season, and we may take it that nobody can possibly forget it for a moment. But when Lord Minto persisted with the reforms and accepted the resignation of Sir Bamfylde Fuller the "man on the spot" was evidently not "on the spot". Similarly, when Lord Hardinge at last recognised the gravity of the situation arising out of the Cawnpore Mosque affair and took a line of policy not favoured by the bureaucracy, His Excellency immediately ceased to be the "man on the spot." His Excellency Lord Carmichael has charge of far the most difficult Province in India, and we admire the combination of firmness and patience with which he is dealing with its affairs, though we cannot say we approve of everything that is being done in the name of his Government. His Excellency has before him the example of the leader of his old party, Mr. Asquith, who has had every justification for a policy of blood and thunder in Ulster except that of a statesman's sagacity. But while joining the Tories, his new friends, as we have no doubt he does, in condemning "the Plot" with a capital P, Sir John Rees thinks it equally necessary to condemn the policy of Lord Carmichael with regard to repressing political crime in Bengal. Does it ever occur to this gentleman to compare his own conduct with that of, say, Sir Henry Cotton which he has always condemned? We always understood that he deprecated the critical attitude of Sir Henry when he sat on the same side of the House some years ago, and he desired no interference whatsoever in the affairs of Indian administration by Members of Parliament. He was, forsooth, afraid of "losing India on the floor of the House of Commons". But once more he has become a turn-coat and desires the House of Commons to interfere in the administration of Bengal. Well, he did so recently and got his reward. The Under Secretary of State for India rebuked him soundly and characterised his suggestion of remissness on the part of the Government of Bengal as both "unfounded and mischievous." Poor Sir John! He still thinks he rules the roost in India instead of being open to insult from a caddy if he pays the bare legal fare, as Mr. Harold Begbie wrote of the Anglo-Indian official in England after his retirement. But Sir John Rees must be told that happily or unhappily he is no longer the "man on the spot" but is very much off it.

After the judgment of the Hon. Sir Lawrence Jenkins in our Pamphlet Case in which he had said that the provisions of section 4 are very comprehensive and its language as wide as human ingenuity could make it, and that "it is very difficult to see to what lengths the operation of this section "might not be plausibly extended by an ingenious mind", one expected anything to happen. But the ingenuity of the police in Bengal surpasses even the inventive genius of the Punjab authorities. For some reason or other the Bengal police has compelled the publisher of the Habl-ul-Matin of Calcutta to figure in the published proceedings of Calcutta Courts every now and then. The latest occasion was the 19th instant when he was called upon by the Chief Presidency Magistrate to show cause why his declaration as publisher should not be cancelled. Now the law requiring the publisher of a newspaper to make a declaration is contained in the "Press and Registration of Books Act, 1867" and not in the "Press Act of 1910." It runs thus:—"The printer and the publisher of every such periodical work shall appear before the Magistrate within whose local jurisdiction such work shall be published and shall make and subscribe in duplicate the following declaration: 'I, A. B., declare that I am the printer [or publisher, or printer and publisher] of the periodical work entitled—and printed [or published, or printed and published, as the case may be] at—and "the last blank in this form of declaration shall be filled up with a true and precise account of the premises where the printing or publication is conducted." Other rules under the section require a similar fresh declaration to be made as often as the place of printing or publication is changed or the printer or publisher leaves British India and another resident within British India is substituted. This is all that a printer or publisher has to comply with before he prints or publishes a newspaper. The next section lays down the law about the powers and the duties of the Magistrate before whom the declaration is made. It says: "Each of the two originals of every declaration so made and subscribed as is aforesaid shall be authenticated by the signature and 'official seal of the Magistrate before whom the said declaration shall have been made.' The authentication of the declaration by his signature and official seal, then, is the only duty or power of the Magistrate so far as it concerns the person who makes a declaration. Into his qualifications for the responsibilities of a printer or publisher he is neither required nor empowered by law to enter. Nevertheless, the Calcutta Police evidently takes serious objection to a misfortune of the publisher of the Habl-ul-Matin which he himself has accepted without a murmur. A telegram from Calcutta published in the papers tells us that "Mr. McClure 'Special Branch, Criminal Intelligence Department, raised an 'objection to the Maulvi being the publisher because he was 'totally blind.' Naturally the counsel for the publisher asked what legal bar there was to a blind man becoming a publisher, and the Chief Presidency Magistrate asked the Court Inspector under what section he could cancel the declaration. That gentleman had to confess that there was no statutory power vested in the Magistrate to cancel the declaration of a publisher when he lost his sight; but the telegram also tells us that he emphasised the point of Maulvi Jalaluddin's blindness and said that he could not be a publisher because, being totally blind, he "could be easily duped." And let it not be forgotten that even when compelled to confess that the Magistrate had no statutory power to cancel the poor afflicted publisher's declaration, he did not despair but sought asylum in the policeman's haven of refuge—the Press Act! Section 8 of Act I of 1910 enabled him to cancel a previous order! And here is section 8 of Act I of 1910. "Every publisher of a newspaper 'who is required to make a declaration under section 5 of the Press 'and Registration of Books Act, 1867, shall at the time of making 'the same deposit with the Magistrate before whom the declaration 'is made security to such an amount, not being less than five 'hundred or more than two thousand rupees, as the Magistrate 'may in each case think fit to require, in money or the equivalent 'thereof in securities of the Government of India . . . provided ' . . . that the Magistrate may, if he thinks fit for special 'reasons to be recorded by him, dispense with the deposit of any 'security and may from time to time cancel or vary any order under 'this sub-section.' The italics are ours and indicate the only portion of the section which could by any stretch of imagination have any reference to the case in question. But it is obvious that this portion of the section authorises the Magistrate to cancel or vary an order of his own dispensing with the deposit of an security or fixing the amount of the security to be deposited within the limits prescribed by this section. Such a use of his power was, indeed, made by the Magistrate last year when the original order requiring a deposit of Rs. 500 as security was varied and the maximum security of Rs. 2,000 was demanded. The publisher must have heaved a sigh of relief at this order, for after that the only order that the Magistrate could have passed would have either dispensed with the deposit of security or reduced its amount. But the poor man has had no such luck and the very section is now being referred to when the Calcutta C. I. D. want to deprive him of his means of livelihood because God has deprived him of his sight. If asamahi, why not sultani? First the "Act of God," and then the "Restraint of Princes"! But may we not ask the Calcutta Police why it is more anxious than the poor blind publisher himself that he should not be duped? It retains the maximum security of Rs. 2,000, and after the first "offence" can confiscate it and demand another of Rs. 10,000, after which—the fate of the Zamindar! Is it not then the blind man's own look-out to protect himself from those who would dupe him? Since when has the Calcutta Police added to its other virtues the virtue of unadulterated altruism? In any case, is it only the blind that "could easily be duped"? After recent trials and retrials surely the Calcutta Police should know better!

THE directors of the Habl-ul-Matin, the Persian Weekly of Calcutta, have launched a new venture in the shape of an English weekly edition of their paper. The "Habl-ul-Matin." An Urdu daily edition was started some time ago, but it has now ceased to exist. We welcome the appearance of the English Weekly as a useful addition to the ranks of Moslem newspapers in this country. In size and general get-up it somewhat resembles the Comrade and its annual subscription is also Rs. 12. The content of the first two numbers range over a variety of topics, most of which deal with current affairs in the Moslem world. The editorials are well-written and show a clear grasp of the Moslem situation in India and abroad, and of the needs and duties of Mussalmans. A special feature of the paper is its "Foreign Letters" from its own correspondents in some of the Islamic countries. A news service of this kind is bound to prove interesting and useful if it is regular and well-sustained and if the news-agents of the paper are men having the necessary knowledge of public affairs and a due sense of responsibility. We trust the Mecca Letter in its issue of 2nd May is not to be the model of its foreign correspondence. It makes vague hints at the revolutionary tendencies of the Arabs and speaks of the Sharif of Mecca as a medium of communication between the Porte and some Arabs Sheikhs for "political exigencies." But no light is thrown on the Arab movement for "freedom" and nothing is said as to what those "political exigencies" are and why and how they have arisen. The Tabriz Letter is a much better sample. We wish our new contemporary a long and useful career. The need for growth in the number of Moslem journals in this country on sound and independent lines is very great indeed, and it is always a matter of real satisfaction when an earnest effort comes to be made to supply the need.

THE Times Tangier correspondent writes that "the bombardment of Tetuan by mountain tribesmen with the gun 'A "Captured" Gun.' "which they captured from the Spanish war-ship 'General Concha,' when she was wrecked 'off the Riff coast last year, continues. Several shells have 'fallen inside the town and a Spanish soldier has been killed. 'Panie is reported to exist among the Mahomedan population. 'It is unlikely that much material damage will be done, but the 'fact that the tribesmen have been able to bring a gun into 'range of a town occupied by over 40,000 Spanish troops and defended by artillery has done incalculable damage to Spanish prestige, and has raised enthusiasm among the mountaineers." The gun has now been firing for some days, and the efforts of the Spanish artillery to silence it have so far proved unavailing. There is no amelioration in the general situation around Tetuan, fighting being of daily occurrence. Spanish troops, both regular and native, are suffering from numerous desertions, and native soldiers recently assassinated a lieutenant and two non-commissioned officers before deserting. This single captured gun at least indicates that the Moors are more than a match for the aggressors if they are well-equipped. The theory about superior morale and a physical stamina of the "civilised" soldier cannot, however be exploded by the havoc wrought by a single gun!

FRENCH doings in Morocco have fallen into comparative obscurity on account of the much bigger events elsewhere, which have engaged for some time past the attention of the world. Things are, however, happening in that ill fated land—awful, tragic things that have already wrought misery and desolation on an enormous scale and are tearing up the social peace and homes and institutions of a free and inoffensive people by the roots. The process of "penetration" is actively going on, though it is not exactly "peaceful." A "barbarous" race is being reclaimed to "civilisation" by fire and blood. The unspeakable meanness and hypocrisy of the thing becomes all the more soul-gripping when one sees a fine and manly race being exterminated by the hundreds by machine-guns—in the name of "civilisation!" The blessings of French occupation are already pouring into the land in the shape of French wines. A host of prospectors and company-promoters are following in the wake of the army of conquest. The unequal struggle cannot last much longer. The resistance of the Moors will be finally crushed by the huge and scientific engines of destruction with which civilisation has equipped the aggressors. The fate of Algiers awaits Morocco, the fate of a people reduced to impotence and despair, corrupted by French vices and exploited by French banks, existing only as a milch-cow for the money-grabbers of Paris. It is a terrible fate. And yet it carries the diplomatic sanction of all Europe. The Moors that are fighting for their homes and liberties are "rebels," their leaders are "pretenders," their devotion and patriotism for their own ancient land is dark fanaticism. Their death struggle and their agony—will they have no place in history? Are the thousands that are flinging themselves into the jaws of death in defence of their freedom and faith—are these supreme acts of devotion as though they have never been? It may be so. But history has hitherto taught us that wrong is righted in the end and sufferings sow the seeds of a glorious regeneration for those that suffer.

A RUMOUR seems to have gained currency in some quarters that Shams-ul-Ulama Maulana Shibli has been secretly trying to move the Department of Public Instruction in the United Provinces with a view to stop the Government grant-in-aid to the Dar-ul-Ulum of the Nadwa. Maulana Shibli Sahib sends to us for publication the following letter, which he has received from the Director of Public Instruction, United Provinces, and which, we trust, will set all such rumours at rest:—"Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 22nd April 1914, I have the honour to say that you have never at any time 'made the suggestion to me that the Government grant-in-aid 'to the Nadwat-ul-Ulama towards the maintenance of the Dar-ul-Ulum should be withdrawn."

The Comrade.

The Moslem University and Democracy.

A DAILY growing body of Moslem opinion had been criticising the two great faults of the system of the management of the Aligarh College, the life tenure of its Trustees and their selection by co-option. After four years of sustained attack, a little breach was made in the walls of this system in 1907 when by the allotment of three seats to the Old Boys' Association an outside constituency was allowed to elect the Trustees and that not for life but for a period of three years. In 1909 the number was raised to five and the tenure extended to five years. At first the proportion of these Trustees elected for a time to the Trustees co-opted for life was 3 to 70, but subsequently became 5 to 120, though it may be stated that the maximum number of co-opted life Trustees was to be reached by annual additions only, and has not yet been reached. The work done by the representatives of the Old Boys may not have been immeasurably superior to that of co-opted life Trustees, but evidently it has pleased the latter, and with a single exception, they have themselves co-opted every Trustee elected by the Old Boys' Association before his term of office expired, and the solitary exception who was no less deserving of the honour than the others missed the seat through sheer bad luck by a vote or two.

The attack on the system of life tenure and co-option which had been commenced in Al-Bashir in 1903 and carried on in the Observer in 1904 was resumed in 1909 in the Times of India and would have been pushed on were it not for the fact that the energies of those who initiated the operations were absorbed by the proposal of the Moslem University which they revived on the accession of King George in May, 1910. With the unprecedented and even unexpected success of this revived movement which gave hope of an early establishment of the University, naturally the attack on the system of life tenure and co-option was directed against the desire of those who wished to perpetuate it in the Constitution of the University also. As the Aligarh College was to be absorbed in the University it would have been a work of supererogation to mend the Rules and Regulations of the Aligarh College.

But so well had the ground been prepared in the years between 1903 and 1911 that very early in the course of the discussion the Moslem University Constitution Committee resolved that there should be no life tenure and no co-option in future. The majority went so far as to demand that even the present life Trustees should cease to be Trustees of the Moslem University Court. After a determined and prolonged opposition Sahabzadah Aftab Ahmad Khan and those who share his views agreed upon the compromise that although all elections for the future should be for five years, the present life Trustees should vacate their seats in rotation after the first five years of office as members of the University Court, so that at the end of ten years there should not remain a single life Trustee.

This was a great victory for the reformers, and, in justice to the Trustees themselves, it must be admitted that it was achieved with the assistance of many life Trustees of Aligarh. As a matter of fact it could not well have been otherwise for nearly half the seats on the Constitution Committee were filled by the life Trustees.

According to the expectations of 1911 the Moslem University should now have been in full working order; but fate and the advisers of the Secretary of State willed it otherwise, and we are still ploughing the sands. Naturally, therefore, the question of the reform of the Aligarh College Constitution once more assumes great importance and urgency and we shall soon deal with the subject in all its bearings. But we may as well state here that although co-option in recent years has given us much better results than in the past, it cannot claim for those co-opted an indisputably representative character, and that although the Trustees are far more alive to their responsibilities to-day than they used to be in the régime of the late Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk, when a quorum of seven out of seventy was not always available even for the Annual Meeting of the Trustees, so long as life tenure lasts indulgence and indifference are bound to characterise a number of life Trustees, and stagnation instead of progress in the affairs of Aligarh is certain to be the consequence. The awakened interest in the affairs of the Nadwa makes us hope that Mussalmans would also devote some attention to the defects of the Aligarh Constitution. If we receive an intimation that there is a fair demand for it, we may publish it as a supplement of the Comrade so that our readers may be able to study it and thereafter discuss it with knowledge.

When the Moslem University Foundation Committee met at Aligarh more than a year after the so-called final decisions of the Secretary of State, and it was clear that the establishment of the Moslem University would take time, it resolved upon the only course that wisdom dictated. While standing firm on the subject of affiliation and other questions on which the Secretary of State had differed from the views of the Moslem community, and resolving to appoint a deputation that could lay before the Government of India the views of the community and, after making every effort to secure the objects it had in view, lay the final reply of the Government to its representations before the Foundation Committee for its final decision, the Committee decided to take immediate steps with a view to bring the Moslem University to a completion and, in the interim, to apply the interest on the Capital Fund of the University to the improvement of the Aligarh College in order to raise it to the status of the University.

It must be remembered that although affiliation was an underlying principle of the proposed University, and funds were collected on the repeated promise of affiliation, not one pie of these funds was collected for assisting any institution outside Aligarh. The initial plan of the University consisted of a University College with a thousand students residing in six or seven hostels of about 150 students each, and the minimum endowment required for the annual recurring expenditure was calculated on a basis of Rs. 500 for each of these thousand undergraduates, besides Rs. 35,000 a year for the University School, and a few lakhs of non-recurring expenditure on unproductive buildings.

The requisite Capital Fund having been collected, two things were needed for the establishment of the University, a Charter and the necessary arrangements for housing and teaching the thousand undergraduates. The grant of the Charter did not rest with the Mussalmans but with the Secretary of State and his advisers; but the erection of hostels and lecture-rooms, libraries and laboratories, the admission of a thousand undergraduates and the appointment of the necessary number of Professors, Tutors and Wardens of hostels rested with the Mussalmans. Had the Charter been granted as early as we expected, the community would have taken up the above task soon after and the University would have been in full swing two or three years later. But when the grant of the Charter was delayed, there was no reason why the other requisites of the University should be similarly delayed. The order should have been inverted and the buildings should have been erected and the undergraduates and the teachers got together according to the plans already made.

This was exactly what the Foundation Committee decided last July, and had weakness, disunion and procrastination not come in the way, this decision would have been arrived at in September or October of 1912. But even if arrived at last July there is little to justify the delay of nearly a year in carrying it out. It is true that the Cawnpore tragedy, following the Aligarh meeting as it did within a week, kept the Mussalmans both anxious and busy for no less than three months, and its aftermath, the deputation to H. E. the Viceroy, at last came off only two months ago. But overworked and overstrained as the Hon. the Raja Sahab of Mahmudabad has been during these crises, we appeal to him to make the necessary arrangements for the University deputation and bring this important business also to an equally satisfactory conclusion. We have heard rumours that the authorities may not perhaps be willing to receive a deputation which is not composed of plenipotentiaries; but we find it difficult to credit this as a firm resolve of the Government of India. His Excellency the Viceroy and his Government will not surely deny the right of a community's representatives to lay its views on so important a subject before them and to ascertain the latest views of Government in order to recommend a final decision to the community. Even Lord Crewe has travelled a great distance since he refused to receive two delegates of the Moslem community. To leave matters in their present posture is, it must be admitted on all hands, the least satisfactory method of solving a difficult and an important problem.

With a view to make the Mussalmans accomplish in the interval before the grant of the Charter their part of the work the Moslem Association was decided upon. But when the question of its composition arose, the reactionaries favoured the claims of the Trustees of Aligarh, while the progressives fought hard for a constitution such as that of the future Court of the Moslem University. Finally a compromise was made whereby the Board of Trustees was made a constituency itself for the election of 40 out of a total of 200 members of the Moslem University Association.

The Draft Constitution of the Moslem University had already provided for the election of 40 members of the Court by the Central Standing Committee of the All-India Mohamadan Educational Conference, and of another group of 40 by the Aligarh College Old Boys' Association from among its own members. It had also given the right of election of 20 persons from among themselves to a constituency to be created hereafter, namely "the Indian Moslem Graduates of any University who shall have their names enrolled on the register of the University in accordance with the Bye-Laws." The Foundation Committee accepted this constituency and gave it the right of electing 20 members, while laying it down, in the absence of any Bye-Laws approved by the Constitution Committee, that Manshi Fazils and Maulvi Fazils should be counted as Graduates, and that at least 5 years' standing, and the payment of Rs. 10 as enrollment fee and Rs. 5 per annum thereafter were necessary for voting and eligibility for election.

Besides this constituency with an educational qualification, two other constituencies with a monetary qualification had been approved by the Constitution Committee and now accepted by the Foundation Committee. These were the Moslem Landowners and the Moslem Taxpayers. According to the Draft Constitution the Landowners and the Jagirdars were required to contribute one pie in the rupee on the land revenue payable by them to the Government, provided that they did not contribute less than Rs. 25 a year, and the Taxpayers were required to contribute half per cent on their incomes, with the same minimum contribution. The minimum was rather large and needed modification, but the desire to set to work at once induced the Foundation Committee to modify these provisions considerably, and it was decided that all Landowners and all Taxpayers could become qualified as voters and as persons eligible for election if they paid, like the Graduates, an enrollment fee of Rs. 10 and an annual fee of Rs. 5 to keep their names on their respective registers. Each of these constituencies was given ten seats on the Association.

The Committee of the Islamia College of Lahore had been allotted five seats on the University Court in the Draft Constitution, and the same number was allotted to it in the Association. In the Draft Constitution the Court itself was to co-opt 15 Ulama and 60 other members. The Foundation Committee allotted only 10 seats to the Ulama, and of the remaining 65, gave 10 to the Aligarh Trustees, 10 to the Moslem Press and 15 to Provincial Committees of the University Fund.

Opinion may differ as to details, but it could not be gainsaid that the constitution of the Moslem University Association for the first time provided an opportunity for the Moslem public to declare effectively who should manage the affairs of a public institution. The democrats had won a great victory and the more ardent and less experienced among them felt that now at last a new heaven and a new earth were going to be created through their efforts. But what is the result? The sky overhead is as blue and the earth beneath our feet as drab as ever. Only the constituencies already in corporate existence, like the Trustees, the Old Boys and the Central Standing Committee of the Conference, have elected their representatives, but the new constituencies, such as the Moslem Graduates, Landowners, Taxpayers and Press, which have had no less than 50 seats allotted between them, have hardly stirred. The Honorary Secretary of the Association, who is the Secretary of the Aligarh Trustees, has been appealing to them from time to time in the columns of the Aligarh Institute Gazette but we shall be much surprised if he has been able to enroll even half a dozen names in each of the various registers. This is indeed a deplorable result, and if we could accept it as a fair test of Moslem Indian democracy, we would be induced to renounce our democratic faith as a belief in principles that are impracticable.

We have, however, to remember that democracies are notoriously ignorant of their own rights and need a lot of educating in that direction. When we see the extraordinarily large polls at parliamentary elections in England we are apt to forget that in spite of well-established local Party organisations of long standing, many weeks, if not months, of arduous canvassing and thousands of pounds in advertising have gone to the making of such huge polls. The Institute Gazette unfortunately is not very widely read, and what is needed is that a few groups of energetic and capable individuals, each keenly interested in his particular constituency, should be induced to organise it by writing in papers with wide circulations and as much as possible by private correspondence. Within a few weeks we hope that fairly large constituencies would be organised, and we can leave it to those who seek election at least to double the numbers on the various registers within the last fortnight before the election. For instance, could not the Hon. Mr. Syed Riza Ali, Dr. Mahmud and Dr. Naziruddin Hasan take up the Graduates' Association and induce five hundred Moslem graduates to pay Rs. 15 each in order to secure the right to elect 20 members of the University Association? Similarly, could not the Hon. Raja Abu Jafar, the Hon. Capt. Malik Umar Hayat Khan Tiwana and the Hon. Shaikh Shahid Hussain induce two or three hundred Landowners and Jagirdars, and the Hon. Mr. Abdur Rahi, Mr. Alay Nabi, Mr. Fazle Hussain, and Mr. Ahsan ul-Haq induce the same number of Taxpayers to have themselves enrolled as voters for the twenty seats allotted to these bodies? Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Editor of Al-Hilal, has identified himself with the loud demand for the democratisation of the Nadwa Constitution. Here is a constitution as democratic as he could ever dream of ready to his hand. Could not he and Maulana Abdul Wadood of Bareilly, who fought last July for no less than 10 seats for the Press, against the Press constituency? If not they, why not the Editors of Paisa Akhbar and Watan? We think this is not only possible but certain if only a few men were as good as their professions of zeal for democracy. We shall be glad to hear from those who are willing to take up this work, and we appeal to the Honorary Secretary of the Association to extend the time till the 25th of July and in the meantime publish every week the names of those enrolled in the various registers. It must be remembered that the Association will not only revise the Draft Constitution of the University but will administer till the University is established no less an annual income than a lakh of rupees and probably much more. It will be for the Association to decide whether this annual income is to be expended on creating more lecture-rooms or new hostels, on appointing more European Professors or sending out the best young Moslem graduates to qualify themselves in Europe, America and Japan by further study and specialization for Professorships in the University. These are valuable privileges and if Moslem democracy cannot be induced to secure these for the mere asking, we must confess we shall regard all talk of حریت (liberty), ارباب حل و عقد (people's choice), ایک قوم (one nation) as so much bunkum. Is it not a sad commentary on our use of these words that, so far as we know, even if every graduate or editor who has hitherto enrolled himself only voted for himself tomorrow he would get elected with that single vote, and even then there will not be enough to fill all seats allotted to such advanced and democratic constituencies? We have seen friendships of a lifetime snap like a lady's chain in the hands of gaint over Municipal and District Board elections. Even if honest workers are not forthcoming for the Moslem University elections, let some of the leavings of Municipal and District Board elections apply for a much greater honour that goes abegging.

Sanitation in India.

THE Government of India have just issued an important Resolution dealing with the progress of Indian Sanitation. The document covers a large ground. It sets forth the general policy and lays down broad lines of advance with reference to the peculiar aspects of the question of public health in this country. The creation of the Department of Education has proved to be a very useful step, inasmuch as the sanitary needs of the country have begun to receive systematic attention. Prior to 1910 sanitation was more or less in a neglected state and official zeal showed itself in spasmodic measures which achieved no remarkable results owing to lack of method and adequate machinery for application. As the Resolution briefly notes, the first official attempt to introduce scientific sanitation in India was made in 1863 on the basis of a recommendation of a Royal Commission. Commissions of public health were created in the Presidencies of Madras, Bombay and Bengal with a view to the diminution of sickness in the army and the improvement of the health of the general population. They were, however, replaced by sanitary commissioners with their assistants. Lord Dufferin's Government issued a resolution in 1888 in consequence of which sanitary boards were formed in each province. But the results of these measures were comparatively insignificant, because the sanitary systems of Europe were sought to be applied to India without due regard to the conditions of life in tropical and temperate climates and because the people were for the most part ignorant of the principles of modern hygiene. The outbreak of plague first roused Government as well as the educated classes to the supreme necessity of sanitary reform in a thorough and scientific way. The early efforts of Government to check the virulence of the epidemic were unfortunately not attended with happy results. The measures that were enforced in places to fight the scourge were imprudent devices suggested by panic and took no account of the social habits and deep-seated prejudices of the people. The enforcement of doctrinaire measures of precaution was naturally resented and in some localities it led to angry and serious outbursts of popular passion. This scared Government to a considerable degree and it was naturally assumed that efforts for sanitary progress on a large scale would simply prove a waste of energy as long as the attitude of the people remained so intractable. The doctrine of caution began to be preached with a loud belief in its expediency. The failure of the early plague measures of Government proved a set-back in the sanitary progress of India, for certain incorrect official theories were evolved out of that unhappy experience. As a matter of fact, the failure was due not so much to the innate apathy of the masses and their hostility to change, as to the injudicious way in which drastic measures of evacuation and prevention were enforced. We do not deny that the general ignorance of the people is a great obstacle in the way of sanitary advance, but the difficulty can be overcome if care is taken to adapt measures to the existing social conditions.

With the creation of the Education Department, which is also in charge of sanitation, the real, systematic effort to introduce scientific sanitation in India may be said to have begun. In addition to sanitary conferences held by local Governments, three all-India sanitary conferences have been convened since 1910 at Bombay, Madras and Lucknow, respectively, over which the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler presided as Member of the Governor-General's Council in charge of the department concerned. These conferences were attended by non-officials as well as officials, by laymen as well as professional sanitarians. The Indian Research Fund Association has also been founded "to further the prosecution of research, and the propagation of knowledge and experimental measures generally in connection with the causation, mode of spread and prevention of communicable diseases." The Government of India decided some time ago to make an annual recurring grant of 5 lakhs of rupees to this Fund. It is satisfactory to note that since the constitution of the new Department the claims of sanitation have been receiving an increasing measure of recognition at the hands of the Government, and grants from Imperial revenues have been made to local Governments and Administrations to the amount of Rs. 4,61,47,000 (£3,076,466), of which Rs. 55,23,000 (£368,200) are recurring and Rs. 4,06,24,000 (£2,708,266) non-recurring. In addition, grants amounting to Rs. 82,38 lakhs (£548,866) a year have been made to district boards in certain provinces, a substantial portion of which will, it is hoped, be expended on rural sanitation. "These grants" says the Resolution, "have rendered practicable the execution of schemes which a few years ago seemed beyond the limits of financial possibility; and there can be little doubt that the movement for sanitary reform is now well established and progressive throughout the country." We trust this will not prove a mere pious hope. In spite of some adverse criticism, we may readily assume that the Imperial grants for sanitation have been liberal and adequate. But what about the results? The local Governments have huge balances of these sanitary grants still lying unspent. On the occasion of the last Budget Statement in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Finance Member referred to these unspent balances with some concern and in view of this he had a plausible reason for making a paltry allotment for sanitation. If the spending powers of local Governments remain what they are, Imperial grants even on a liberal scale give little occasion for public enthusiasm. It may be agreed that local Governments have not yet been able to devise a thorough, practicable programme and machinery for the purpose. One may readily admit that the question is beset with difficulties, and much thought and labour will have to be spent in evolving suitable lines for the progress of sanitation in different provinces. And it is not very difficult to sympathise with the dictum of the Resolution that "in the land of the ox-cart one must not expect the pace of the motor-car." But even in the land of the ox-cart a period of four years can carry far, and it should not have been difficult for our efficient local Governments to find suitable ways for spending their balances if they had the necessary wills.

The problem of sanitation in India may be divided under three important heads. The first and most important is the organisation of scientific research into the etiology and bacteriology of tropical diseases and other peculiar conditions affecting public health in India; secondly, the elaboration of suitable measures of sanitary reform both for urban and rural areas, based on scientific investigation and research; lastly, the training and organisation of efficient sanitary staff to carry out these measures in the most economical manner and with due regard to the habits of the people and their social environment. The Resolution lays down some sound principles to which sanitary reform must conform in order to be successful. It must rest on a knowledge of the people, their surroundings and financial means; and it must secure their co-operation. It must recognise the diversity of local conditions in a country inhabited by diverse races and creeds and exhibiting every variety of climate, temperature, humidity and level of sub-soil water. Its introduction must be preceded by preliminary local surveys, inquiry, or experiment. These are sound propositions, and in a scientific and thorough organisation of effort for sanitary reform they must be rigidly adhered to.

It is satisfactory to note that the vital importance of research is fully recognised by Government. Efforts are being made to equip research laboratories in different places for the study of problems of public health. The King Institute, founded in 1902 at Quinyin Madras, was the first research institute established in India. In 1905, Lord Curzon's Government summed up the position and the policy of the Government of India in regard to the establishment of laboratories. Since then steady progress has been made; a Central Research Institute has been established at Kasauli and other provincial laboratories and institutes for the diagnosis and special research connected with local conditions have been established or are under construction in different provinces. The Government of India hope that before long each province in India will have a laboratory fully equipped for research. The most notable event in regard to sanitary progress has been the foundation of the Indian Research Fund Association in 1911. The control and management of the association are vested in a governing body of which the Education Member is the President. The governing body is assisted by a "scientific advisory board" which examines all proposals for work in connection with the scientific objects of the association and reports as to their importance and feasibility. The membership of the Association is open to non-officials. Every donor of Rs. 5,000 is entitled to become a permanent member, while every subscriber of Rs. 100 per annum can be temporary member. The association has been able to do good work since its foundation. It is financing important investigations into problems connected with a variety of diseases, epidemics and other matters bearing on public health. Besides financing the investigations conducted by its own staff, the association gives grants-in-aid to outside research on approved lines. The association has also started a quarterly Journal—the Indian Journal of Medical Research—for the publication of medical research work done in India.

The sanctioned strength of superior sanitary organisation in India has been considerably raised. Besides a sanitary commissioner with the Government of India and the bacteriological department comprising thirteen laboratories, fifteen new appointments have recently been sanctioned for the prosecution of research work and direct investigation in the field, and large sanitary establishments have been sanctioned for each province. The progress of sanitation depends in reality on the industry and capacity of provincial sanitary staffs. If they have sufficient enthusiasm for their tasks, have insight into the conditions of Indian life and take into account the habits, customs and financial position of inhabitants in various localities, they may reap creditable results within a reasonable period and succeed in laying down the lines of sanitary advance in India on a broad and sure basis. Qualified Indians should as far as possible be appointed as deputy sanitary commissioners and health officers. A British diploma is required from candidates for the post of deputy sanitary commissioners and health officers of the first class, but arrangements for the training of the superior Sanitary staff should as soon as possible be made in India.

The Resolution concludes by laying strong emphasis on the importance of education in the growth of sanitary reform. It is absolutely true that the spread of sound education among the masses will facilitate the application of sanitary measures throughout the country. The claims of hygiene as part of their educational policy were recognised by the Government of India in their educational resolution of February 1913. The sanitary resolution emphasises the need of mass education. It now rests with the Department of Education to provide for the rapid and thorough application of sanitary measures and educational schemes with equal energy and liberality. There has hitherto been some disposition to discount the claims of either by alternately emphasising the needs of each. The twins of the Education Department should not, like step sisters, be played one against the other, but every effort should be made to endow both with equal generosity. We are satisfied that the Government of India view their responsibilities in these directions with increasing earnestness and there is no occasion to despair of rapid progress within the next few years.

Verse.

A Vision.

From out the golden dawn of vanished years
 She glides into my dreams, a form divine
 Of light and love, to soothe the thoughts that pine
 For what has been, to stem the tide of tears
 That inward flows upon the heart and sears
 Its inmost core. Her countenance benign,
 Where chastened Pity's softest graces shine,
 Reflects the hallowed light of other spheres.
 Then to my yearning soul, with care outworn,
 Comes, like a strain on aerial wings upborne,
 This message from her soul—"Bid sorrow cease;
 Love dies not; 'tis the immortal life above;
 And chastened souls, that win eternal peace
 Through earthly suffering, know that Heaven is Love!"

CORRESPONDENCE

The "Resolutions" of "Anjuman-i-Imamia," Agra.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—It should give me no end of relief if you would be so kind as to publish the following in your paper:—

I learnt it with great disgust that certain resolutions passed by the Anjuman-i-Imamia, Shahganj, Agra, appeared in the Zamindar, Lahore. These resolutions concerning the recent Shia-Sunni misunderstanding at Aligarh are most absurd and absolutely ridiculous. Had it not been for the fact that the Zamindar, with its popularity and wide circulation, gave a place to them in its columns, I assure you, I should not have even looked at them. They are so silly and stupid that any sensible person will simply blush at them and feel sorry for the energy wasted in framing them.

Unfortunately the Zamindar's publication of these resolutions in its columns made them look rather important in the public eye and must have set many minds a thinking.

I am, however, taking the earliest opportunity of contradicting them and beg to explain through your columns the actual facts of the case:

Firstly.—The Anjuman-i-Imamia is mainly composed of young students i. e. most of its members are school lads.

Secondly.—These resolutions were read before the members the majority of whom was composed of urchins from Maktabas. There were hardly four or five grown-up members present, one being a student of the 2nd year class, another member a clerk in a certain local office, and two others of no particular calling.

Thirdly.—The resolutions were passed to the credit of the above mentioned urchins who are hardly well up in their First Reader and Second Reader lessons.

Fourthly.—I was present at this meeting at the request of the secretary who had previously asked me to visit the Anjuman and thus give an opportunity to the members to be benefitted by my advice. When I arrived at the Anjuman I found hardly fifteen or sixteen members present, including the school lads, of course. Before this I had never visited this Anjuman. I occupied the chair at their pressing request and asked them to refrain from sending these vicious, hot-headed and unreasonable resolutions to the Press or to the Government. I nullified the whole proceedings.

I was not aware of their doings till to-day when I caught sight of those very resolutions in the columns of the Zamindar, on my return from Kheri. I was shocked at their very sight and was frightfully disgusted with the unthinking members of the Anjuman and their unconstitutional proceedings. I am simply astonished at the result, and want to make it public that I have had nothing to do with the framing, publishing or sanctioning the publication or communication of these resolutions to anybody. I absolutely refuse my name being associated with the appreciation of such an infamous proceeding as this. I entirely disagree with the resolutions and I detest the very idea of their getting circulation in our midst.

I always held the Aligarh College in great esteem and regarded it as a purely Muslim national institution. I am a Muslim and a Muslim alone! I am capable of seeing only one shade in our national matters and that is of Islam. My eyes are closed to the disgusting and sickening sight of Shia-Sunni, Wahabi and Qadiani sects and their differences. To my mind divisions in Islam are most painful and horrible. It is most annoying to me to learn that I can ever encourage Shia-Sunni disputes. I am a staunch believer in the Muslim policy of to-day and those who make mischief between these two sects, I call criminal, or at least irresponsible, lunatics.

I regret I have taken so much space in your valued columns, but I hope you will agree with me that a few personal remarks about myself were necessary on this occasion.

HASAN MANZIL, SHAHGANJ;
Agra, 14th May, 1914.

Yours faithfully,
SYED HASAN ABID JAFRY.

Legal Trifles.

THE tricks, the diverse shifts and make-believes of any trade are always looked upon with interest by those who think themselves unfortunate in not belonging to that trade. In the last issue of the Comrade I read with pleasure an article headed "the Lonely Homestead" and, though I was somewhat surprised at the simple optimism of a remark about the Pleadars, I tried to enjoy with the writer the shooting and the search, not to mention the sandwiches and the Badmashes. My pleasant reflections were, however, broken by a sudden remembrance of an experience that I had passed through not long before.

I remembered my anxiety and hesitation of some few moments of intensely hurried thought, whether I should cross-examine on a certain point in a case in which 3 accused persons were charged with receiving and retaining stolen property obtained by means of a dacoity. What the point was, I shall relate as we proceed further.

Once the Badmashes, the informers and the Swat Bonair Afridis were out of my mind, I realised fully the significance of the words, which in the abovementioned article, ran as follows:—"news had also been sent to the Joint Magistrate, who kindly rode over, a step that I calculated on to checkmate the usual assertions of Pleadars for the defence to the effect that the wicked Police themselves plant stolen property in order to secure the conviction of poor, honest people."

I am not going here to preach a homily, but just to note down a fact. I will only say that as the various professions have their work marked out in different spheres of life, criticism which takes measure of any other profession by its own rule of thumb goes amiss. Unless you put on a black gown on your mind, when judging the Pleadars, you are as likely to go astray as a Pleadar would, who judges the Police without putting on his mind a red turban with a golden tassel.

I was engaged at the eleventh hour in the case—a misfortune peculiar to juniors—just managed to reach the Sessions Court-room as the examination-in-chief of the first and a very important witness had terminated. And then I was called upon to cross-examine!

I have not been in the profession for a long time, and a few months before the commencement of my independent work, I had devilled it under the Hon'ble Mr. Riza Ali who was and is still my ideal of a young advocate. Well, the only thing that I think I have succeeded in catching, to some very small extent, of my learned senior's qualities was a little Sangfroid. On the day in question, my senior's gift proved very useful to me. A little apology to the Court, a meaningless remark to the Prosecutor and the thing was done. The bearded Peshkar in his sonorous voice re-read the whole testimony of the witness, with a certain modulation of voice more akin to reading verse than prose.

There lay on the table, nearly 2 seers of silver ornaments, some golden ornaments, clothes, pandans and other paraphernalia of the alleged loot, while the registering of the exhibits showed signs that all the 26 letters of the alphabet had been exhausted. Over and above these, there were two frowning exhibits. One was a big old-fashioned revolver the mechanism of which I could not at all understand and which seemed to date back to the days of Warren Hastings, and the other a rusty long sword (remining one of the Ruhilla war), the scabbard of which the prosecution took pains to be identified by each search witness. While the Peshkar was engaged in reading out the statement of the witness, I thought out my future plan of action. I was prepared to answer for the ornaments, but the arms were a riddle not to be solved in any way. After some anxious, very anxious moments of concentrated thought, I resolved not to question about the two weapons.

I honestly thought it was an idle excuse to place the responsibility of the revolver and the sword being found in the house on the shoulders of the Police. The revolver was alleged to have been extracted from a wall in the room and the sword was lying among some sticks, in a kothi, in which grain is stored.

Fortunately for my client and more for myself, that day only the identification witnesses of the ornaments were produced. Late in the evening one or two Police witnesses, also, deposed, but I was loth to ask them about the weapons as I was sincerely convinced in my mind that the arms belonged to the occupants of the house and were found in the place where the Police stated them to have been. However, when the Court rose for the day, I had an opportunity of a little conversation with my goal-bird—who, by the way was old hand at things—and his explanation and assurance changed my view of the case entirely. He told me, if I remember aught, that he had seen all sides of life, had been the leader in, what he called, the deeds of darings and that his hands were not pure; but despite this candour he absolutely denied, all knowledge of the weapons.

I knew that ordinarily these men try to impose on their Blesder; but it was one of those earnest moments when the very soul seems to speak, and if I was not fully convinced by his denial, at least a suspicion was roused about the sword and the revolver. Next day I was ready for my friends, the Police officers, and in the ensuing cross-examination expected a tough encounter. From the statement of the first Sub-Inspector, I gathered that he was very anxious about the case and wanted to "over prove." The next Sub-Inspector was a man of some 20 years' experience and he tried to be indefinite and took shelter behind a screen of vagueness. As a matter of the etiquette of our profession, the traditions of which we all hold dear, I was most civil to them and asked my questions in the plainest of language.

However, as the ice grew thinner under our feet, the replies became snappish and short. I drew them further on when, at last, the climax was reached. We exchanged glances and they were far from being amicable. Each reply now became qualified with an adverbial clause "as far as I remember." I knew that my friend had grown irritated and I was not slow to take advantage of it.

I followed with a rapid succession of questions beginning with "will you tell me, Sir, as far as you remember etc.," to which my friend replied in the same strain. At last, the Court interfered and an order for the total destruction of the adverbial clause was passed.

I succeeded in extracting by means of much round about questioning that there was darkness in the room where the weapons were found and that there was no aperture for light.

Then there came a young Assistant Superintendent of Police, who was among the search-party, but was at a distance of nearly a mile when the weapons were found in the house. He was sent for only after the discovery of the arms. He gave me the desired information without much difficulty. He told the Court that the room in which the revolver was found was fairly dark which, to my chagrin, was translated in Urdu as somewhat dark. But also for the honesty of the Police, the Sub-Inspector had deposed that his attention had been drawn to the resting place of the revolver by a slight roughness in the surface of the wall at a height of nearly 3 yards from the floor in a corner of the room away from the light and more specially by the difference in the colour of the mud in this place from the colour of the mud in the rest of the room. So in that fairly dark room, where the Assistant Superintendent of Police said he nearly tripped as his foot entered a hole in the ground, the lynx-eyed Sub-Inspector had distinguished the two colours of the mud!

As for the sword, which was found lying among some sticks, the very facility attending its discovery, was sufficient to arouse suspicion. In the end the assessors found that the weapons did not come from the house of my pretty gaol-bird and the Court was also of the same opinion. Far be it from me to suggest where they had come from and who had put them in that dark room equally useful for the expert photographer and for the Sub-Inspector, who is an expert in the colour of mud! Mr. Norton may perhaps try.

Ghasita: a Budmash.

II.—A marriage marred.

Ghasita did not waste time at Saiyan, but leaving the railway station set off for the town of Khairigarh, 12 miles distant, where he intended stopping a few days in order to pick up information about the dacoit gangs supposed to frequent the neighbourhood of Jagner and the jungly tract of country stretching into Dholpur State. His wish was to attach himself to a set of those desperate characters in order to study dacoity methods, of which he had no previous knowledge, his crimes hitherto falling under the definitions of burglary and theft. Besides it was improbable that the Agra Police would track him into that wild region, while even if they succeeded in doing so, there were difficulties in the form of extradition rules that would favour his safety from immediate arrest, if discovered. His stock of ready money was limited to eight annas, extorted from his hosts of the preceding night, but he relied on his ready skill as a housebreaker to replenish an exhausted exchequer: if he could gain large sums of money by the exercise of his profession of burglar in a city like Calcutta, he ought to find it easy to relieve bunnias and grain merchants of the rupees they stored in their houses in the same sort of hiding place—under the hearthstone or at the bottom of the huge earthen vats for holding grain—as their forefathers had done for generations past. Ghasita accordingly took up his quarters in the little serai—Khairigarh is not by any means an important place or one with many visitors from the outer world—after recording himself, (under an alias of course), as a bha-bhanya, or grain-parcher, proceeding on pilgrimage to the noted shrine of Gwal Baba at Jagner. That town lay nine miles to the west of Khairigarh and was the site of an old fort, held alternately by Moghul and Maratha garrisons during the period of declining Mahomedan sway over India. Fearing that a big burglary might excite suspicion against strangers in the town, he confined his financial undertakings to the committal of petty thefts, where the booty was just enough to meet current expenses, nor did he succeed in getting in touch with any dacoits. Plenty of stories about those gentry, the exploiters of the various gangs, the names and personal characteristics of the leaders, were told as lodgers in the serai squatted around the common fire at night, yet nobody hinted at closer acquaintance with the persons under discussion. He had almost resolved to push on to Jagner and try for news in that place, when a small party, ostensibly snake-charmers and jugglers of a sort, entered the serai one evening, and before they had been there a couple of hours, the natural instinct whereby people of the same stamp get attracted to one another led to Ghasita and the wanderers becoming quite intimate. They belonged to a sect of the Kanjars—gipsies proclaimed under the Criminal Tribes Act, and addicted to highway robbery for their maintenance, rather than to what sums they earned by the exhibition of their tame snakes and the performance of crude feats of legerdemain. The Kanjars were bound for Jagner, hoping to find employment (as they euphemistically expressed it), among the travellers now en route for the shrine mentioned above, where an annual Fair is held towards the end of the month of Bhadon, corresponding in the Hindu calendar to the English September. Ghasita decided, after some conversation with his new friends, to join the gang and an early hour in the following morning found them tramping along the rough track that served as road from Khairigarh to Jagner. The Kanjars did not proceed further than a few miles, when their head-man announced his plans for pitching camp on the slopes of the Noni hill, a long, low eminence, rising to about 600 feet above sea level, and the sides of which were covered by dense brush-wood. From this coign of vantage watch could be easily kept on the two main lines of approach to Jagner, and in the nullahs and recesses of Noni the gang would be fairly secure from pursuit and capture. These fond expectations were not disappointed, for once the stream of pilgrim traffic began, not a day elapsed without booty—sometimes very small, sometimes reaching to three figures in value—obtained by the gipsies, who divided their forces and trusted to their known daring and fierceness to overcome such resistance as timid folk were likely to offer. This run of good fortune ultimately brought their campaign of pillage to an abrupt termination. Daily reports of crimes by foot-pads caused the Superintendent of Police to hasten to Jagner and try to catch the perpetrators of those offences, which necessitated the compilation of Special Reports, (in triplicate), which had to be submitted to the higher authorities, and which, from their sudden frequency, might cast doubts on the efficiency of himself and his subordinates.

The Kanjars noticed an European on horseback, accompanied by two sowars, who—like the Knight in the Faery Queen—were "pricking o'er the plain" that skirted the hill on which they were encamped, and thought it necessary to send somebody to Jagner next day to ascertain who the intruder on their preserves might be, his object in visiting the neighbourhood, and the probable duration of his stay in that part of the world. Ghasita volunteered for this job on the Intelligence Branch, having for companion one of the smartest men among the Kanjar gang. It was not long—Jagner reached—before they learnt that the stranger was a Police Officer and their recent crimes the reason for his appearance on the scene. The spies strolled round the outside of the Police Station and calmly studied the Notices—printed in Nagri and Urdu—which were affixed to a large board for that purpose that can be observed at every Thana in the Provinces. Neither of the men were able to read Urdu correctly, but had a smattering of the Nagri characters, sufficient to gather the general import of the matter printed on those sheets of badami paper. Of course, full details—with dates etc. of the late robberies—occupied a prominent place, but another notice in larger type, and with the words "Reward Offered" in capital letters as its heading, possessed more interest for Ghasita than the rest of the placards, since it gave full particulars of his escape from the Central Jail followed by a correct descriptive roll of the fugitive from justice. He furtively watched his Kanjar comrade and detected the latter carefully perusing the Notice, every now and then casting a secret glance at Ghasita as if to compare his features and personality with that of the person mentioned, for whose arrest a hundred rupees—and no questions asked—was offered by the District Magistrate of Agra. The position was rather too exciting to be pleasant, so Ghasita insisted on their speedy return to Noni hill, declaring that the gang must promptly decamp from that place or run the danger of a surprise visit from the Police, certain to display much energy now that a Sahib had come to urge them to greater activity than had marked their proceedings up to date. Aware that the Kanjar carried a pistol, albeit of ancient pattern, also a short hunting knife, concealed beneath the dirty waistband he was wearing. Ghasita hit on a plan for annexing those weapons and saying, farewell to his present associates. Tired by the hurry in which they covered the distance from Jagner town to the base of the hill, the two men sat down beside a well for a short rest and the inevitable smoke. Not suspecting that his study of the Reward Notice had been seen by the Kachi, the Kanjar was quite off his guard, so Ghasita met with no opposition to the spring he made at the throat of the other man, whom he nearly throttled before binding him hand and foot in the folds of his own dhoti and placing a gag—contrived from a piece of wood and strip of turban—in the mouth of the gipsy to prevent an alarm being given to any members of the gang who might be lurking in the vicinity. Having secured his victim, Ghasita lost no time in retracing his steps to Jagner: a bold move, yet an excellent piece of strategy. The principal day of the Fair was at hand and there was not much fear of his being noticed amid the dense crowd of pilgrims, while the Kanjars—ignorant of his intentions and not fully convinced of his identity with the person for whom the Reward was offered—would dread venturing into the town, lest he might have given tidings about them and their crimes to the Police. Thus secured from molestation on the part of his late pals, Ghasita quietly went across the border into Dholpur, spent a couple of days in the capital of that State and then began working back towards Agra. He did not know the lie of the country, so he took the railway line as a guide and by thus acting had a great stroke of luck.

The country he now traversed was sparsely populated in the immediate vicinity of the railway; small ravines, their sides hidden by thick undergrowth, interrupted the usual monotonous level of an Indian plain, and it was only on nearing a roadside station that villages were seen and signs of human life became evident. Half way between one of these places and Satyan—for two days hard walking had brought our traveller back to that point in his journeyings—a whitewashed building, situated on a knoll about a hundred yards from the line, attracted the attention of Ghasita. It was clearly meant for European tenants and he had no desire to come under the notice of any inquisitive Sahib, so went out on the permanent way to try and see if any village was within easy distance, where he might procure food and make a brief halt. Instead of what he sought his quick eyes perceived a small vehicle coming along the rails in his direction, which a moment's reflection showed him to be one of the trollies used by railway officials when inspecting stretch of line under their charge. A Permanent-way Inspector almost invariably travels in that fashion and it was a member of that class who now approached as rapidly as the efforts of two perspiring coolies, running barefooted along the hot metals could propel the trolley, heavy in weight yet capable of attaining a very decent rate of speed once fairly set going. Stepping back into the tall grass that fringed the line on either side and which afforded ample cover for a dozen men, Ghasita watched for the passage of the trolley and its occupants. Somewhat to his surprise, mingled with a little fear, it slackened speed on nearing his hiding place, but he soon found that he had no cause for alarm, since it came to a standstill where little path led up to the bungalow just mentioned and which proved to be a Rest House provided by the railway for its officers when out on duty. The European was dressed in khaki clothes of the usual type, conveniently loose to insure comfort at that season of the year; a big solah topce on his head, a pair of brown boots as foot-gear, and a soft shirt of Cawnpore manufacture to complete his outfit. Four coolies, acting in turn as human propellers, and a private servant, who filled the dual billets of bearer and cook, comprised the companions of the Sahib. It was between eleven and twelve o'clock and intensely hot, added to which circumstance it was past the usual breakfast hour, so the European stranger had grown impatient and lost no time in walking up the slope towards the Rest House, having ordered one coolie to run ahead and see about wood and water; another to look sharp and place himself at the punkah rope, the remaining two to assist his servant in carrying the Sahib's belongings, consisting of a tiffin basket, office box, roll of bedding, and big sorahi of the porous stone used at Chhunar for the manufacture of goblets for water. His orders were given with much gesticulation, in tones that evidently demanded prompt compliance, each sentence being duly emphasised by one of the expletives employed by the average Briton when excited and his temper ruffled. Ghasita noticed that a long leather case had been overlooked when the rest of the usab was being removed from the trolley, and he had not loitered on railway platforms without picking up some knowledge on the subject of a Sahib's luggage, so he immediately guessed the forgotten package to be a gun-case. The bearer had hardly gone twenty paces when he appeared to recollect something and was telling a coolie to go back to the trolley, when the voice of his master

"*Kadam uthao! Damn the usab and look sharp with my breakfast and tub.*" made him alter his intentions and the whole of the little party hastened to reach the bungalow without bestowing further thought on the leather case and its contents. Scarcely crediting the arrival of such good luck, Ghasita was out of the tall grass and had seized the case before its owner could have entered the house and started undressing for his bath. In fact, the convict had put several miles between himself and the trolley party before the loss was discovered and the unfortunate European given juster cause for anger and the use of still stronger language. Instead of proceeding straight to Agra, as he had originally meant to do, Ghasita diverged to the south-east in order to cross into Dholpur, a strip of that State running in that direction. He then marched nearly parallel to the Chambal river through a tract broken up by ravines and devoid of any sort of vegetation, save where a clump of babul trees waved their thorny branches or a solitary nipal or mahua crowned an upland spur overlooking the surrounding waste. His idea was to reach Agra from the south, and to do this it was necessary to cross the Pinahat Tahsil and strike the road from Etawah to Agra somewhere near the town of Bah; a place 33 miles distant from the city of Akbar and through which traffic from Gwalior and Mainpuri was wont to pass in considerable amount. He examined his treasure-trove, the gun case, as soon as he deemed it safe to indulge in a halt, pretty sure that he had eluded all possible chance of being overtaken by any pursuers. The contents of the case turned out to be a Winchester carbine, with a magazine and a packet of cartridges; just the kind of weapon a man could rely on to protect himself or damage an opponent. How to carry the rifle puzzled him for a bit, as it could not of course be taken to pieces like a sporting gun. However this obstacle was conquered by gathering a bundle of karbi stalks and artfully concealing the firearm in the midst of this innocent outside wrapper. Nobody was likely to interfere with a poor man, apparently trudging homewards with a supply of fodder for his bullock or country tat; in fact, it was improbable that he would encounter many wayfarers on the country tracks and small village paths along which he directed his steps. Besides he had a friend or two at Bah, who might be persuaded to let him have a small sum of money for current expenses, until he had fully matured his plans for the future and recommenced levying toll from the general public. Even keener than his wish to replenish his pockets with the rupees of others, was longing for revenge on the constable of Rikabgunge station whose evidence had been so material in getting him sent to gaol. Pondering over various schemes to pay out that policeman, he arrived in due course at Bah, and remained there for close on a fortnight, before resuming his travels. The associates referred to were induced, partly from feelings of charity, partly from fear, to supply him with funds which he devoted to making a few needful purchases. Among other things he bought a yard or two of coarse sackings, from which to make a rude cover for this precious rifle; having learnt how to use a needle, after a fashion, while in the Andamans. Provided with that weapon, the revolver and big knife stolen from the Kanjar, Ghasita felt prepared for any attempt to arrest him, nor imagined such would be made now that the first excitement caused by his escape from prison must have died out. Although efforts are made to prevent several members of the same family joining the Police in one District, it is fairly easy to evade the regulations on that point. Indians have so wide a circle of relatives, and these often living wide distances apart, that a recruit finds little trouble in concealing the connection between him and other relations he possesses in the Force. When a Superintendent has been a year or so in a District—especially if he is in the habit of talking freely with his subordinates, the Circle Inspectors, the Reader, and Station Officers—he is frequently surprised to unearth a family group of actual brothers, first and second cousins, and so forth, who have contrived to enlist under his command and form a tiny clique bound together by ties of blood for good or ill.

At Bah, there happened to be one of the armed Police on Treasury Guard at the Tahsil, whose brother was the person concerned in having Ghasita convicted; a circumstance that clever villain resolved to take advantage of. Allowing his intention of running into Agra for a day or so to be known to the Guard, he soon found the constable in question coming to ask the favour of his conveying to the Rikabgunge man a letter asking the latter to obtain three days' leave and come to Bah for the discussion of some family business. That errand was undertaken by Ghasita, after a little feigned reluctance, and thus a means supplied for effecting a plan of revenge he was preparing. Not caring to risk his safety by going in person to Rikabgunge with the letter, he got a chankidar to deliver that missive, and subsequent private inquiries informed him that the leave had been sought for and granted. The object of his hatred would depart for Bah on a certain date. Ghasita lost no time in returning to Duhuki, a small village equi-distant from Agra and Bah, which all travellers were in the habit of using as convenient half-way resting place, for baiting ponies, cooking a meal, and enjoying a temporary halt on the journey between the two places named. Aware of the habits of his countrymen serving in the Police—or for that matter, in any Government Department—he knew that the constable would try and get gratis “lifts” on the road, either on ekkas or, failing that mode of conveyance, on a bullock cart. At all events he was certain to stop at Duhuki and then his enemy could settle on what course to adopt for satisfying his thirst for revenge. Everything happened as was foreseen by Ghasita. Towards the small hours, an ekka rattled up to the parao at Duhuki, its occupants an aged cloth merchant and a man whom Ghasita at once recognised as the hostile witness he was seeking for. The dealer in piece goods was too fatigued to proceed when the ekka driver announced his wish to make a start, so the constable said that he would walk on slowly and trusted the kapra-wallah would lose as little time as possible in following his example, so that the pair might travel to Bah in company. Ghasita meanwhile arranged his plan of operations, and directly he saw the policeman collecting his bundle of clothes and cooking utensils, which he handed over to the ekka driver to bring along with him, disappeared into the outer darkness. Trotting briskly along the road to Bah till he reached a spot suited for the crime he was about to commit, and too far from Duhuki to allow of the report of a gun being heard by people at that place, he took shelter behind a thick bush, removed the cover from his rifle. Loaded the Winchester, and may have muttered to himself the words lately used by a certain distinguished politician “Wait and see.” Ignorant of any danger, the constable soon afterwards came leisurely tramping along the road, singing some rustic ballad learnt in infancy at his home, the sound of which warned the man in ambush that his hour for clearing off old scores had arrived. Ghasita,—whatever his vices were—had an audacity in his actions akin to true valour, he did not shoot down his prey without informing the victim to whom he would owe his doom. Stepping suddenly on to the road, a few paces in front of the astonished traveller, he uttered a sentence full of the vilest abuse, then pulling the trigger sent the Rikabgunge policeman to a land where no Penal Code exists, where justice is not administered in quite the same way as in Indian Courts of Law (at least one trusts such is the case) and even an Inspector-General of Police has to take his chance along with the lowest of his earthly myrmidons. Returning the weapon to its covering, Ghasita made a wide detour so as to avoid repassing Duhuki, and regained the highway at a point near Agra, having determined to hide in a parlour of that city, till it would be safe to show himself abroad once more. He knew of a good place of refuge and hastened to reach it before the next day was well advanced and he might be subjected to troublesome inquiries en route. Fortune favoured the ruffian, and long before noon, he was seated in the house of a Sonar in Tajgunge, chuckling over the success of his scheme and absolutely careless at having the burden of a brutal murder on his mind. His next appearance in public was of a still more striking nature, but must be reserved for another of these stories of a Budmash.

Sanitation in India.

The following resolution has been issued by the Government of India (Department of Education):—

HISTORICAL SUMMARY.

The modern history of scientific sanitation in India may be said to date from the end of the last century. Previously there had indeed been periods of useful spade work and spasms of general sanitary activity. A Royal Commission, appointed in 1859 and reporting in 1863, recommended the formation of commissions of public health in the presidencies of Madras, Bombay and Bengal, with a view to the diminution of sickness in the army, and the improvement of the health of the general population. These commissions were appointed but were soon replaced in each presidency by a sanitary commissioner with an assistant. Sanitary inspectors general, afterwards called sanitary commissioners, were appointed in other provinces; and the sanitary and vaccination staffs were gradually amalgamated. In 1888, Lord Dufferin's Government issued a resolution drawing the attention of local bodies and village unions to their duties in the matter of sanitation; and sanitary boards were formed in every province. But comparatively little success attended these efforts except in the larger towns. On the one side, sanitary measures and systems of western countries were applied to India without due regard to the fundamental differences of western and eastern civilisations and of the conditions of life in tropical and temperate climates: on the other side, the people were unprepared for reform or any kind of change.

2. The ravages and horrors of plague and the discoveries resulting from medical research made some real impression on the educated community in India; and a demand gradually arose for sanitary surroundings and preventive measures, such as had not been known before. Individuals left their insanitary quarters for cleaner and healthier localities and in increasing numbers men began to realise the dangers to which they were exposed from existing conditions, and to appreciate the economic value of health and the wastefulness of sickness and premature death. Dislike of action was, however, for long persistent even among the educated. So far as the uneducated masses were concerned their apathy, fatalism and resentment of interference constituted a formidable obstacle to all sanitary progress.

RECENT ACTIVITY.

3. The Governments in India have moved more rapidly of late. In 1898, the Government of India issued an important statement of policy. In 1908, imperial grants amounting to Rs. 30,00,000 (£200,000) a year were made to local Governments. A new department of the Government of India was created in 1910 in order to relieve the Home Department of education, sanitation and some other branches of the administration. In addition to sanitary conferences held by local Governments, three all-India sanitary conferences have been convened at Bombay, Madras and Lucknow, respectively, over which the Hon'ble Sir Harcourt Butler presided as Member of the Governor General's Council in charge of the department concerned. These conferences were attended by non-officials as well as officials, by laymen as well as professional sanitarians. Again, the Indian Research Fund Association has been founded to further the prosecution of research, and the propagation of knowledge and experimental measures generally in connection with the causation, mode of spread and prevention of communicable diseases. To this fund the Government of India make an annually recurring grant of 5 lakhs of rupees (£33,333). Moreover, since the constitution of the new department of the Government of India, imperial grants have been made to local Governments and Administrations to the amount of Rs. 4,61,47,000 (£3,076,466), of which Rs. 55,28,000 (£368,200) are recurring, and Rs. 4,06,24,000 (£2,708,266) non-recurring. In addition, grants amounting to Rs. 82·38 lakhs (£548,866) a year have been made to district boards in certain provinces, a substantial portion of which will, it is hoped, be expended on rural sanitation. These grants have rendered practicable the execution of schemes which a few years ago seemed beyond the limits of financial possibility; and there can be little doubt that the movement for sanitary reform is now well established and progressive throughout the country.

CARDINAL PRINCIPLES.

4. There has thus been progress although the rate has hitherto been slow. In the land of the ox-cart one must not expect the pace of the motor car. The truly remarkable improvements effected of late years in the health of the army in India, in the case of Indian no less than British troops, cannot be expected in connection with the civil population. In the case of the army, the problem is concerned mainly with well nourished adults, all of whom are selected lives, living in sanitary surroundings, under military discipline. Moreover, so soon as a soldier becomes unfit for active service, he leaves the army and forms part of the civil population. In the case of the civil population, conditions of the problem are very different, and sanitary reform has still to grope its way through a labyrinth of difficulties. In order to be successful it must conform to three cardinal principles:—

- (1) it must rest on a knowledge of the people, their conditions of life, their prejudices, social customs and habits, their surroundings and financial means; and it must secure the co-operation;
- (2) it must recognise the diversity of local conditions in a country which includes numerous communities, castes and creeds and which exhibits almost every variety of climate, temperature, humidity and level of sub-soil water, from the deltas of Bengal with their steamy atmosphere and dense lush vegetation to the burnt brown hills of the north-west frontier;
- (3) its introduction must be preceded by preliminary local surveys, inquiry, or experiment.

SANITARY ORGANISATION.

5. As a result of the Plague Commission's Report Lord Curzon's Government took up with vigour the reorganisation of the sanitary department. Research institutes were started and an appointment of Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India was created. The functions of this officer to advise the Government of India upon sanitary and bacteriological questions, to settle with local Governments the principles on which an advance should be made, and to organise and direct research throughout India. The arrangement was not completely successful. Among the disadvantages, the separation of research from clinical work deterred men from entering the department, and the office work in connection with research prevented the Sanitary Commissioner from undertaking wide and constant touring. The organisation was accordingly modified in 1912. The Sanitary Commissioner is now the independent adviser to the Government of India in all technical and sanitary matters, but all questions of personnel as well as the administration of the bacteriological department and research generally have been placed under the control of the Director-General, Indian Medical Service, with the Sanitary Commissioner as his staff officer.

6. The sanctioned strength of the superior sanitary organisation in India now is :—

- (a) A Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India.
- (b) A bacteriological department comprising—
 - (i) thirteen laboratory appointments distributed as follows :—
 - Central Research Institute . . . 1 Director and 3 Assistants.
 - Bombay Bacteriological Laboratory . . . 1 Director and 2 Assistants.
 - King Institute of Preventive Medicine, Madras . . . 1 Director and 1 Assistant.
 - Pasteur Institute, Kasauli . . . 1 Director and 1 Assistant.
 - Pasteur Institute, Coonoor . . . 1 Director and 1 Assistant.
 - (ii) fifteen new appointments recently sanctioned for the prosecution of research work and direct investigation in the field.
- (c) The following establishments under local Governments :—

In their resolution, dated the 23rd May 1912, the Government of India provided for a large increase in the number of deputy sanitary commissioners and for the appointment of health officers (of the first-class for larger municipalities and of the second class for the smaller towns) on the lines of detailed proposals received from local Governments. Twelve additional appointments of deputy sanitary commissioner, thirty-five appointments of health officer of the first-class and a large addition to the number of second-class health officers were sanctioned in 1912 and 1913, the entire cost of the additional deputy sanitary commissioners on the basis of the scale of pay fixed for Indians and half the cost of the health officers being met by imperial grants. The Government of India also advised local Governments to take powers, where these did not exist, to require a municipality to appoint a health officer and to veto the appointment

- (a) Appointments of health officer in presidency towns and Simla are not included.
- (b) Five of these are temporary appointments.
- (c) In addition to the officers shown in this statement, the Director, Vaccine Institute, Bangalore, is also a sanitary officer.
- (d) There is also a temporary appointment.
- (e) Temporary.
- (f) One of these is temporary.
- (g) The administrative Head of the medical department is also the Sanitary Commissioner.
- (h) There are also four 3rd class health officers in the province.
- (i) The Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India is also Sanitary Commissioner, Delhi.
- (j) Two of these are temporary.

of an unfit person. Such powers already exist in the Bombay presidency, and have recently been taken by legislation in Bengal. Simultaneously, the Government of India recommend the system in force in Madras whereby every municipality is required to employ one or more trained sanitary inspectors in proportion to population. Sanitary inspectors are now being employed in large numbers in towns. In addition, the civil surgeon in every district is the sanitary adviser of the local authorities and in most provinces controls the vaccination staff. The provision of an increased staff of sanitary engineers is engaging urgent attention.

The Government of India attach great importance to the organisation of voluntary agencies and have recently made a grant of Rs. 20,000 (£1,333)—a sum equivalent to that given by the Bombay Government—to the Bombay sanitary association, which was founded in 1903, and now has corresponding branches in several districts and native states.

7. The policy of the Government of India is to keep the control of research under itself, but to decentralise other branches of sanitation. The creation of an imperial department is no departure from that policy, and the large imperial grants already mentioned have been made without any interference with provincial Governments. While the general direction of a policy of public health must remain with the central Government, all detailed control and executive action are, and will be, left with the local Governments. The Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India is a touring officer empowered to consult and confer informally with local Governments and their officers upon matters connected with sanitation. He is not permitted to encroach upon the authority of local Governments over the officers under their control.

8. The position of provincial sanitary commissioners towards the administrative heads of the medical department varies somewhat in different provinces. The Government of India do not wish to interfere with the arrangements which local Governments may consider best suited to local conditions, but they desire to insist on the importance of defining the functions of the two officers and securing to the sanitary commissioner the position of responsible technical adviser to the local Government in all matters affecting public health.

9. In every province, sanitary boards have been composed with varying powers, some being merely advisory, others having authority to sanction schemes and allot funds. These boards are composed of officers belonging to the medical, sanitary, engineering and other branches of the civil services with the addition of non-officials. The Government of India view with favour and confidence the devolution of financial authority and responsibility to these boards, and they commend to local Governments the appointment of a permanent salaried secretary to the board where this has not been done. They believe that such an appointment, wherever made, has resulted in an increase of efficiency.

TRAINING OF STAFF.

10. Arrangements for training the superior sanitary staff are now engaging the attention of the Government of India. The chief difficulty at present is to provide courses in practical hygiene and in the study of the bacteriology and etiology of tropical disease. It is hoped in the near future to make arrangements in India for the former and to utilise the schools of tropical medicine at Calcutta and elsewhere for the latter. Meanwhile, a British diploma in public health is required from candidates for the post of deputy sanitary commissioners and health officers of the first-class. The problems of public health in India are vitally complicated by the fact that biting insects are a prominent factor in the dissemination of disease, and it is obviously desirable to provide in India, as soon as possible, a complete course of training for sanitary officers.

Training classes for sanitary inspectors are now held in all the more important provinces.

11. A substantial beginning has thus been made for the development of a department of public health and Indians have been freely enlisted for it. The post of deputy sanitary commissioners and health officer are now open to Indians. Nine deputy sanitary commissioners out of 26 and the majority of health officers are Indians. The new bacteriological department consisting of 28 officers is also open to duly qualified Indians.

As health officers and sanitary engineers gradually relieve deputy sanitary commissioners of much of the drudgery inspection and routine work, it is hoped that the latter will be set free to deal with epidemics and communicable diseases from a higher plane, and to consider issues of public health wider than those which they are able to review to-day. It is, therefore, important to provide in advance free interchange between them, the laboratory workers and those carrying out practical research in the field.

RESEARCH.

12. Researches slowly lifting the veil which hides the secrets of disease and mortality and opening up fields of inquiry scarcely thought of a generation ago. The discovery by Sir Ronald Ross of the part played by the mosquito in the communication of malaria and the appointment of the Plague Commission in 1896 are landmarks in the history of Indian Sanitation. In 1902, a research institute was founded at Guindy in Madras, named the King Institute after Lieutenant-Colonel King, O. I. E. I. M. S., in view of his devoted efforts in the cause of sanitation in that presidency. In 1905, Lord Curzon's Government summed up the position and the policy of the Government of India in regard to the establishment of laboratories for the study of problems of public health in India. The functions of the central laboratory were original research, the preparation of curative sera and the training of scientific workers. The functions of the provincial laboratories were diagnosis and special research connected with local conditions. This policy has been steadily developed. The Central Research Institute has been established at Kasauli. The plague Research Laboratory at Parel has been extended and re-equipped and is now the bacteriological laboratory for the Bombay presidency; and a proposal is under consideration to attach to it a school of tropical medicine. A research laboratory and school of tropical medicine are under construction at Calcutta. Pasteur institutes exist at Kasauli and Coonoor. A third is about to be established in Burma, and it is under discussion to establish others in Assam (where it will be combined with a research laboratory) and Bombay.

Besides the routine work connected with the bacteriological diagnosis of disease, anti-rabic treatment, the manufacture of various vaccines and sera and general research, these laboratories at different times have been the centres of many special investigations, notable amongst which are those on the plague and enteric fever. It is hoped before long each province in India will have a laboratory fully equipped for research.

INDIAN RESEARCH ASSOCIATION.

13. The foundation of the Indian Research Fund Association in 1911 has marked an important era in sanitary progress. The control and management of the association are vested in a governing body, the president of which is the Member in charge of the Education Department of the Government of India. The governing body is assisted by a "scientific advisory board" of which not less than three members have seats on the governing body. They examine all proposals for work in connection with the scientific objects of the association and report as to their importance and feasibility. The members of this board are appointed for one year, but are eligible for re-election, and they have power to add to their number. The present members are the Director-General, Indian Medical Service, the Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India, the Director of the Central Research Institute at Kasauli, the Officer in charge of the Central Malarial Bureau and the Assistant Director-General, Indian Medical Service (Sanitary): Sir Ronald Ross has been elected an honorary consulting member. The membership of the Indian Research Fund Association is open to non-officials. Every Donor of Rs. 5,000 is entitled to become a permanent member, while every subscriber of Rs. 100 per annum can be a temporary member. Members of the association are entitled to attend and take part in the annual general meeting of the association and to receive copies of the reports and other publications issued from time to time by the association. Although, so far, the fund has been financed solely by the Government of India, it is hoped that in time Indian philanthropist will contribute towards the expansion of the association by founding chairs of research, by financing experimental research measures and otherwise.

14. The association has been active and can already point to some achievement. Out of an income of Rs. 15 lakhs (£100,000) received since its incorporation and up to the end of 1913-14, and expenditure of over Rs. 14 lakhs (£93,333) has been sanctioned. In 1911 Major S. P. James, I. M. S., was deputed to study yellow fever in its endemic area and to draw up proposals for protecting India against the introduction of the disease. Those proposals are still under consideration. In the meanwhile, stegomyia surveys have been carried out in Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Karachi and Rangoon and other seaports. Anti-malaria schemes based on preliminary surveys have been carried out at a cost of Rs. 6,02,000 (£40,133). Investigations are at present in progress into the problem connected with the prevalence of cholera, kala-azar, dysentery, leprosy and goitre, as well as inquiries into the pharmacology of cinchona derivatives, the use of hydrocyanic acid gas as a pulicide and the fixation of chemical standards of purity for milk and milk products. Other investigations are under consideration regarding bacteriological standards of purity of water-supplies, the different anti-cholera vaccines and sera, the methods of water filtration and silt removal best suited to Indian conditions, and the etiology of diabetes and the fevers of short duration. These will be started as soon as more trained research workers are available. It is hoped also to carry out, during the next non-epidemic season, an experiment in plague prevention on a large scale on the lines indicated in paragraph 22.

15. Besides financing the investigations conducted by its own staff, the association gives grants-in-aid to outside research on approved lines. The co-operation of other workers has been sought, and every encouragement has been given to them. Grants for research have been made, for instance, to Professor MacMahon, Dr. Hossack and Mr. Howlett. The services of Indians have also been enlisted. Dr. Korke is engaged in an important investigation into kala-azar, while Mr. Awati, a medical entomologist, is employed under the association. The Government of India cordially approve the policy of encouraging private enterprise in the cause of research.

16. The association has also started a journal for the publication of medical research work done in India—the "Indian Journal of Medical Research"—published quarterly. The favourable reception which has been accorded to the first three numbers is evidence of the increased interest that is being taken in sanitary science in India to-day.

17. The investigations enumerated above represent the work directly under the supervision of the Government of India. The local Governments also are fully alive to the importance of research, and in seven provinces nine special officers are at present engaged in investigating the causes underlying the local prevalence of Malaria and devising suitable schemes, for the mitigation of that disease.—(To be continued.)

Toys for Men.

TO JUDGE from the toy-shops, the practice of giving children toys disguised as Easter eggs is on the increase. So various are the fancies displayed, that to the child who receives one the adventure of opening an Easter egg must be almost as great as to its elders the adventure of opening a breakfast egg. And it does not much matter which of the many kinds is chosen, because it is an affair of pure luck, not to be calculated beforehand from any probability or fact, whether a child will take to a toy or not. Children's tastes in toys seem to be ruled by nothing but caprice, and very often, while they make shift with what toys they have, their souls are possessed by a craving for something in which no one else can see any attraction. A child will pine for weeks for an hour-glass or a china bird, or something equally limited in scope and equally difficult to play with. It would be easy to put these queer cravings aside as one of the mysteries of childhood, if it were not that they attract with equal unreason and greater force full-grown and whiskered men. A common complaint at present-giving seasons is that men, even many-sided and light-hearted men, are such difficult beings to choose presents for. One reason is that, unlike children, men will not make shift to play with the things that are given them. It is not safe to assume that any toy you may choose will please a man. He must choose his own toys, and, however closely you may be in his confidence, the odds are heavy against his having admitted to you, even by oblique reference, what toy it is that he craves for. The secrecy of the affair is part of its attraction. Usually in the spring or summer a man of level head and sober views will be seized suddenly with an intense desire for something that he never desired before. The crisis is quite different from the yearly or half-yearly conviction that his wardrobe and his chest of drawers contain nothing but rubbish, the seasonable and reasonable impulse towards new socks, ties, shirts, and suits. The craving for toys is a much sharper and more sinister affair. It usually violates what the victim believed to be a law of his being. If he especially likes the feel of a cigar against his lips, he will be seized with a passion for a very long cigar-holder. If he is a cigarette-smoker, he will feel further existence impossible without some fantastically enormous pipe (men's toys are largely connected with smoking). A man who enjoys pen and paper will crave for a typewriter. Men have bought pedometers, sword-sticks, goloshes, monocles, vapour-lamps, chafing-dishes, anything and everything of which the buyer's friends would have said that it was the last thing he was ever likely to want.

In saying so they think that they have convicted him of folly. But the folly of it is an element that he enjoys even more than the secrecy. He recognizes in the unreasonable desire a vicious and delightful kick lashed out by some profound part of his nature at the work-a-day self of him. He will be as specious as the White Knight in explaining to himself, before the act of folly is committed, that the thing will be exceedingly useful, that it is just what he always wanted; he will earnestly assure his friends, when the deed is done, that he cannot imagine how he ever got on without it. All the time he knows in his heart, and rejoices to know, that his desire is for a toy; and a toy is not a thing that you need, but a thing that you want—an object not to use, but to play with. He knows, too, if he is honest with himself, that once he has bought the thing, he will play with it not at all or for a very short time. The knowledge adds to the adventurous naughtiness of the escapade; but it does not bear encouraging

To enjoy the feeling to the full, a man must be able to know that he will not play with his toy when he has it, and yet be sincerely convinced that he will; and the smooth interaction of these two wheels of consciousness is not so rare as might be supposed. The more experienced in the game prolong the state by all the delays possible. In the anticipation of falling lies the joy of temptation; and the prudent man will put off as long as he can the delirious moment when he will walk into the shop and buy at last the thing he desires. But he does not put it off until the craving has passed. For one thing, that is moral cowardice. For another, it robs him of a future and perhaps far distant thrill of pleasure, on the day when he will happen again on his long-forgotten toy, and, while he growls about the accumulation of lumber, will glow with the remembered joy of his folly. It is good, he will tell himself then, to be young enough and gay enough at heart to want a toy and to get it; for when a man wants toys no more it is time that he were thinking of his tombstone.—The Times.
